The Week.

The Royal Visit.

THE following are extracts from the Court Circular — 29th December. The King Emperor and Queen Empress arrived at Howrah at 12.30 P. M. and were received by the Governor-General and Lady Hardinge. On Their Imperial Majesties' alighting from the Royal train, the National Anthem was played and a salute of 101 guns was fired from the ramparts of Fort William. Their Imperial Majesties were received at the pier by the Vice-Chairman of the Port Commissioners, the Officer Port of Calcutta, and the Deputy Conservator of the Port of Calcutta. The route from the station, to the pier was lined by troops. On leaving the station, the Queen Empress was graciously pleased to accept a bouquet presented by Lady Dring. The King Emperor and the Queen Empress embarked on the steamer Huorah which was escorted by ferry steamers manned by the Calcutta Port Defence Volunteers down the Hooghly river to Prinsep's Ghat. As the steamer left the pier a salute of 101 guns was fired by H.M.S. Highflyer. On the arrival of the Huorah at Prinsep's Ghat, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal and the General Officer Commanding 8th (Lucknow) Division with their staffs proceeded on board where they had the honour of being presented to Their Imperial Majesties.

The King Emperor and Queen Empress then proceeded ashore where they were received by the members of the Bengal Executive Council, the Ruling and Feudatory Chiefs of Bengal, the principal nobles of Bengal, the members of the Bengal Legislative Council.

The Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation then on behalf of the Commissioners read an address of loyal welcome to Their Imperial Majesties, to which the King Emperor was graciously pleased to reply.

On arrival at Government House the King Emperor and Queen Empress were received by the Governor General and Lady Hardinge.

The following had the honour of being presented to Their Imperial Majesties by the Governor General.

The Chief Justice, the Bishop of Calcutta, the Members of the Executive Council, the Naval Commander in Chief, the Chief of the General Staff, the President and Members of the Railway Board, the Additional Members of the Legislative Council, the Secretaries to the Government of India.

After this the senior officers of the Army Head Quarters Staff had the honour of being presented by the Commander-in-Chief and the Puisne Judges by the Chief Justice.

The King Emperor's reply to the City's address was as follows:—
"I thank you warmly on behalf of the Queen Empress and myself for the assurances of loyalty and devotion on the part of the Corporation and citizens of the city of Calcutta to which your address gives expression."

"We are deeply touched by your kind reference to my beloved Father's stay in your city and by your affectionate allusion to our own visit here six years ago. We can never forget the cordial welcome given us on that occasion, while the sympathetic interest in our Indian Empire, which the first sight of this great city inspired, has in no way abated. It is a source of great pleasure to us to revisit Calcutta and to see for ourselves evidence of your progress and prosperity."

"The changes in the administration of India resulting from the announcement made by me at the great Durbar at Delhi will affect, to a certain extent, Calcutta. But your city must always remain the premier city of India. Its population, its importance as a commercial centre and great emporium of trade, its splendid historic traditions, all combine to invest Calcutta with a unique character, which should preserve to it a pre-eminent position. At the same time the status of the Province of which Calcutta is the Capital, has been enhanced by the creation of a Presidency of Bengal and I feel confident that under the wise administration of a Governor in Council, the new Presidency will enjoy increased prosperity with the blessing of tranquillity and order."

"I know that you cherish ambitions that India will one day become a great manufacturing as well as an agricultural country. I have watched with keen interest the progress of your business enterprises, and I trust that the success which has attended your commercial energy will attract more and more of the youth of this country to regard commerce as a distinguished and honourable profession."

"I thank you for your kind wishes and prayers. It shall ever be our earnest endeavour to promote the welfare of our Indian Empire, and we fervently hope that the years as they pass will ever strengthen the feeling of warm attachment that exists between my House and my Indian people."

31st December. Their Imperial Majesties attended Divine Service at St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta, on Sunday, driving there and back in state carriage with outriders and postillions. The road from Government House was kept by the police, but beyond this there was no formality. The King Emperor and Queen Empress entered the Viceregal pew from the south-east door and took their part in the service like any other members of the large congregation which filled the building.

The sermon was preached by Bishop Copleston from the two initial words of the Lord's Prayer, "Our Father which art in heaven." The Bishop dwelt upon the religious aspect of the rejoicings of the country over the presence of its King-Emperor and pointed out that a great people must be knit together by the recognition of the existence of one divine father of all its members.

Her Majesty accompanied by Lady Hardinge and party from Government House paid a visit on Sunday afternoon to the Royal Botanical Gardens at Shihpur. The Royal party left by steamer from Chandpal Ghat and on arrival at the gardens were shown over by the Superintendent. Her Majesty was apparently much pleased with all she saw in the gardens.

1st January. At 8 A.M. this morning the King-Emperor rode from Government House to the racecourse.

In the afternoon the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress motored to the racecourse polo ground.

In the evening, a State Dinner followed by a reception, was given at Government House to which a large number of guests, mainly high officials, Judges of the High Court, and members of the Foreign Consular body were invited.

The following Press communiqué was issued on 1st January.—

"By the gracious command of Their Imperial Majesties a holiday has been granted to all schools and colleges in Calcutta and the suburbs, including Howrah, from the 1st to the 9th January. Those schools and colleges which have examinations fixed during these days will be given equivalent holidays after the examinations are over."

Their Imperial Majesties accompanied by their Excellencies the Viceroy and Lady Hardinge visited the Zoological Garden in the evening and were received at the gate by Mr. B. Dasu, the Superintendent, and Mr. S. Ganguli, the Assistant Superintendent and staff. Their Majesties expressed themselves highly interested in what they saw in the Garden specially the lion cubs (born in the Garden), the tigers, the poisonous snakes, the cat bears, and the birds of paradise. They were satisfied with the upkeep of the animals and the general management of the Garden. Lieutenant-Colonel E. Harold Brown, M.D., I.M.S. (retired), Honorary Secretary of the Garden, came later on and was introduced to His Majesty by His Excellency the Viceroy and accompanied him to the gate.

and January. This morning the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress proceeded from Government House to the Parade Ground.

The King Emperor mounted his charger at Government House and the following Procession was formed: The King Emperor, Major Keighley, Commandant of the Body Guard, the Commander-in-Chief, the Governor-General, the Duke of Teck, Major Lord Charles Fitzmaurice, Brigadier General Sir R. Criniston, Lieutenant Colonel Maxwell, the Maharajah of Bikanir, the Maharaja of Gwalior, Hon. Major-General Sir Pratap Singh, the Queen-Empress in a carriage with the Mistresses of the Robes and the Lord High Steward, Captain Hodson, Adjutant of the Body Guard, Lady Hardinge, the Marquis of Crewe and the Lord Chamberlain to the Queen-Empress in a carriage.

Major Stockley and Major General Sir Stuart Benson were in attendance on Her Imperial Majesty on horseback.

The route was by the Red Road and the escort was furnished by the Governor-General's Body guard.

On arrival at the Saluting Base, the King-Emperor was received by a Royal Salute, and His Imperial Majesty, followed by the Queen-Empress in Her carriage, inspected the Parade.

At the conclusion of the Inspection, Their Imperial Majesties returned to the Saluting Base when a Salute of 101 guns and a feu-de-jon were fired.

The March Past then took place after which the Cavalry Brigade passed at the grillop.

The whole of the Division then advanced in Review Order. The Royal Salute was again followed by three cheers for the King-Emperor and three cheers again for the Queen-Empress.

Their Imperial Majesties left the Parade Ground and returned to Government House in Procession as before.

In the afternoon the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress honoured the Governor-General and Lady Hardinge with their presence at a Garden Party given in Government House Grounds.

The King-Emperor held a Levée at Government House.

3rd January. At 8 A.M. this morning the King-Emperor rode from Government House to the Racecourse.

In the forenoon the King-Emperor attended by the Governor-General and Commander Sir Charles Cust and Rear Admiral Sir Colin Keppel (Equerries-in-Waiting) motored to the Polo Ground where His Imperial Majesty honoured with his presence the final of the Calcutta Coronation Polo Tournament. The competing teams were the 10th Hussars and the Scouts. The tournament was won by the latter to whom the King-Emperor was graciously pleased to hand the Cup which was given by Sir Cecil Graham.

This afternoon the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress honoured the Calcutta Races with their presence. Their Imperial Majesties left Government House at 2.30 and a procession of carriages was formed.

The escort under the command of Major Keighley was furnished by the Governor-General's Body-guard.

On arrival Their Imperial Majesties were received by the Governor-General and Lady Hardinge and the Stewards of the Calcutta Turf Club, and witnessed some of the races including the Race for the Cup given by the King-Emperor.

Before leaving the Racecourse His Imperial Majesty was graciously pleased to present the Cup to Mr. J. C. Galstaun, the owner of the winner.

The King-Emperor and Queen-Empress then entered their carriage and returned to Government House with their suite in procession via the west side of the Race Course and the Red Road.

Morocco.

REUTER wired from Madrid:—Fighting round Melilla recently was of the heaviest description. The Rifians were decimated, while the Spanish General Ros was wounded. The operations continue. In the further fighting on the 28th instant Spaniards lost two killed and seventy wounded.

As a result of intelligence from native sources that the enemy are expecting reinforcements to the number of 20,000, Spain has decided to despatch to Melilla all forces necessary to quell the rising.

It is officially stated that the Spanish losses on the 27th December were 4 officers and 64 men killed and 18 officers and 210 men wounded. The Moors have received fresh reinforcements and further obstinate fighting is expected.

Latest details give the Spanish losses on December 27 as 12 officers killed and 21 wounded, and 83 men killed and 257 wounded. Bad weather delays the embarkation of Spanish reinforcements.

China.

REUTER wired from Nanking:—Sun-Yat-Sen had been unanimously elected President of the Republic of China.

REUTER wired from Peking:—The Dowager Empress, Yuan-Shih-Kai, and the Manchu princes to-day discussed the proposals of the Shanghai Conference. The Throne agreed to accept the scheme for a further conference with a wider representative character and the Cabinet was instructed to draw up the regulations necessary for the inauguration of the scheme. The Throne expressed its willingness to agree to any form of Government the Conference might decide on.

REUTER wired from St. Petersburg:—A telegram from Hankow states that the armistice has expired and that the Republicans have opened fire from Wuchang upon Hanyang.

REUTER wired from Shanghai:—The Peace Conference has resolved that the National Convention shall be composed of representatives of the different sections of China, each province forming one section. Each section will send three delegates and each delegate will exercise three votes even if the full number of delegates of that section does not attend. The delegates will be summoned by telegraph partly in the name of the Provisional Republican Government and partly in the name of the Manchu Government.

The Conference has voted 200,000 dollars for the relief of the famine-stricken area.

A telegram from Urga states that the head of the Buddhist priesthood has taken over the government of Mongolia as an autocratic ruler.

REUTER wires from Shanghai that it is feared, owing to the resignation of Tang-Shao-Yi, the Imperial delegate at the Conference, because his compliant attitude during the peace negotiations was disapproved of by Peking, that a continuation of the Conference is impossible.

REUTER wires from Shanghai:—Wu-Ting-Fang in further reply to the note of the Powers of December 21st urging speedy arrangement in the interests of all concerned says the prospects of peace have been wilfully nullified by the Manchu Government breaking off negotiation and repudiating the decisions of its accredited representative Tang-Shao-Yi.

REUTER wires from Nanking:—Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen arrived here yesterday. He has received a courteous letter from Yuan-Shih-Kai declaring that the entire people will be permitted to decide the form of Government and thanking him for the offer of the presidency.

A message to the Daily News from Peking states that the Secretary of the Italian Legation has returned from Tui-Yuan-Fu and reports that the conditions there are critical. The official states that the brigands rule the town and that thirty Italian priests are in jeopardy. The British and Italian Ministers have informed Yuan-Shih-Kai of these statements and he has promised to send troops.

TETE À TETE

WE HAVE already rung out the old year, and the new one is now being rung in. 1911 has indeed been a memorable year throughout the world, with its industrial struggles, its political wars, its military raids and its peace purchased perhaps at even greater cost than the fierce arbitration of the sword would have involved. It would indeed be a pleasant task to run back over the whole ground of the last twelve months and trace on our pages the lines of the world's movements scrawled hastily by the actors in a very vivid and moving drama on the vast page of Life. But properly speaking the task is the historian's who must provide the connecting links of a long chain and not the journalist's who must be content to chronicle the day's doings as each sun goes down and dips into the sea of the Past. All that the journalist is expected to do is to see that his chronicle is accurate, and that the material he provides for the historian can be relied upon for the construction of the latter's fabric. Lord Rosebery's artistic sense detects flaws where less artistic souls can discern nothing but merits, and in one of his artistic moods he found fault with the newspapers because they contained leading articles. He would have liked a newspaper to be accepted at its face value, i.e. as a paper with news and not views. But although we believe his Lordship's lonely furrow was not ploughed in the field of journalism, we should have thought that he was too astute a public man to ignore all the artistic skill that goes to the creation of "news." A leading article of the Times, for instance, does not perhaps bear a deeper impress of the leader writer's personality than the newsletter of one of its own correspondents. A latter-day Platon may well ask "What is news?" and puzzle not a few editors with his awkward query. Luckily for ourselves, we do not pretend to cater news to the curious so much as to supply our readers with a running commentary on the news provided for them and is by our contemporaries. A Persian proverb, نقل کفر کفر لباشه (The reproduction of infidelity is not infidelity), is a good enough protection for us, we hope, against the cross-examiner who would pelt us in the witness-box and hurl at our devoted head the question "What is news?" Many Oriental chroniclers used to provide themselves with a lawyer's "Without Prejudice" in the convenient dictum: ندرغ برکردن رازی (May the lie thereof be on the neck of the person who related the story), and used to wind up their statements with the pious Arabic formula, وَاللَّهِ اَعْلَمُ بِالْغُورَابِ.

(Allah knoweth the truth best) We too must have in the course of a whole year reproduced much that must remain a terrible load on the necks of our contemporaries and that Allah may have found difficult to identify as His own truth. But our comments have been our own and for them we must accept the fullest responsibility. We must confess that nobody would be a journalist who had in his constitution the somewhat inconvenient virtue of modesty in a large measure. A journalist has to appear not only as the spokesman but also as the leader of public opinion, not only to advocate the claims of the people but also to preach from the journalistic pulpit to his flock. Such a position must satisfy the cravings of the heart of the most self-confident among mankind but we have a suspicion that not all the bravery of the editorial "We" and similar journalistic paraphernalia can always subdue the feeling that it is a single individual, not necessarily more competent than all his readers to pass judgments on affairs, that is preaching from an unusual eminence. We should be sorry to follow in the footsteps of the Pharisee, but we hope we may justly claim that our opinions have been offered more as friendly suggestions to our readers than as sermons delivered from a great height. They have not been lectures administered by a superior person, but little a little confidences exchanged between comrades. In some quarters, however, exception has been taken to our claim of comradeship. A man is mostly a bundle of prejudices, and we have not yet claimed for ourselves a place among the angels. If there is an unconscious bias in any direction, we can only regret it. But ex hypothesi an unconscious failing cannot be consciously corrected. To the charge of conscious partisanship we unhesitatingly plead "Not Guilty." We belong to no Syndicate. We are part and parcel of no political Trust. We are rigidly attached to no Tammany Hall. Our opinions may be right or they may be wrong. But they are all our own. Our faith in a United India is unaltered and unshaken. But a United India does not exist to day. We have to create it, and the first necessary condition before it can be created is to recognise that at present it does not exist. We are prepared to face the situation fairly and squarely, and we do not shrink from a recognition of uncomfortable facts. We confess we have chalked out for ourselves a path somewhat different from the paths of others. But the goal is identical, and that is the highest good of every community and interest in India's varied elements. We confess religion and religious warfare has no dangers for us. For us the greatest enemy of a united Nation is the Caste, and if we appear unduly suspicious, we must plead our unfortunate experience in the past, that what had been claimed for the Nation was often shared only by a few favoured castes that are essentially un-national. Spectious pleas such as "free competition" have no attraction for us. Our ideal is not so much free competition as fraternity, and we think that the weakest brother is in need of protection rather than of a Manchester School of political philosophy. If we have advocated the cause of one community more strenuously than that of another, it has chiefly been because it was the weakest and most in need of our advocacy. We have been at such pains to meet criticism levelled at our consistency, not because we resent it, but because we desire to show that we are not deaf to the critic's voice. With one class of critics, however, we have no patience. That is the person who wishes us to make him, or some organisation of those who think like him, the Keeper of our Conscience. We believe we have a conscience, and we believe equally firmly that it is best kept by ourselves. Lord Morley, one of the greatest benefactors of India, has no more escaped the charge of inconsistency than we have been, but, in the words of a journalistic colleague and critic of Lord Morley, we may conclude this survey by saying that the ship may swing on the tide sometimes, but the anchor holds. It is our hope that we shall be no more untrue to ourselves in 1912 than we have been in 1911, and that we shall continue to be comrades of all and partisans of none. But if in aught we have erred in 1911, we would crave the indulgence of all whom we have offended. After all it is not to what is past that we must hark back. The ideals of progress are always before, not behind us, and we may say with the poet,

Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife,
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.
Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic clamor and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.
Ring out old shapes of foul disease,
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Our supporter would like to know how we have fared in the eventful year that has just closed after witnessing such strange and wholly unsuspected happenings.

Our Supporters

For us it has been a year of special anxiety for it has been the very first of our existence, and who does not know the many perils of journalistic infancy? We often hear of hope being the only asset in some enterprise, but we wonder if this true remark was ever half as true as it has been in our own case. Here was an enterprise which was undertaken absolutely without capital, and although good Samaritans were not wanting in our case, they came to our rescue almost without an exception after we had taken the first fateful step. Our confidence in our own rough-hewing was no less startling than our faith in the divinity that shapes our erds. But we have no reason, after a year's trial, to be dissatisfied with results. When the first issue appeared a year ago we had less than 300 promised subscribers, and hardly a penny of capital. But within a fortnight of the first issue the number of subscribers was more than doubled, and the average increase in the number of subscribers has been about 200 per month. July and August are part of India's rather long Silly Season, and nothing unusual had occurred in 1911 to disturb their reposeful character. But the largest additions to our list of subscribers were made in those two months, and, what is still more satisfactory, the variations from month to month have been very slight. We may, therefore, claim that it is not by catchpenny sensationalism that the Comrade has made its way into the homes and—may we say?—the hearts of the people. Although the phrase has been made odious by the unshamed hypocrisy of European diplomacy, we may truly say that it has rather been a case of "peaceful penetration." We have often advertised for canvassers to push the sale of the paper and have failed to get one. But the chief reason of our failure has been the constant supply of honorary canvassers. For just as every Moslem is—or at least used to be—a missionary, every reader of the Comrade is its sturdy and most successful canvasser. We had hopes of repaying this kindness, not by a mere acknowledgment of it in our columns, but by an appreciable reduction in the rate of subscription. But what has happened reminds us of the problem of our schooldays which had something to do with a tap in a tank bringing in a supply of water at a given rate and an escape for the water which let it out at another rate. While we were steadily adding to the number of our subscribers every month, a certain number of others were running up arrears of subscription in spite of our repeated request to settle accounts. Had some of our subscribers asked us after a few months' trial to discontinue sending the paper to them we should have been sorry to learn that it had failed to please them, but we would, on the other hand, have been spared much confusion and disappointment. The fact, that while bills remain unpaid and reminders unanswered, each succeeding issue was willingly accepted, flatters our self-conceit no doubt, but it sorely touches our finances. We are sorry to say that in the course of the last 12 months we have had to strike off the names of no less than 400 subscribers, hardly 10 per cent. of whom had their names scratched after paying the dues for some time, most of the remaining 90 per cent having had their names removed as defaulters. We expected generosity in their treatment of us, but this is not even honesty. The result of this has unavoidably been that those who have been regular in their payment have had to be deprived of the much-looked for chance of a reduction in the rate of subscription. If any of these defaulters chances to read these lines, we only trust they will make him realize better than before that in reality he has been punishing with bad debts not us so much as those who have no dues to settle. But in spite of this setback the progress has been far beyond our expectations. The rate of the first few days of January, 1912, is so remarkably high that if it is maintained longer we shall have an addition of 400 names in the very first month of the new year. A few months like this would see us not only securely established, but also in a position to enable thousands of people, who cannot spare Rs 12 a year for the Comrade, to subscribe to it. An early step that has to be taken is the establishment of our own Press so that savings may be effected in printing charges and we may be enabled to follow the Government of India to its new Capital, or its near neighbourhood. All this can be done if we continue to receive the same support from our numerous friends in our second year that we have received in our first. The New Year is generally the time for new resolves which seldom materialize into facts. We make none ourselves, nor ask our readers to do so. If they and we adhere faithfully to our old resolution of true comradeship, it will be well for them as well as for us. So let us welcome the New Year with the hope that, without losing any of the old ones, we shall add new friends to our comradeship.

THE subscriptions collected for the relief of the war sufferers in Tripoli are an excellent index of the extent to which the sufferings of Mussalmans abroad are felt by their co-religionists in India. With a view to show these clearly we had requested the gentlemen in charge of these funds in various localities to take the trouble of giving us this information by filling a form like the one we publish in another column and sending it to us so as to reach us at the latest on Wednesday mornings. We are sorry to say that hitherto only two gentlemen have sent us the required information, but we trust others will follow their example, and that the form would in all cases be adhered to and accounts ending Saturdays would be sent week by week. We are not convinced that Karachi Mussalmans have done their duty, for the students of Aligarh who are not in a position to earn anything themselves have contributed almost an equal amount by stinting themselves in the way of food and reducing other items of expenditure which had to be met out of their scanty pocket money. We heard from Kazi Kabiruddin Sahab of Bombay that nearly Rs 75,000 have been collected there, but the amounts mentioned in his letter—which we hope to publish soon with some more information which we have asked for—show that little has been realized from the poor Calcutta, we learn, has contributed about Rs 30,000. That, we fear, is too little even for the late metropolis of India, specially as its contribution to the Moslem University Fund is of the smallest. It is a source of personal gratification to us that Rampur, which is the capital of the Rampur State and has a very poor and not very large population, has contributed Rs 30,000, which have been sent through the Commissioner of Bareilly to the British Ambassador at Constantinople for favour of forwarding to the Grand Vicer. Our own fund is progressing fairly well, although we have purposely refrained from publishing special appeals. We wish the contributions to be voluntary in the strictest sense, and although we shall lose the benefits accruing to us here and hereafter as persuaders in a good cause, according to the wise dictum الدَّالُّ عَلَى خَيْرٍ كُنَّا عَلَيْهِ نَقِيرُونَ

(the persuader of good is like the doer of good), we hope to be able to know more truly how far the Mussalmans of India feel for their foreign co-religionists.

ہمارے قریبوں کا ہم یہی غالب * تھا اے اہل کرم نہ کہتے ہیں

We must not forget our much-esteemed and brilliant contemporary, the Zamindar of Mr Zafar Ali Khan, which has collected more than Rs 16,000. We have no doubt that if the accounts of all collections were published, it would be found that India has sent not less than five lakhs of rupees for the sufferers in Tripoli and Turkey. Hardly had India succeeded in relieving the miseries of these people when the sufferings of the Persians at Tabriz are announced. What with the claims of the Moslem University and of the sufferers in Tripoli and Tabriz, the Mussalmans of India have more calls on their purses than they could well respond to. But they must remember the pregnant words of the Quran:

وَلَنَنْتَلُوَكُمْ بِفَيْءٍ مِنَ الْخَوْفِ وَالْجُوعِ وَنَقَبٍ مِنَ الْأَمْوَالِ
وَالْأَنْسَى وَالْثَمَرِ وَبِقُرْصِ الْبَرِّينَ الَّذِينَ إِذَا مَا بَثَّمْ مَصْنِبَةً
قَالُوا إِنَّا لِلَّهِ إِنَّا إِلَيْهِ رَاجِعُونَ

(And indeed We shall test you with a little of fear and hunger and loss of wealth and life and produce. So announce [our pleasure] to those who are patient, who say when a trouble befalls them "We are for Allah, and we shall return to Him.") They are being tested only with a little loss of wealth, but there is neither fear, nor hunger, nor loss of life. All the greater tests are only for their brethren's in Tripoli and Tabriz. Egypt which is so much smaller than India has contributed several lakhs already. It is indeed one more proof of the nobility of English character that when the London Moslem League opened a "Red Crescent" Society fund, while only a few Mussalmans contributed small amounts—smaller indeed than we had ever expected—about twenty Englishmen came to the League's assistance and among them Captain C. F. Dixon-Johnson of Darlington contributed £100, which is twenty times as large as any Moslem contribution, excepting of course H. H. The Aga Khan's £400. This is a fact worth remembering, for otherwise Indian Mussalmans are apt to be unjust to the British nation and the Christians. If there is a Sir Edward Grey, there are also Lords Lamington and Curzon, Professor Browne, Captain Dixon-Johnson and Lieutenant Montagu.

It is only once a year, with the close of the Annual Session of the Congress, that one fears of the existence of an organised movement for reform in Hindu Society. What that movement really stands for would be manifest from the scope and variety of the deliberations that take place in the Social Conference. The list of the official resolutions that come up for discussion every year with unvarying regularity, reveal the colossal nature of the problems with which the Hindu reformers have got to deal. They cover the whole range of the Hindu social life, its castes and conventions, its marriage laws and sex relations, the modes of living it prescribes, its restrictions, inequalities and immobility. Even a brief acquaintance with the enormous work that lies before the Hindu Social Conferences would lead one to approach the broad questions affecting the political evolution of the country in a very humble, subdued and chastened mood. The Hindu Press talks democracy with a vengeance and is trying to copy the accent of the oracle without first making sure of the inspiration. The conditions of the Hindu society as it exists to-day furnish the true perspective of the Indian situation. To talk of democracy, with the mass of the people still in varying stages of an unregenerate state of existence, with caste and privilege and priest as the dominating influences in home and social relations, is to indulge in a tall political talk without measuring the realities of the situation. Social tyrannies afford hardly the sort of atmosphere for the growth of political freedom. Democracy, as we had explained in a previous issue, is not a cult or a system, it is the expression of the social habit and will and conscience in politics. Yet the Hindu politicians seem to have shunned the only straight path that could lead to the political salvation of the country. The Social Reform movement is as yet in its infancy, and leaving aside the platform zeal and fine patriotism that does not cost more than the burning of the mid-night oil over carefully prepared manuscripts, there seems to be no earnestness and sustained endeavour in fighting the terrible evils which are sapping the vigour of the great Hindu community. Resolutions are good in their own way, but they are not an end in themselves. If the serious social evils can be ignored in this light-hearted fashion in the rush and hurry of politics, the other communities may well look with suspicion on the efforts of the Hindu politicians for political co-operation on terms of equality, when there exists extreme social tyranny in their own ranks.

A VERY amusing communication on "the future policy of Indian Moslems" has appeared in the Pioneer of the 4th instant over the signature of S. RIZA AH, "Secretary, District Moslem League, Moradabad." The object of this letter is "to take the Pioneer into our confidence, to communicate to it our anxieties and troubles and to ask it to help us by advice in shaping our future policy." We do not know whether the District Moslem League commissioned their Secretary to approach their new political "adviser," which "has been a friend of the Mussalmans for a long time," to share with it their anxieties and their griefs, and extract from it a word of good cheer, or it was the Secretary's personal anxiety to deal a smart stroke of business with the Pioneer on his own account. Be this as it may, the Pioneer has risen characteristically to the occasion and has "no desire to sketch out programmes for the many rival communities of India." For once even the Allahabad Daily, which loves nothing so much as to imitate obiter dicta for the benefit and guidance of the erring universe, has been able to imagine that "the Muhammadans in particular are very well able to take care of themselves." Mr. S Riza Ah, perhaps, seems to think otherwise. His hankering after a "policy" laid down for him by an Anglo-Indian daily reveals a piteous frame of mind, which is fortunately rare amongst the majority of educated Mussalmans. "Policies" can not be manufactured any more than history or environment. They are the result of genuine convictions and take shape as definite courses of action through circumstances. If the Secretary of the Moradabad District League can or think out for himself the line of his future conduct, the best thing for him would be to apply to the All-India Moslem League for help in the matter. To begin to tank aloud in the columns of a newspaper and complain like Hamlet that

Times are out of joint. O' cursed spite
That ever I was born to set them right is surely the height of political imbecility. Happily, however, the Mussalmans feel that they are able to take care of themselves without needing the editorial wisdom of the Pioneer to set them right. If the Mussalmans are unable to think for themselves no extraneous advice will save them even if it be as pontifical as that of the friend, philosopher and guide that Mr. S. Riza Ah has unearthed for them.

The Comrade.

Persia.

THE land on which the Muscovite yoke is settling fast with England's "sanctimonious acquiescence" is one of the few examples of social and political organisms holding together through the stress and storm of time and amidst the cataclysms of history. It has preserved a marvellous uniformity of racial type and character amidst various changes of faith and empire ever since the nomad tribes of the Aryans from central Asia swept over it and made it their future home. The Aryan settlers were a young and virile race, and the change from the pastoral to the agricultural and industrial stage was as rapid as it was thorough. Industries, arts, wealth, power, culture sprang up in the course of time, and the influences of Persian civilisation began to be felt far and wide throughout the world.

The bold sweep and speculative subtlety of the Persian mind, which had created new forms of beauty and spiritual grace and explored new realms of poetry and romance, left, however, the political development of the country to the uncertain vicissitude of chance. It remained absorbed with awful earnestness in boldly questioning fate and measuring the absolute and the infinite, but disdained to take heed of the trivial and the relative. Turning in despair from the incurable imperfections of human life in its essence, it ceased to care about its accidents. The one characteristic of the modern mind lies in its clear grasp of the value of detail, however trivial, and its recognition of the importance of the accidental in the development of human things. The Persians, with all their grandeur of moral conceptions, vast intellectual power and artistic achievements, failed to evolve some vital doctrine in politics that could co-ordinate the activities of the individual with the functions of the State. All political wisdom came to be centred round the traditions of despotism, however benevolent. All corruption, license, oppression on the part of the rulers began to be silently endured in a mood of resigned indifference. Decay set in in all branches of national life. Initiative and enterprise perished under the dead weight of tyranny. Industries, arts, culture, in fact, all intellectual activity sank into a mere tradition warped by ignorance. One of the functions of the world was thus being worn out by an ill-fitted system of administration.

It was in the beginning of this century, when the utter political annihilation of the people of Iran was only a matter of a few years, that the hopes of a brighter era dawned within the country. The West, which had been so long dumping bales of goods not unmarked with balls of cannons, had also brought a message of political freedom to the East. Persia listened to the new gospel of Western democracy and opened her eyes with wonder and delight. The teachings of this Gospel were not new to her, she caught in them the unmistakable accents of the earlier Dispensation which in a series of simple and immutable formulas had, thirteen hundred years ago, summed up the most advanced social and political creed of Modern Europe. The scales fell from her eyes, she repented of past errors and solemnly vowed to mend her ways by the help of Divine light. For the first time she realised the awful plight into which the misdeeds of her despots and the helpless ignorance of her people had thrown her. Both her honour and resources were mortgaged to Russia and the designs of that unscrupulous neighbour on her very life were developing with unrelenting thoroughness. It was therefore her first duty to get rid of the despot and the system of which he was the symbol the man who was bent on betraying her and had already bartered away her economic freedom for a mess of pottage and a cup of wine. The despot was hauled down from his power and with him fell the system that had wrought frightful havoc and ruin in the country. The sovereignty was rescued from being the instrument of an irresponsible autocrat and was made to reside in the will of the people. With the establishment of a government consisting of responsible ministers and subject to the control of the elected representatives of the nation, Persia turned a new leaf in her history and the whole world, at least all those nations interested in human progress and freedom, hailed the advent of the new regime with sympathy and joy.

There is no formula yet known to political philosophy that could heal the woes of centuries of misgovernment in a day and create, as if with a magic wand, a fully equipped modern nationality out of the shattered elements of a race just waking to its political and material ruin. Nor could it ever be expected by those who have the least historic sense that Persia would be able to set up in a few years a perfect system of government and evolve peace and order out of the chaos of the ages. Persia, like Turkey, won the plaudits of a shallow press that talks freedom and practices the most blatant despotism of opinion. But it began to accuse the Persians, as it had done the Turks, of failure and incapacity before the warmth of the first reception had begun to cool. There were disorders and riots rampant in the country; life was unsafe; property was insecure; officials were ignorant and inexperienced; and, to cap all, democratic forms of government were unsuited to the instincts and intelligence of an Eastern race. Thus waxed the Press of Europe, notably of Russia and England, whose mood and temper away to the shrieking paragraphs of the adventurers that after a stormy passage across Persia, as often as not set up as "correspondents" of a Nation, Vremya or a Times. The spirit and genius of one of the most gifted races have been held up to obloquy and scorn, because forsooth a narrow-minded press reporter had not the insight, capacity and breadth of vision to understand them or, perhaps, because a sturdy muleteer of the caravan had treated him with the contempt and indifference that he deserved. Lord Morley discoursed the other day in an unusual vein of inconclusive garrulity on the dangers of new political experiments. It is almost inconceivable that he, too, should have used an unworthy claptrap to avoid a clear and unequivocal issue. The dangers of new experiments are great, are we, therefore, to understand that there should never be new political experiments? It is just because an old system is bad, corrupt and intolerable that humanity gets rid of the incubus, though it may have to face ills in the future that it knew not of. All experiments are dangerous as all progress is truly the result of a bold readaptation of means to ends. It is not, therefore, the new experiments that need frighten a statesman: what really matters is the spirit and the ideals behind them. Now, a nation honestly striving for freedom, progress and reformed administration, moved by the purest love of justice and political equality, making enormous sacrifices to build up a vigorous national life on a basis of enlightened patriotism, deserved something better from a Radical statesman than the cold douche of a ponderous platitude. Again, no one knows better than Lord Morley how weary and arduous is the journey to a complete political reconstruction. Modern Democracy in Europe is about a hundred years old, and in the opinion of some of the most competent judges, it is yet in the stage of experiment. Lord Morley's criticism of Mr. Hobhouse's famous book on "Democracy" is still fresh in men's minds. It is the most inspiring and fruitful contribution yet made on the subject. In it we find Lord Morley discussing the fortunes of Democracy, its blunders and its perils, and finally coming to the sage conclusion that the future is, on the whole, full of hope for the great political movement of modern times. True, but one may reasonably expect that the same patience, intellectual tolerance and the perspective of history will be brought to bear on the discussion about the fortunes of the Persian movement which is hardly yet five years old. None of course, would expect a hard-to-mouth newspaper reporter, revelling in the shoddy style and expletives of the modern picturesque, to be capable of exercising these virtues. It is all the more necessary that a great Minister should not allow himself to confuse definite and far-reaching issues by exploiting cheap philosophic doubts.

The central fact of the Persian situation is that the country had been already rendered hopelessly weak and defenceless by the orgies of its despots before the recent efforts of its patriots to save it brought about the revolution. The awakening of the nation and its growth in union and power were utterly distasteful to Russia, who began to cleverly mobilise her immense natural and diplomatic forces in order to crush its nascent sense of freedom. The new developments alarmed British statesmen, who at their simplicity thought that by concluding a treaty with Russia they would finally lay the Muscovite bogey to rest. The growing complexity of the European situation and more particularly the dread of Germany drove Sir Edward Grey to approach Russia with flattering overtures for the settlement of the Asiatic question. Sir Edward Grey's weakness was Russia's opportunity and she pulled the oil to a veritable Godard. So the notorious Convention was born and launched on its ill-starred career. Persia was divided into spheres of influence and "its integrity and independence" were assured. As a matter of fact, assurances about the "integrity and independence" of another country no more than that the country is too weak to enforce respect for her independent existence and this diplomatic fiction is devised to furnish a sort of legal cloak for acts of gradual spoliation. The history of the Convention is the history of Russia working implacably and with a single aim—the overthrow of Persian freedom. The British Government has been helplessly following on the heels of Russian diplomacy because the Convention was to be maintained. Indeed, this abject imitation of Sir Edward Grey's genius has become a sort of fetish to him; and to worship it as the one potent charm that could keep the German bogey away, has grown to be the master-purpose of his policy. After every aggressive act committed by Russia, be it the despatch of troops, the coercion of officials, the protection of law breakers and rebels, the inciting of anarchy or interference with the government of the country—Sir Edward Grey has always come out with an apology; and in order to save the Convention has been busy revising its spirit and meaning. Mr. Shuster has gone, and with him have gone the sovereign rights of Persia. The Government has been bullied to pay a fine for having the impertinence and temerity to administer its own laws. Russian Comrads are killing women and children at Tabriz or shooting Persian patriots by courts martial. A provisional government is to be set up by Russia in the northern provinces because the Persian Government is helpless to punish the authors of the "crimes," i.e., those devoted patriots who opposed the occupation of Tabriz by Russian troops. The Mejliss has been dissolved and it is quite probable, in view of the dark hints thrown out by Sir Edward Grey, that the National Assembly will never be allowed to meet again. In fine, Persia has virtually ceased to exist as an independent and sovereign state. Yet Sir Edward Grey thinks that Convention is still intact and that it was never concluded to assure the integrity and independence of Persia. Be this as it may, the Convention has almost killed Persia and the death of Persia will in its turn kill the Convention.

Why was this murderous instrument forged? If the peaceful division of the Persian Empire between Russia and England was its aim, why were the unctuous assurances about its "integrity and independence" so solemnly made? We do not imagine any British statesman worth the name could have contemplated with equanimity the creation of a land-frontier with Russia. Let us allow that Sir Edward Grey's original intention was to come to an understanding with Russia with a view to the ultimate creation of a sort of buffer and semi-independent Persia dependent upon them for economic direction and political advice. Annexation, we may suppose, was not his aim. Russia, however, had full-fledged designs of territorial acquisition and by subtly playing on the Germanophobic instincts of Sir Edward Grey, she dragged him along with her and has at last landed him in a situation which is little short of a complete cul de sac for British statesmen, defeats the traditional Eastern policy of Britain and leads to the suppression and overthrow of Persia's liberty. Lord Curzon, in his masterly survey of the situation in the House of Lords, had warned the Government of what might happen quite inevitably and independently of their desire to maintain the status quo in the Middle East. By "following silently in the footsteps of our allies" the British Government might undo the work of generations of British statesmen. His apprehensions have been realised sooner than even he could have imagined at the time. Russia has planted herself at Resht and Tabriz and no power or prayer can dislodge her from these positions. Her occupation of Teheran is only a question of days. By the inevitable logic of the fait accompli, the British battalions must move up from the South and meet the Russian legions across the vague line dividing their respective spheres of influence. Whatever may be the ultimate fate of Persia, whether it would be administered indirectly by "protectorates" or directly by annexation and absorption, the continuous frontiers would change the whole character of British position in the East. Leaving aside the development of an acute problem about the attitude of Afghanistan, enormous fresh responsibilities would be thrown on the shoulders of the Indian people and Government. India will have to pay, whether in treasure or in blood, for the indiscretions of Sir Edward Grey.

Musallman nations owe a great debt of gratitude to Lord Curzon for pleading so eloquently on their behalf and exhorting the Imperial Government to occasionally try to save them from destruction at the hands of the aggressors. Both Lord Morley and Sir Edward Grey have said that the sentiments of His Majesty's Moslem subjects were one of the guiding considerations in their Persian policy. We may thankfully accept these assurances. But the recent developments in Persia lead us to think that if the Moslem sentiments had been a factor of some weight in the councils of the Imperial Government the Persian situation could have never become so hopeless and almost irretrievable. Needless to say the news of Russian doings have been received by the Musallmans with the utmost grief and consternation. They cannot look without being profoundly shocked on the destruction of Persia, to whom they are bound by common civilisation and culture no less than by common faith. It is distressing and humiliating to them that one of the most brutal and cynical powers should be allowed to crush one of the most virile and historic races of the East. The existence of an independent Persia is to the advantage of England who could easily save her by a more self-reliant and courageous policy. It is really surprising that a weak minister should be allowed to compromise the whole position of the British Empire in the East as well as to profoundly affect the peace and contentment of millions of Musallmans. Moral considerations which inspired the early history of the British Liberalism, have ceased to move even Liberal Statesmen. But even on the lowest calculations of expediency, the continued and independent existence of Persia should have been England's foremost concern.

The Source of Truth.

The Prouce is evidently well served by its foreign correspondents who manage to provide it with suitable facts for its own theories about most things, from the administration of Oriental countries to foreign aggression in the East. Its late correspondent at Constantinople has once more buckled on his armour and his quill-driving campaign is mercilessly going on. In a long letter covering four and a half columns, this denizen of the Palace of Truth tells us that "a hurried visit to Constantinople and a number of interviews with old friends of all parties has convinced me that the agitation in connection with the war has absolutely died out so far as the capital is concerned. From what I could gather in conversation with three of the present Cabinet, the actual loss of Tripoli does not affect them in the least. What they fear is that with the loss of the province there will be some loss of prestige. Otherwise the Ministry would gladly have accepted the first offer of the Italians and conceded the province in exchange for a pecuniary compensation."

We are not permitted to know who these "old friends of all parties" are, but the only ones who are mentioned at all in the article and whose opinions are related at great length and with evident zest are "one of the Ministers of the ex-Sultan, who is now a malikant political prisoner in the Prince's islands," and "an Arab lawyer who had just returned from Tripoli to which city he had been exiled some ten years ago." We shall deal with the ex-Minister's remarkable opinions later, but we are permitted to ask what light can be thrown by this gentleman on Turkish opinion, popular or official, considering that he is a "political prisoner in the Prince's islands," even if we allow that he is permitted to continue his subscriptions to a very considerable number of French, English, and German papers.

As for the Arab lawyer, we are told that "he was a bitter opponent of the Hamidian regime and equally bitter against the present Government." The writer adds that "in fact he was a man who seemed to have lived to be disillusioned of every hope that he had ever formed." In 1876 he had been elected a Deputy in Midhat Pasha's Parliament, and "he had been disillusioned with regard to that patriot." He then, joined the party of Reform, was arrested, tried and exiled to Tripoli. Then came the constitution and he was in hopes that at last his dearest wishes were about to be realized. He was again disillusioned. "Then came the Italian invasion of Tripoli, and he was assured by the Italian Consul General that all the privilege of the Arabs would be maintained." But, as the reader must not doubt by now have been prepared to hear, this great patriot was again disillusioned. What brought about the disillusionment this time? The atrocities. Not a bit, for "he assured me that he had personally seen none," though he attests the general truth of the statements published about them. Iron entered into his noble soul this time because the Arabs were made by the Italian authorities in Tripoli to surrender the Mauser rifles which the Turks had distributed among them for a sum of money below the market price! This was an outrage too much for the tranquility of a patriot who had offered the following advice to the Italian Consul-General "with whom he was on the most friendly terms," with results far from encouraging to such selfless patriotism. He is related to have said: "The rifles are worth 100 francs in the open market, offer that and give me a week to collect them and I will guarantee to get in three-fourths of the weapons recently distributed, or as alternative, enrol the Arabs as a local militia, and lead them against their hereditary foes, the Turks. Take them into Government employ, let them feel that you trust them, that you have come here to free them from the yoke of the Turk, and not to substitute your rule merely for your own benefit. The Consul promised to lay my remarks before the General. The following morning I was arrested and told to prepare for immediate deportation, and in forty-eight hours, I was on a steamer bound for Hindustan." We are sure, the Pioneer, would have recommended such a great patriot for a Khan Bahadurship if not a G. C. I. E.

Our Allahabad contemporary's own comments are a masterpiece of friendly sympathy, which was shown not so long ago to its disenchanted Young Turks from having a larger Navy. It writes with charming naivete that "in the circumstances," then, the pity of it seems to be that Turkey did not accept the situation from the outset and pocket the Italian indemnity while it was still on offer. The explanation our correspondent gives is simply that "they dreaded the loss of prestige, to which, we suppose, must be added the spice of obstinacy that is ingrained in the Turkish character, sometimes degenerating into mere perversity." Perhaps, the Secretary of the Moradabad District Muslim League would now write to welcome the Pioneer's criticism of the Turkish character, and, taking it into his confidence, communicate to it his appreciation for having been "a friend of the Mussalmans for a long time" and ask it to help the Turks by advice in shaping their future policy. Whatever the Pioneer may think of the Turks, we are inclined to quote its own pregnant words about Mussalmans that we should imagine that the Turks in particular "are very well able to take care of themselves."

This view is confirmed by the Pioneer itself, which is compelled to recognise "the finer side of Turkish obstinacy" in the exhibition of "a wonderful example of military virtues." It writes:—"After the fighting at the beginning of December when Giraldu's division moved forward against Ain Zara and dislodged the Turks with the loss of several guns, the Italians felt themselves able to announce that the oasis had been cleared and that the campaign on this side was practically at an end. Nevertheless, subsequent news shows that Colonels Fethy Bey and Nesbat are not disposed off but are still holding on and managing to give considerable trouble to their enormously superior opponents. No reinforcements or supplies can be reaching them, presumably they are in want of everything that troops can need, they have no hope of ultimate success, nowhere to go, and perhaps worst of all they are fighting for a cause for which their countrymen have ceased to care, and yet they still maintain the struggle. It is not the first time that the great qualities of the Turkish soldier have come out most finely just at the time when other troops would have thought themselves justified in laying down their arms. In past campaigns, however, the worst enemies of the Turks have usually been their own officers, whereas this time they would appear to be excellently led."

After the "first information" from Tripoli, which gave a glowing account of a most perfect military machine designed by Europe and of the ragged misery of Arabs and Turks, we learnt some facts which startled Europe and put fresh life into the East. Then came the orders of General Canova to the censor of the Press, and in the words of Hamlet, "the rest was silence." We learnt to regard no news as good news, and were somewhat upset when we heard of the clearing of the oasis by the Italians. But our dictum and the statements of the Italians were both belied before long and news came from all sides of Turkish attacks on Derna, Benghazi and Tripoli. At first the Turks were "repulsed with great loss." Then, on the analogy of London's Eggs which are marked "Very Fresh," "Fresh," and then plain blank "Eggs"—we heard merely of the Turks retreat "when the sun went down." But the greatest was behind, and now we hear—and from Rome too—of the Italians being forced to retreat, though the losses mentioned are so remarkably slight that we could believe them to be accurate only on the supposition that the Italians are anything but brave. It is something, however, to have such an admission from Italy. But, in the words of the Pioneer, what a pity that "Turkey did not accept the situation from the outset" and pocket the insult as well as the indemnity while both were still on offer. We suppose it is too late to revive the offer of the indemnity. But what of the insult? Is Italy unwilling to press that on the Turks and Arabs—or only unable? We pause for the Pioneer's reply.

The ex-Minister of Abdul Hamid who confided his opinions to the Pioneer's late Constantinople correspondent is—if he exists at all—a person worth cultivating. "He informed me," writes the Pioneer's correspondent, "that in his opinion, and in that of a number of even the most stalwart opponents of Hamidism, Constitutional Government was utterly unsuited for Turkey." This, we must grant, is not a very original remark. In fact it is too commonplace, and the speaker knew it well enough, for he appealed to the experience and sentiments of the writer. "You refuse it to Egypt and to India, availing that those countries are not sufficiently advanced from the educational point of view to be entrusted with Self-Government." Not satisfied with this tame acquiescence in the shibboleths of the West, he breaks new soil in the startling statement that "Constitutional Government is utterly unsuited to our religion. We are Monothelists and believe in the rule of one." We can vouch for it that not one out of the three hundred million Mussalmans of the world, excepting the ex-Minister of Abdul Hamid, ever suspected that monothelism in faith involved autocracy in secular politics.

After this rebellious originality nothing could shock us. The remarks about the Turkish Chamber are tame and trite. In his opinion it "does not in the least represent the people," and once more the analogy of England comes to his help and he likens it to "your own Parliament as at present constituted." Well, if Turkish representation is just as bad as British, we have not much to deplore after all. In fact we do not know which to blame most, the Turks or the British, Islam or the political creed of Britain, for the ex-Minister has as many "digs" at the English Radicals as at the Turks. Here is a sample—"I quite agree that under the forms of Constitutional Government considerable progress has been made, but these improvements would have been equally possible under the autocracy of the Sultan, had we not always been subjected to the pin-pricks of Europe and more especially of the English Radical party, who would see no good in the Sultan just as at present they are unable to see any evil in the present form of Government." Insinuations of all sorts are published and it is stated that Lacksheersh does pass still and that "it is paid by the Germans to the Salonica Committee in order that German influence may remain permanent on the Bosphorus. But our readers would perhaps form their own opinions about the Germans and the Salonica Committee after reading the unassuming remark of the ex-Minister that "in the days of Abdul Hamid there were a few men who absolutely refused to accept Lacksheersh. I was known as one of them."

If this immaculate ex-Minister is to be believed, Turkey and the Mussalmans of the world have no hope of salvation in this world at least. "As for constitutionalism being a farce, possibly it may be suited for some countries and for some religions, but in my opinion it is utterly unsuited for Turkey at the present time, and I think for all Muslims for all time." This is surely broad enough and clear enough, but the question is does such an ex-Minister exist? May he not be the writer's late ego, the projection of the ideas and opinions of the Pioneer's Constantinople correspondent himself? We wonder.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

CONSUL SMART was wounded in the thigh in the recent attack on Indian sowars by the Road Guards.

Reuter wired from Teheran—Consul Smart has been taken to Kazerun. The Foreign Minister has expressed the Government's regret at the affair to the British Minister and promised that exemplary punishment will be meted out to the assailants of the sowars. The Persian Government is very apprehensive that a British punitive expedition will be undertaken.

Reuter wired from St. Petersburg—The Narva foreshadows a provisional administration in Tabriz with a Russian Governor and Chief of the police, financial control in the hands of Russia, and exclusively Russian tribunals.

The cruiser Boy arrived at Bushire on the 30th December and landed 100 men of the Carnatic Infantry against possible contingencies.

Details of the incident in which Mr. Smart was wounded show that in the second attack the British casualties were five sowars killed and ten wounded, and fourteen horses killed and twelve wounded.

The troops had to fight a rearguard action for eight miles under a heavy fire from 700 tribesmen armed with the latest magazine rifles.

Mr. Smart fell from his horse unhurt.

It is announced in St. Petersburg that 5,000 Russian troops are in Tabriz and two battalions of Cossacks at Resht. Two other battalions are proceeding to Resht from Kasvin. Three warships of the Caspian Squadron are ensuring order at Erzer.

The British Foreign Office announces that the wound received by the Consul, Mr. Smart, in the recent fighting near Kazerun, was very slight.

Major Birdwood, with Mr. Smart and a hundred men, is at present at Kazerun. Colonel Douglas with 150 men, is at Dashtarjan, north east of Kazerun. The advance on Shiraz presents serious difficulties, but it is hoped that Major Birdwood and Colonel Douglas will shortly effect a junction.

Besides acting as escort to Consul Smart, the Indian sowars, at the time of the recent attack, were escorting stores and 500,000 kias of specie. Lieutenant D. Fraser has been placed in charge of the wounded.

A telegram to the Nor. Tribuna from Kermanshah states that Salard Dowleh, the ex-Shah's brother, defeated the Government troops under Aramed Dowleh. The latter took refuge in the British Consulate. At the request of the Russian Consul General in Resht, reinforcements have been sent from Kasvin, consisting of two rifle regiments and a mountain battery.

The following telegram has been addressed by His Highness the Aga Khan from Karachi to the Persian Red Crescent Society, 4, Medical College Street, Calcutta:—"Hope a similar society formed everywhere. Regularly subscribe Rs. 5,000—Aga Khan."

The Times's frontier correspondent reports that the Amir of Kabul recently held a dubai of selected officials at Jellalabad in which Turkish and Persian affairs were discussed in connection with the war in Tripoli and the movement of Russian troops into North-West Persia. Sardar Nasrullah Khan suggested that in view of the possible trouble in Dhorasan, the outposts on the Perso-Afghan frontier should be strengthened and urgent orders to this effect were sent to the Governor of Herat. There is no more news of importance from Southern Persia, and presumably the Central India Horse are starting time at Shiraz. Reports of a general tribal rising are discredited. The Indo-European telegraph line was in working order again on Monday.

Authentic despatches from Tabriz show that the reports of Russian excesses are wholly unfounded. It is equally untrue that the Ark has been destroyed. There have been no casualties among foreigners. It is supposed that the Russian losses number from 100 to 200, but the mortality among native non-combatants is not large.

The Russian occupation is now complete and all Fida's have disappeared. The banks and European houses are resuming business. There are now 4,000 troops at Tabriz.

The Times, referring to the official British denial of the Russian massacre at Tabriz, and the Russian statement that those responsible for the onslaught were not Persians but Agmenian and other criminals, says it is not wonderful that Russians should refuse to treat such adversaries, many of whom are Russian subjects, as ordinary belligerents. The disarmament of the Fida's would be justified in self-defence and the destruction of places of resistance may also be justified if carried out without unnecessary harshness.

The Times, publishing a letter from an Englishman who was lately in Persia, opposing the appointment of Mr. Mornard as successor to Mr. Shuster on the ground of his identification with the anti-Shuster movement, says that the latter deserves consideration. The aim of England and Russia ought to be to discover a foreigner equally acceptable to both, and not unacceptable to Persians.

The execution of Sikaut Ul Islam, who was a high ecclesiastic, has perturbed the Persian Cabinet, which is apprehensive of the effect on the people.

The executions of Sikaut Ul Islam and other ecclesiastics at Tabriz are particularly resented because the Russians selected for the carrying out of the executions the most solemn Persian holy day.

News has been received at Allahabad that Consul Smart, with his escort of Central India Horse, left Kazerun on the 2nd instant, and joined Colonel Douglas party without incident. The tribesmen seem to have disappeared for the time being, and Colonel Douglas is now escorting Mr. Smart to Shiraz.

The Pioneer's correspondent at Bushire wired as follows:—

A message has been received from Consul Smart in which he states that at the time of his falling into the enemy's hands he had left the convoy, and the Central India Horse escort were not in the faintest degree to blame. They behaved with the utmost gallantry and steadiness throughout.

Lord Lamington, speaking at Edinburgh on the 4th, discussed the present situation in Persia and declared that our interests were not inimical to those of Russia but that it would be criminal to blind our eyes to facts. Persia, said his Lordship, had not had a chance. Mr. Shuster had been accused of lack of tact. Upon this the invasion of the country was based. He believed there was a strong party in Russia opposed to the territorial aggrandisement of that country.

Lord Lamington said it would be to the interests of Russia as well as of Great Britain to maintain Persia as a Buffer State unless Russia were really intending to go to the Persian Gulf.

Lord Lamington concluded: Great Britain must exert herself to keep Persia a free Power for the sake of the safety of India.

TEHRAN, December 7.

REFERRING to the Russian semi-official communiqué regarding his management of finance, Mr. Shuster has made the following statement:—

On June 13 I assumed charge of the Treasury and the Revenues, finding banking deficits amounting to £100,000 and not a penny in cash belonging to the Government. There was an unknown sum outstanding in cheques, drafts on the Treasury, promises to pay, etc., issued by previous Ministers of Finance. Since then in spite of the civil war, which consumed for extraordinary direct expenses alone over £300,000, in spite of the attendant disorders throughout the Empire, causing diminution of the revenues, I have paid the banking deficits of £100,000, furnished the expenses of running the Government, met promptly all foreign obligations accruing, and now have in the Treasury liquid assets to the amount of £160,000. The only extraordinary receipts were the net proceeds of the Imperial Bank loan, which, after liquidating the converted debt and other advances, amounted to less than £400,000. The ordinary expenses of the Government, therefore, have been met during a specially trying period entirely from internal resources and the balance of £100,000 accumulated, given a fair chance, would, I pledge my reputation, place Persia's finances on a solid basis within two years.

Odessa, December 8.

The very grave development of the situation in Persia momentarily forms the all-absorbing topic of political discussion in the Russian Press, both metropolitan and provincial, and it is abundantly evident judging from the consensus of their commentaries and forecasts, that all these organs have interpreted the recent public statements of Sir Edward Grey as a tacit approval and justification of Russia's aggressive action in Persia. It is not, of course, quite a correct or legitimate inference to draw from the British Foreign Minister's carefully and discreetly worded utterances; but it is agreeable to the Russian Press to regard Sir Edward's obiter dicta in that light. The chief argument urged in defence of Russia's high-handed procedure is that it is utterly and absolutely hopeless, in the increasingly chaotic and anarchic state of affairs in Persia, to look for an early establishment of a strong and durable Government at Teheran, and that it is in the vital interests of Persia's own national salvation that Russia and England, the jointly responsible protecting Powers, should actively intervene.

Such leading journals as the Novoye Vremya, the Russia, and the Russkoye Slovo still maintain that Russia has no ulterior designs on the geographical integrity and political independence of Persia, assurances which may be taken for what they are worth, but the South Russian Press is less discreet and more honestly frank in its unreservedly expressed belief that this country's annexation of Northern Persia—or, at all events, of the Persian province of Azerbaijan—is an inevitable event of the very near future. Many of these political articles in the southern journals appear under such headings as "Delenda est Persia!" "The End of Persia!" "The Russian Incorporation of Northern Persia!" etc.

During the last few days these same organs have shown a similar candour in declaring, without any kind of reserve, that in certain and extremely probable eventualities, Russia will lend her moral and material support to the restoration of Mohammed Ali Shah, not with any preconceived idea of subverting the constitutional régime, but as the only means of setting up a really stable Government at Teheran. If that should indeed be Russia's intention, then the only possible result will be an indefinite prolongation of the internal chaos and civil strife which now obtain throughout the dominions of the youthful occupant of the Peacock Throne. The Bakhtiari tribes, it is certain, would never tolerate the rehabilitation of Mohammed Ali Shah. And here arises the moot question whether the eventual re-establishment of peace, order, and security under a stable régime at Teheran, which would leave Russia no valid reason or excuse for prolonging her military occupation of Persian territories, is a consummation very devoutly desired on the banks of the Neva. It is not in still and placid, but in troubled waters that Russia's "expansive" policy angles to the greater advantage.

The Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907 in respect of Persia has, it is true, to a certain extent hitherto acted as a brake upon Russia's aggressive policy, but it has in the result committed England to grave responsibilities which our Foreign Office certainly do not foresee at the time of its ratification—or, more bluntly stated, it has involved England not only in a diplomatically delicate but in an altogether false position in the eyes of the Persian people and of Europe.

A military officer just arrived from Baku and Tiflis informs me that the total number of Russian troops now in Persia is 10,800. A Tiflis telegram of yesterday's date says that a further force of 4,000 is being mobilised in the Caucasus for despatch to Persia in case of need.

St Petersburg, December 9th

The Novoye Vremya, in an article headed in English "A Criminal Conversation," says—"Lord Curzon is one of the last of the old school whose foreign policy is based on distrust of Russia. Russophobia in Persia is largely due to Lord Curzon, who has constantly held out to the Persians the hope of British support. Should the independence of Persia be threatened, it will be simply owing to the multifarious exhortations to resist the just demands of Russia. Lord Curzon's language is that of a petty demagogue, and all Great Britain's prestige and power would be unavailing if Russia decided to occupy Teheran. The only effect of such utterances is to excite the national amour propre of both Russia and Great Britain with no good results to Russia, Great Britain or Persia."

The Novoye Vremya welcomes the fact that Lord Curzon's sentiments have found no echo from the Government, adding that responsible British statesmen recognize that Russia has no aggressive intentions.

St Petersburg, December 13.

In an article on Russia's policy with regard to Persia the semi-official Rossiya to-day says:—

Russia has no intention whatever of forcing the ex-Shah on Persia, and will leave him to his own resources. She will refuse recognition to him unless a special agreement should be concluded between her and Great Britain on the subject. The Russian troops which are now being concentrated at Kazvin will not advance until after a lapse of eight days unless extraordinary events should force the Russian Minister to order them to proceed to Teheran earlier. . . . Russian policy in Persia must continue to be based upon full agreement and co-operation with Great Britain on the lines and principles of the Anglo-Russian understanding of 1907. Only the maintenance of this understanding will render possible the peaceful and regular development of Persia so important for the economic and political interests of the two neighbouring States, as well as for the establishment of permanent order in Persia itself. (Reuter.)

Teheran, December 10th.

In the meantime the internal agitation increases. The bazaars are still shut. The clergy of Nedjef have telegraphed that Persia must defend herself. The mere circulation of rumours yesterday that the Cabinet had agreed to dismiss Mr. Shuster, obtaining in exchange the withdrawal of the Russian troops and the appointment of another American with the same powers, was enough to fill the great mosque in the bazaar with an excited meeting, which protested against such an arrangement. It is considered probable that whatever form of government Russia and Great Britain agree to establish here the Mejliss will not find a place in it. Russia regards the existence of the Mejliss as incompatible with her interests, and Lord Morley's criticism of the Constitution is regarded as showing that Great Britain is disposed to agree.

It is reported that 4,000 Turkish troops have entered Salmas and that Turkey intends occupying the Urumiah district until the Russian troops are withdrawn. There is no official confirmation of this though the report is not inherently improbable.

Teheran, December 12.

It is possible that a serious Russo-Turkish situation may arise. There exists strong reason to believe that a mobilization of the Turkish Army in Asia Minor is actually taking place. Five battalions, though not in Salmas, are on the frontier, with that place as their destination.

Russia recently founded a Consulate at Khoi and announced that she was sending there 200 troops as a Consular guard. It is now officially admitted that there are 300 Russian troops and ten guns at Khoi, and more troops have been ordered to Kushlu and Lake Urumiah.

In Turkish circles it is held that the occupation of Khoi by Russia turns the Turkish western flank, and Turkey's acquiescence is impossible. It is declared that the position in Asia Minor is more important than in Tripoli, Albania, or Macedonia, and that it is vital to Turkey to maintain her proper home. It is believed, however, that Turkey desires to proceed by negotiation with Russia.

There has been a marked change in Turkish policy here. A new Ambassador has been hastily appointed and is expected to arrive without delay. There are signs also of a desire to effect a rapprochement with Great Britain on Persian questions.

Teheran, December 14.

A GRAVE situation exists at Shiraz, where the Chief Mollah, Mirza Ibrahim, has roused all the fanaticism of the people against the British. The shopkeepers, under the orders of the clergy, absolutely refuse to sell the smallest article to the British Indian troops. Mirza Ibrahim has also declared Imperial bank notes unclean. These are prevented for payment at the rate of 15,000 tomans daily, which embarrasses the bank as a large caravan of specie is delayed on the roads. Ordinarily influential circles here are endeavouring to arrest the anti-British boycott, urging that although the British Government is acting with Russia, it is undesirable to alienate sympathetic British public opinion. The local public feeling, however, is entirely out of hand, as all the clergy everywhere are calling for resistance to Russia and are inciting a holy war. The Cabinet refuses to resign, although it has lost the confidence of the Mejliss. It still urges concessions to Russia, but is not likely long to withstand the torrent of public opinion.

The bazaars remain obstinately shut. The month of Muharrem, a period of national mourning, now rapidly approaching, when the bazaars are ordinarily closed and when fanaticism is at its height, appears likely to see repeated the history of the famous Syed Ruete and tobacco concessions, when the Persian populace obstinately withstood all pressure and conducted a campaign of passive resistance.

The revival of the Anglo-Russian railway proposals adds fuel to the fire. It is difficult to see how Russia can obtain other than a Pyrrhic victory against a frenzied population in this stubborn flame of mind.

M. Poklevsky has informed the Cabinet that the Russian troops will remain for some days at Kazvin if there are no disorders in the capital and there is no anti-Russian agitation. If all the terms of the ultimatum are agreed to, the troops will be withdrawn provided also that the same conditions concerning disorder and agitation are fulfilled. Up to the present no Russian subjects have been molested in any way.

The death is announced of the Mollah Kazim Khorassani of Nedjef, the head of the Shiite religion, when on the eve of leaving for Persia to preach a holy war. The event has produced a great impression. He throughout sided with the Constitution, was responsible for the ex-communication of the ex-Shah, and largely inspired the tenacious resistance after the bombardment of the Mejlis.

Moslem Feeling.

A largely attended meeting of the Muhammadans of Allahabad was held on Monday, the 25th December, 1911, at 4.30 P.M. The following resolutions were moved, seconded and passed:—

(1) That this meeting of the Muhammadans of Allahabad look with great abhorrence and regret on the high handed action of Russia in undermining the independence and integrity of Persia in spite of the solemn words of the Anglo-Russian Convention and earnestly hopes and prays that the British Government which is the greatest Muhammadan power in the world will use its good offices to safeguard the sovereign rights of Persia.

(2) That this meeting sincerely sympathises with their co-religionists in Persia and thoroughly approves of their patriotic resolve to maintain the integrity of their country and prays the Almighty to help them in their struggle.

(3) That this meeting is sincerely grateful to Earl Curzon, Lord Lamington, Professor Browne and the London Persian Committee for raising their voice in defence of Persia and her sovereign rights.

(4) That copies of resolutions passed at this meeting should be sent to the Viceroy, the Foreign Minister, Earl Curzon, Lord Lamington, Professor Browne, the London Persian Committee and the Persian Consul in India.

At a public meeting of Muhammedans held on the evening of the 4th instant, at Badshahi Mosque under the presidency of Haji Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Kazilbash the following resolution was passed:—This meeting of the Muhammedans of Lahore and its environs emphatically protests against the unwarranted aggression of Russia in Northern Persia and while regretting the unfortunate incident connected with the assault on Consul Smart and his Indian escort and in view of the vital British and Indian interests respectfully urges the Imperial Government to maintain the traditional policy of upholding the integrity and independence of Persia by preventing Russian usurpation of any portion of the Persian territory.

Appeal by the Persia Committee.

THE following appeal is being circulated by the Persia Committee:—

SIR,—The fate of Persia hangs in the balance. It will be decided in the course of the next few days or weeks. The issue is: Shall Persia remain an independent kingdom or shall she fall into the plight of Bokhara and Khiva?

In this supreme crisis of the fortunes of their nation the Persian people, through their Parliament, have appealed to the friendship of this country. They remind us of our long traditions of liberty; of our spirit of justice and national honour. They ask us to make use of "the friendship which we have acquired in the family of nations" in order to secure for them the maintenance of their own liberties. We venture to commend this appeal to our countrymen.

Our national obligations are clear and definite. In the year 1834 we agreed in concert with the Government of Russia to maintain the integrity and independence of Persia. This engagement was formally renewed in the years 1838, 1873, and 1888, Lord Salisbury in the latter year giving an assurance to the effect that "the engagements between Great Britain and Russia to respect and promote the integrity and independence of the Persian Kingdom have again been renewed and confirmed."

The Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907 concerning Persia embodied this engagement in its preamble, and it was supplemented by a Declaration made to the Persian Government in September, 1907, by the British Minister at Teheran on behalf of both Great Britain and Russia from which we extract the following expressions:—

"Neither of the two Powers seeks anything from Persia, so that Persia can concentrate all her energies on the settlement of her internal affairs. This Convention between the two European Powers which have the greatest interests in Persia, based as it is on a guarantee of her independence and integrity, can only serve to further and promote Persian interests, for henceforth Persia, aided and assisted by these two powerful neighbouring States, can employ all her powers in internal reforms. The object of the two Powers—Russia and England—in making this Agreement is not in any way to attack, but rather to assure for ever the independence of Persia. Not only do they not wish to have at hand any excuse for intervention, but their object in these friendly negotiations was not to allow one another to intervene on the pretext of safeguarding their own interests."

Nothing could be more precise.

Persia was at that time in the throes of internal disturbance. The profligate extravagance of the Shahs had involved her in foreign loans and the vices of their Government had deprived her sons of all opportunities for taking part in the conduct of public affairs. A Constitution was wrung from the Shah; but it was quickly suppressed by his successor, Mohamed Ali. The leaders of the new movement fled for their lives. Then came the national uprising. One army marched from the North, the other from the South, and the combined forces entered the Capital, restored the Constitution and deposed Mohamed Ali. The Parliament was summoned and the leaders set about the task of reorganizing the administrative departments. They frankly recognized that they did not possess within their own ranks men of sufficient experience to carry this task through. So they applied to Europe for foreign experts. Difficulties were placed in their way by Russian diplomacy without any effective help from England. More than one Great Power refused to assist them. They then had recourse to the United States, who sent them Mr. Morgan Shuster and a numerous staff of assistants for employment in the Ministry of Finance. Mr. Shuster set about his task with exemplary diligence and no Persian was sufficiently rich or powerful to evade payment of his legal taxes into the Treasury. A new era appeared to be dawning for Persia and the great project of a railway from North to South was brought to the stage of submission in detail to the Parliament.

But in the meanwhile Mohamed Ali had left his exile in the Crimea and, with the acquiescence of Russian officials, had crossed Russian territory and set foot upon Persian soil. All the resources of the reformed Government were required to resist his advance and the trade routes, especially of the South, were left at the mercy of bands of robbers. His signal defeat left the Government free to deal with these disorders. Then came the Shuster incident. Russia demanded the withdrawal of the Treasury Gendarmes from the property of a Persian Prince which had been confiscated. An ultimatum was issued by Russia and, when the Persian Government had complied with its terms, a second ultimatum was presented with fresh demands on the ground of delay in complying with the first. This second ultimatum requires the instant dismissal of Mr. Shuster and demands the right of veto by Russia over all future appointments of foreign experts. Such a demand is plainly incompatible with the maintenance of Persian independence.

As our Government have acquiesced in these demands, which were communicated to them before they were made, we are face to face with a most serious situation. Our national honour is involved and so are our national interests. Are we to leave our friends, our neighbours in India, to their fate? Are we to look on with indifference while their first efforts after national regeneration are being ruthlessly suppressed? In this case surely our national duty is not divorced from our national interest, for there are many reasons why the principle of the integrity and independence of Persia must, in Lord Curzon's words, be registered as a cardinal precept of our Imperial creed.

In the first place, the loss by Persia of her independence would produce the most painful effect upon millions of our Mussalman fellow-subjects. Indignant protests are already reaching us from all parts of India, where we are told that we are digging the grave of Mussalman loyalty. Mussalman feeling in Egypt and Turkey is rising up against us and, if the continuance of our Entente with Russia is to be purchased with the loss of Mussalman sympathies, the price will be a dear one indeed. Nor are these the only or even the most important consequences. Persia is to be deprived of the elementary rights of sovereignty, the way is paved either for her complete absorption by Russia or for a partition between Russia and Great Britain. Under the first alternative Russia penetrates to the shores of the Persian Gulf, under the second we lose the advantages of our insular position and become responsible for the defence of hundreds of miles of land frontier drawn across the open plains of Persia. Both alternatives bring us in sight of enormous additional expenditure.

We invite all those who are not insensible to these great issues to assist us in making good our national pledges.

Yours respectfully,

LAMINGTON, President.

H. F. B. LYNCH, Chairman.

E. G. BROWNE, Vice-Chairman.

F. WHFLEN, Honorary Secretary.

THE PERSIA COMMITTEE, HOUSE OF COMMONS, 12th December.

Debate in the Commons.

December 14.

THE debate on Sir E. Grey's motion "That the foreign policy of his Majesty's Government be now considered" was resumed.

Lord C. Beresford in the course of his speech said that there was a danger ahead. It would be a very serious thing for this country if during the wars or rumours of wars which were going on, the great Muhammadan faith should think we had deserted their people, or did not respect or sympathize with them in the troubles and trials they were undergoing. He hoped that the right honourable gentleman would make it clear that, though we might not be in a position to interfere, our sympathy with these great nations and that faith was not being ruined. If once the Muhammadans were allowed to think that, it was impossible to say what would happen to our Empire. Great Britain was the largest Muhammadan Power in the world to-day, and if anything in the nature of unrest or doubt arose thousands of additional soldiers would have to be sent to India and Egypt as a point of military expedience. To do that would at once put into the minds of the Muhammadans the idea that we were sending these men to overrule them and to keep them in order. The handling of the question, indeed, needed great tact, and he believed that there was no harm in mentioning the fact.

Mr. A. Herbert (Somerset, S., Opp.) said he had had the advantage of being wrecked in the Persian Gulf and of recovering from typhoid on the pearl islands of the Persian Gulf. In that quarter we had made the high seas safe and set up a standard of positive justice, but there were one or two things we had not yet done. We had never made our position clear in the Persian Gulf. Especially in regard to two islands our position had always been indefinite. These islands were claimed by the Porte as an integral part of the Turkish dominions, while the Government at Teheran declared they belonged to Persia. Great Britain in past history had incurred considerable responsibility there. The people were poor, and all they wanted was to be quiet and unoppressed, there were no politics. It might seem a matter of small importance, but as a little thorn may make a great wound, the fewer causes of friction between England and the Porte the better for commercial and Imperial policy. As he regretted the underision of our policy in the Persian Gulf, so he found it difficult to give his sympathy to the policy pursued at Constantinople. In 1908 Turkey made her own revolution, a revolution all men desired and no man dared to prophesy. It was a great feat, but he was not quite sure that the full significance was understood in this country. Great forces were opposed to the revolution, but suddenly, good-by to the Arabian Nights, and there were county councils, rather cumbersome in their constitutions but upon modern lines and ready to accommodate themselves to modern conditions. We did not realize how the Middle Ages were in collision with the 20th century. Some friends of his in Constantinople at the time of the revolution noted one of the processions in the streets headed by a Bactrian camel and ending with a taxi-cab, a symbol of what was passing. (Hear, hear.) The reform in Turkey was welcomed by England as it deserved to be, but very soon afterwards Turkey was punished by having two great provinces taken from her. From that time—he was not exaggerating when he said it—the attitude of this country had been, if not unsympathetic, stolidly indifferent such was the opinion of Englishmen resident in Turkey. It was inevitable that the Young Turks should make mistakes when they came into power, you cannot create a Constitution in a day and adhere to it. It would be asking too much from uneducated patriots that they should go on creating miracles after their bloodless revolution against ancient tyranny; they made mistakes, they were not experts in constitutional and diplomatic usage. From the beginning the Turkish Constitution was a great experiment and deserved more sympathy than it got from a Liberal Government, looking at it from the point of view of British interests. Everything was in a state of flux, and while nothing was certain we could not, with our vast and complicated interests, take either side definitely. But though it might be foolish to rush into unwise friendship, it might be wrong to rush into precipitate cordiality, it was even more wrong and more disastrous to assume an attitude of unwise, cold unkindness. (Hear, hear.) There was during the time of the ex-Sultan an acute dislike in this country towards his Government which the ex-Sultan reciprocated; the old Government thwarted our interests, the new Government came into life with them. It was worth our while to be on terms of friendship with Turkey, and had the Constitution failed our interests would not have been injured. Passing through the streets of Constantinople shortly after the revolution he was attracted by a crowd in the centre of which was a man selling buttons which he loudly proclaimed were British. There was great cheering for Great Britain stood high in the sentiments of the Turkish people who bought his entire stock-in-trade. That was not the kind of spirit that animated a Mussulman crowd to-day. (Hear, hear.) But that spirit might be revived when the opportunity came, and it had not come yet.

As to the war in which Turkey was engaged he repeated what had been said that it would be a disaster, a calamity hardly to be contemplated, if we were to lose our traditional friendship with Italy. The situation was fraught with the deepest anxiety. The war might lead to disastrous consequences in the Balkan Peninsula and elsewhere, and any day might be the cause of the deaths of the poor Italian people in the Turkish Empire. It was to the credit of the Turkish people that up to now no Italian civil subject had been touched. (Hear, hear.) There were possibilities so horrible they were hardly to be thought of, but two things were certain, that

Italy would not retire from Tripoli, and that Turkey, however much she might desire it, could not face the humiliation of submission. The Turkish Government had to consider the feelings of Arab subjects in other parts of their Empire, and peace at this moment would mean half a dozen wars for Turkey. No one could say there was, just now, the possibility of peace, but the possibility would, he believed, occur before very long. There would be a chance for peace if Turkey could retire from Tripoli with honour. To retire with honour Turkey must have gained something. If Europe would consent to grant Turkey what every other civilized Power had got—namely, the right to manipulate and arrange her own tariff—then Turkey would not have struggled entirely in vain throughout this war. (General cheers.) Turkey's position was, he thought, absolutely different from that of every other Great Power except China. She could not alter her tariff on goods without the consent of Europe. A certain amount of her tariff revenue was hypothecated to certain questions, and naturally those amounts could not be touched. But if our Foreign Secretary would act as the champion of peace, his advocacy would have great weight with some friendly Powers in Europe, and it was widely believed that they were not entirely adverse, perhaps from other motives, from such a policy. (Cheers.) He would appeal for a very cordial consideration of the whole Turkish question by his Majesty's Government, not only from motives of generosity and chivalry, but because King George V. rules over millions of Mussulman subjects, whose spiritual allegiance turned towards the Sultan of Turkey and the cordiality of our relations with Turkey must always be a matter of extreme importance to those millions of Mussulman subjects. (Cheers.)

Mr. Hugh Law (Donegal, W., Nat.) said the extremely brilliant speech to which they had just listened would, he felt sure, mark the beginning of a great reputation and a great career in Parliament. (Cheers.) The hon. member for South Somerset had already done great public service in calling attention to a corner of Europe which in recent years had become somewhat obscured and forgotten. It was true our King ruled over many millions of Mussulman subjects, and in that sense Great Britain was a great Muhammadan Power. But he trusted it would not be forgotten we were also a great Christian country with very special duties towards the Christians within the Turkish Empire. (Ministerial cheers.) Ever since the revolution in Turkey of July, 1908, the House of Commons had no official information as to how the new régime in Turkey was working out in practice, and whether the promised reforms had been put into operation. (Hear, hear.) But there were many signs that all was not well in European Turkey. The Young Turk régime had many virtues, but its very narrow patriotism became an essential vice. It was trying to suppress what evidence there were of separate races and separate religions. In Macedonia, as shown by the Correspondents of the Times, there existed a very serious state of things indeed, which was exceedingly perilous to the peace of Europe. Although the Constitution promised non-Mussulman subjects equal political privileges, it was made exceedingly difficult for Christians to make any use at all of their political rights. (Hear, hear.) Organized bands were going about pretending to search for arms, and pillaging, torturing, and murdering. They had a right to be informed officially of the true state of affairs in regard to matters which involved issues of enormous importance, which might lead to a great European war, and in regard to which we had very solemn treaty obligations. He pressed particularly for the publication of the consular reports with regard to Macedonia and Albania which the Foreign Secretary had withheld.

Mr. Crawshaw-Williams (Leicester, Min.) said he would, like to congratulate an old school fellow the hon. member for South Somerset, on the impression created by his maiden speech. He and the hon. member had made their maiden speeches at the Oxford Union on the same day and he was pleased to see him in a nobler Assembly. He had travelled in Russia and had a great affection for the Russian people, but no affection for a people, or a country was sufficient reason for not speaking of matters of vital importance. Our sympathies and our honour were concerned in regard to the existence of Persia as a nation. The British Minister at Teheran in a supplementary declaration in 1907 had used the words, "The object of the two Powers in making this agreement is not in any way to attack but rather to assure for ever the independence of Persia. Not only do they not wish to have at hand any excuse for intervention, but their object in these friendly negotiations was not to allow one or other to intervene on the pretext of safeguarding their own interests." (Cheers.)

MR. MORRIS (Burnley, Min.): I shall be very happy to produce the original document if anybody likes to see it.

Mr. Crawshaw-Williams said it was almost vital to our interests to see that Persia maintained a strong vigorous independence. If Persia did not the only courses open were absorption or partition. Absorption was inconceivable and partition would mean that sooner or later we should have a land frontier coterminous with that of Russia. That would be almost a calamity, for it would affect not only the actual frontier of territory, but also sentiment. Any infringement of the Persian nationality would be most keenly felt.

by Mahomedans throughout the world. There was one other element which entered into this question. He did not think anybody could deny that, were any partition of Persia to take place, Germany would not be able to stand by and see it occur without a protest of some kind. If any step were taken to infringe the independence and integrity of Persia and to advance either our interests or those of Russia, Germany would, he thought, consider herself involved, and he could not say what the ultimate consequences would be to European policy. The situation they were discussing was not only delicate but very obscure, and, in his opinion, the object of the debate very largely was to elicit information as to the actual position in Persia and the position we had taken up in regard to the relations between Russia and Persia. Another purpose which he hoped the debate would serve would be to ask his Majesty's Government to stand firmly by two principles—first, the independence and integrity of Persia; and, secondly, that Constitutional government in Persia should be given a fair chance. (Hear, hear.) One of the declared objects of the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907 was to help forward the independence and Constitutional position of Persia, and they must see to it that both the letter and the spirit of the Convention were strictly and properly observed. Those who had taken part in the debate were not moved in any way by animosity towards the Government or their policy, and he thought they might hope that they would rather strengthen than encumber the hands of the Government by showing that here there was a real feeling that both our honour and our interests demanded that the independence and integrity of Persia should be strictly and fully maintained.

Tied with Red Tape

Morning Leader.

Suggested by some recent attempts to secure a discussion in the House of Commons on foreign policy.

Sir E. Grey's Speech.

SIR E. GREY: I must ask for the indulgence of the House, not because I am going to make a maiden speech but because I have already exhausted my right to speak in this debate. I have been appealed to very often to give information on certain points and a promise has been made that some information shall be given about Persia. I will ask the House first of all in discussing the Persian question to bear in mind that there is much more than the Persian question. It is quite possible if the Persian question is mismanaged or rashly handled by those who are concerned with it, either by the Russian Government or by ourselves, that the Persian question will disappear and larger issues of policy will obscure it altogether. That is the first thing to be thought of, and at that point of view is borne in mind the Anglo-Russian Agreement will be put in its proper light. It is being used in debate sometimes now for purposes for which it was never intended. (Hear, hear.) The Anglo-Russian Agreement was, in the first place, an expression of a change of policy. It used to be supposed that the policy of this country and the policy of Russia were opposed to each other, that we opposed the extension of Russian influence or interests everywhere, with the result that Russian and British diplomacy was in opposition everywhere, and the question was constantly recurring between the two countries as to whether their diplomatic opposition might not some day become something more serious.

We wanted to get rid of that, and to substitute for that attitude of mind the attitude of mind that if relations of confidence and friendship were established between the two countries it would be to the mutual advantage of each of them, and enable them to overcome those occasions of friction between them which, neighbours as they are in Asia, were bound otherwise from time to time to arise. That is how the Anglo-Russian Agreement came into existence. It was never intended by the Anglo-Russian Agreement to destroy or diminish Russian influence in any part of Asia where it had already been obtained. The object of the Anglo-Russian Agreement was not to thrust Russia back, and, of course, not to deprive ourselves of any influence we had at the time in Asia, but to make sure that whatever influence either of us possessed in Asia should never be used to disturb the frontiers of the other country. Russian influence when the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made was already predominant in the north of Persia. The Anglo-Russian Agreement was not intended, and, if it had been intended, would have been absolutely useless to destroy that influence which already existed. It was intended to secure that Russian influence in the north of Persia should not be used, as it might have been used, to push railways, concessions, or in any way to disturb our interests. In the same way we, by the Anglo-Russian Agreement, intended to guarantee to the Russian Government that we would not assume a frontier policy in Asia which would be adverse to their frontier interests. We made a declaration of policy after the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made, the object of which was to assure Persia that it was not the intention of the Anglo-Russian Agreement to threaten Persian independence or to embark on any policy which would partition Persia. We made that declaration to Persia because previously there was some reason to suppose that the prevailing feeling in Persia was that its independence and integrity depended upon playing off one Power against another. It was entirely a false idea, because the rivalry of the two Powers was the most dangerous thing for Persia, and it had the further disadvantage of being disagreeable to each Power. (Hear, hear.) Certainly by the Anglo-Russian Agreement we did not intend to impair the integrity of Persia. It was no part of the intention to do that, and we made that declaration to the Persian Government. But that is not the declaration which has been quoted in this House. The declaration quoted by my hon. friend seemed to me to be a quotation from something I have never seen. It seemed to imply that we had stated that by the Anglo-Russian Agreement we had undertaken the responsibility of protecting the independence and integrity of Persia. That is not what we said officially to the Persian Government. (Hear, hear.) That will be found from the Blue-book published officially to the House. We said that the two Governments in signing the Agreement had studiously kept the fundamental principle in view that the independence and integrity of Persia should be respected absolutely.

MR. PONSONBY.—The document quoted by my hon. friend just now was a communiqué sent by the British Minister at Teheran to the Persian Minister of Foreign Affairs. I have here a letter from the Persian Minister of Foreign Affairs giving a copy in Persian of the document, and stating that the translation in question is perfectly accurate.

SIR E. GREY.—My hon. friend must supply me with that document. I sent very explicit instructions as to the official communication to be made to the Persian Government, and the communication has been published. If my hon. friend will supply me with a copy of the document he has quoted I will make enquiries as to exactly what it is. I did not intend the Anglo-Russian Agreement to be any extension of our responsibility. (Hear, hear.) It did not mean that we were substituting the Caucasus for the Indian frontier. I would not have committed myself to that enormous extension of responsibility which, I think, would have been disastrous. The object of the agreement was not to interfere with Persian independence, and the hopes founded upon it were that it would remove the danger to that independence by removing the rivalry between Great Britain and Russia. What has been the course of events since? The Shah's Government in Persia went from bad to worse, and a state of chaos arose. There were risings against the Shah's Government, trade was blocked in the north, and some years ago Russia sent troops to Tabriz to protect their trade interests and to protect Russian interests against disorder. It is admitted by anybody who followed the particular sending of Russian troops into Persia at that time that they did not send them to interfere with the internal politics of Persia. As a matter of fact, although it was not intended, the incidental effect of sending the Russian troops was that the Nationalist cause at Tabriz, which was at that moment in very sore straits, was relieved. But the Russians did not send their troops to interfere in the Nationalist cause. Upon that followed a little time afterwards the deposition and expulsion of the Shah. Again, the Russians did not interfere in the internal affairs of Persia. The Shah had been, or was supposed to be, governing in their interest. They had their Russian officers at Teheran in the employment of the Persian Government, which had been before the Anglo-Russian Agreement and continued since. If they had interfered or lifted a finger and used their influence at Teheran, the Shah would never have been expelled. They did not, and they let the Shah be expelled.

They played perfectly fair with the Anglo-Russian Agreement in all that, and certainly, looking back to these days when there was every incentive for Russia to interfere, I am quite convinced that but for the Agreement there would have been much more interference than there was. (Cheers.) The effect of the Anglo-Russian Agreement was not to stimulate interference, but to discourage and restrain it. (Hear, hear.) Since the expulsion of the Shah matters have been exceedingly difficult, and often very unsatisfactory. Lord Morley, speaking in another place the other day, spoke of the difficulties of the Constitutional Government in Persia and the comparative want of success that had attended it. There have been times, no doubt, when the Nationalists made things exceedingly difficult for the Persian Government—sometimes almost impossible—and more and more in recent years there has been a sort of chaos in Persia. Undoubtedly after the time the Shah was expelled there has been constant friction with Russia, which has culminated in the present crisis. I am not in a position, and I do not think it is necessary for me, to go into the merits of all the particular disputes which have arisen between Russia and the Persian Government. We cannot investigate all of them. So long as British interests are not concerned in them, it is almost impossible, and if it were possible, I do not know that it would be wise for us, to attempt to pass an opinion upon their merits.

What we are concerned with now is the present crisis in Persia and the three demands which Russia has actually put forward to the Persian Government in an ultimatum, and what our own provision should be in respect of them. I will take the demands one by one. The first demand of the Russian Government is that Mr. Shuster, the Financial Adviser to the Persian Government, should be withdrawn. We have said the we cannot object to that demand, and I will explain why. A short time ago, to take only a most recent instance, I received news by telegram that Mr. Shuster had appointed three British officials in Persia as Treasury officials in important places. One was at Shiraz, one at Ispahan, and one was at Tabriz. Shiraz, of course, is outside the Russian sphere, and there could be no objection to that. Ispahan is just inside the Russian sphere, and I did not think the appointment of an official there would be acceptable to the Russian Government. But Tabriz is close up to the Russian frontier, and as soon as I heard of that and before the Russian Government had said a word about it, and for all I know before they even knew of it I telegraphed to our Minister at Teheran, and pointed out to him that this sort of thing would not do, that it was absolutely contrary to the spirit of the Anglo-Russian Agreement. It was absolutely certain that Russia would object to the appointment of British officials at Tabriz, as we ourselves would have objected to the appointment of a Russian official in a corresponding position. I thought it would not do, and I sent this telegram on 6th November to our Minister at failed, I, of course, have been absolutely powerless to support Mr. Shuster's action. Had I supported him, I should have been supporting him in the appointment of British officials in the Russian sphere, and I should, at any rate have been breaking the spirit of the Anglo-Russian Agreement.

The second Russian demand is that the Persian Government should, in its appointment of foreign advisers, consult the British and Russian Legations. These demands are put forward on the responsibility of the Russian Government, and this second demand we certainly cannot object to. It is represented as a great interference with the independence of Persia. Of course, it is not an interference with the independence of Persia as it would be an interference with the independence of Persia if the Russian Government were saying that the appointment of Persian officials to the Persian Government must receive the consent of the British and Russian Legations. It does not touch the appointment of Persian officials. It does touch, no doubt, the appointment of foreign officials. Persia is weak and disorganized and the very fact that she requires foreign advisers shows that her independence is not that same independence which can do without leaning on some one else. She wants foreign advisers because she is weak and disorganized. But with foreign advisers there must always come foreign influence. It happens, of course, to be Russia that is complaining of the appointment of British officials in the Russian sphere. It might have been ourselves who had to complain of the appointment of foreign subjects of Russia or some Great Power close to the Indian frontier, or the appointment of Russian subjects, we will say, in the southern or the Gulf Ports. I think it is absolutely essential, after what has happened, that the Persian Government, having a perfectly free hand in regard to the appointment of Persians, in the formation of their own Government, should, if they mean to apply for foreign advisers from outside, at any rate consult the British and Russian Legations beforehand to avoid the recurrence of what has lately

Teheran — "The appointment of Mr. Lecoffre will surley be displeasing and will cause much annoyance to the Russian Government, who may possibly take strong measures to defend their interests. You should point out to Mr. Shuster the probable consequences if he continues to provoke Russian Legation. It should be made clear to him that the Russian Government could employ means for the protection of their own interests which he would be unable to withstand. The appointment of British subjects to administrative posts in the North of Persia is certain to provoke measures by Russia to protect their own interests, and those are measures which we could not deprecate consistently with the Anglo-Russian Agreement. Russian influence is being substituted by British in Northern Persia, a change which we are pledged to avoid." (Hear, hear.) That was sent before I heard anything from the Russian Government at all. It produced no effect whatever. It was met by a non possumus. In face of that, however great Mr. Shuster's abilities, however good his intentions, it is impossible for us to object to the Russian demands which have been put forward. I quite admit his ability and his good intentions, but you cannot have the spirit and intention of the Anglo-Russian Agreement upset and the great nations embroiled by the action of any individual, however well-intentioned. (Hear, hear.) What advice I could give to avoid this I gave at the earliest possible moment. That advice having taken place. But I do say this also that, as foreign advisers are necessary to Persia, neither the British nor the Russian Government ought to put any undue obstacles in the way of Persia obtaining the foreign advice which will be efficient and capable. That I think follows.

The third Russian demand is that Persia should pay an indemnity. With regard to that I have to observe that, at the present moment, Persia cannot pay anything, and I do not suppose for a moment that the Russian Government is going to push for prompt payment. But, if prompt payment it is not pushed for, it is very undesirable that there should be a hanging obligation round the neck of Persia (hear, hear), which would remain like a lever which could be used at any moment; and the second thing I have to remark about it is this: If Persia is called upon to pay an indemnity to Russia at the present moment, it must be adverse to British trade interests. British trade interests have suffered in the south of Persia because the roads have been disturbed and blocked. The roads have been disturbed because there is no proper force to protect them. I trust a force will be created under the Swedish officers or others who are now in Persia, but you cannot have a force created, or, at any rate, you cannot have it sustained without money. Persia is very short of money. She cannot at present pay a Russian indemnity, or any sort of indemnity, without the chances being very seriously impaired of producing that order on the southern roads which is essential to our trade. I have brought these considerations to the notice of the Russian Government. (Hear, hear) Having put forward their demands, they will insist on those demands being 'conceded either in actual practice or in principle; but with regard to the indemnity, I have put forward these considerations, and I think it is not impossible that this difficulty will be got over, if the Russian demands are complied with in principle, and when they are assured that there is a Persian Government that will not disregard British and special interests in those parts of Persia which specially concern each of us.

As to the future. Of course, no progress can be made until this crisis is over, and the crisis will not be over until the Russian demands have been met. When that is over, what should our policy be? It must be a constructive policy with regard to Persia. The appointment of foreign advisers must be facilitated, if the Persian Government wishes for it, where they are necessary. Police and gendarmes must be facilitated, and, of course, a loan is most important, on proper terms, to the Persian Government. When talking of the independence of Persia, people must bear in mind how much the independence of Persia is hampered already by the loans she has previously made. She is not free to borrow as a country which has made no loans hitherto is free. A great many of her best securities are pledged to the Russian or British banks already, and it is absolutely necessary that she should consult the creditors she is making fresh loans, and that their interests should be safeguarded. But I do hold that it ought to be a cardinal point in the policy of the British and Russian Governments, I do not say actually to lend money themselves to Persia, but to make it easy for Persia to obtain a loan. Without that there cannot be any progress.

I have one more point. Their return of the ex-Shah would, undoubtedly, be very prejudicial to the progress of Persia. In the first place, it would give rise to apprehension that he would pursue a vindictive policy against those who had originally expelled him; and in the next place, as regards ourselves, I do not think it is consistent with our dignity to recognize the ex-Shah, if he regained the Throne, just after he has disregarded the warnings given to him not to return to Persia. I will tell the House exactly how I have put this to the Russian Government. I put before them these six points. I have said that (1) we recognize that the outcome of the present situation must be to secure a Persian Government that will not disregard the special interest of Great Britain and Russia respectively, and will conform to the principles of the Anglo-Russian Agreement; (2) that the restoration of the ex-Shah cannot be essential to this object. It will give rise to the apprehension of vindictive measures on his part against those in Persia who were instrumental in expelling him, and it would not be consistent with our dignity to recognize him now after his recent disregard of warnings given by both Governments not to return. I trust, therefore, the Russian Government will not add to the embarrassments of the situation by allowing his restoration to be the outcome of the present crisis. (3) It is most important that Mr. Shuster shall be succeeded without delay by some foreign financial adviser, who is acceptable to both Great Britain and Russia. (4) The British and Russian Governments should, when the Russian demands have been conceded, co-operate in facilitating measures, such as a loan, necessary to prevent chaos and to enable the Persian Government to restore order. (5) The exaction of an indemnity by Russia would materially interfere with this object, and I trust the Russian Government will, after the crisis is over, find some way of avoiding this difficulty. (6) It is understood that the military measures and occupation of Persian territory by Russia now in progress are provisional, and not permanent, and will cease when the Russian demands have been complied with and order in Northern Persia is re-established. I give that to the House as what we have put before the Russian Government as our view. I would like to give to the House what we may take the Russian view to be generally. I take it from what has been published semi-officially in St. Petersburg, because it agrees entirely with the communications I have had with the Russian Government, and it is the most convenient form in which to read it to the House:—"The Russian troops which are now being concentrated at Kazvin will not advance until after a lapse of eight days unless extraordinary events should force the Russian Minister to order them to proceed to Teheran earlier. Russia despatched these troops only owing to the force of circumstances and, of course, as she has frequently declared, without the least intention of violating the integrity or independence of Persia. As soon as Russia's demands have been complied with, the further stay of Russian troops at Kazvin will become superfluous, unless attacks should be made upon Russians or more serious disturbances or other complications should occur. Russian policy in Persia must continue to be based on full agreement and co-operation with Great Britain on the lines and principles of the Anglo-Russian understanding of 1907. Only the maintenance of this understanding will render possible the peaceful and regular development of Persia, so important for the economic and political interests of the two neighbouring States as well as for the establishment of permanent order in Persia itself." With regard to the ex-Shah, the Russian Government have told us that, "having repeatedly declared that the military measures to which it has been forced to have recourse in Persia have absolutely no connexion with Mohammed Ali Shah's aspirations to the Persian Throne, desires to reconfirm that declaration in the most categorical manner. It would not on any account wish that the intention could possibly be attributed to it of imposing a Sovereign on Persia and of acting contrary to the principle of non-intervention in the struggle between the ex-Shah and the Persian Government—a principle which it had proclaimed from the beginning. The Russian Government consequently declares that, if the ex-Shah were now to take advantage of the presence in Persia of a Russian expeditionary corps to realize his designs, the Russian Government would not recognize him as Sovereign in the country without a previous arrangement with his Majesty's Government."

These at any rate, provide lines of general policy on which, I trust, we may be able to co-operate in future. It is essential that the Persian Government should be put on its feet and maintained there. If that cannot be done, you will have continual chaos in Persia. Chaos brings outside interference, and interference brings, sooner or later, very difficult political questions. If Russian frontier and commercial interests in one part of Persia and British frontier and commercial interests in another cannot be preserved by Persian authority and the Persian Government, they must either be preserved by Russia and Great Britain respectively for themselves or be sacrificed altogether. Either alternative would be most disagreeable and most undesirable. And apart from that, we have to bear in mind that Persia is a Muhammadan country neighbouring India, and the last thing we wish to do is to pursue or to be parties to a policy in the neighbourhood of India that would be, or would have the appearance of being, harsh and aggressive to the Muhammadans of the country.

What is essential to the realization of the Persian Government keeping order in Persia, and helping it to that end, is undoubtedly co-operation between Russia and England. If they fall apart, if the Persians were put into the position of playing one off against the other, it would be the most fatal thing that would happen to Persia. I think I have said enough to the House to make it clear that if there is to be co-operation on our part it must be co-operation on some such policy that I have put forward. We could not co-operate in any harsh or aggressive policy which was aimed at the destruction of Persian independence. If we co-operate it must be on a constructive policy after the present crisis is over, it must be aimed at putting the Persian house in order in such a way that order may be preserved by the Persian Government in Persia, and that the present occupation, whether by British troops or Russian, may be only temporary. It is our hope that some such policy as that would be made successful. But it is essential that the present crisis should be got over first, and that it should be recognized frankly that Persian independence and Persian Government must be one which takes due account, as the British and Russian Governments themselves take due account, of their respective interests in certain parts of Persia, and that the Persian Government should do all in its power to carry out the spirit of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, by ensuring that those interests, Russian or British, which those two countries have respectively undertaken not to injure themselves should not suffer injury at the hands of the Persian Government either. I admit the situation is difficult. I do not want to conceal from the House any real difficulties there are but I do believe that a policy such as I have indicated is the only wise policy for Persia. We have been in close communication with the Russian Government; we do not find in them any difference of view as to what the policy should be after the present crisis is over, and it shall be our object and our ceaseless endeavour to secure that both Governments shall co-operate in a policy which will really be favourable to the Persian Government.

So much about Persia. I do not know that I can say much about the other subjects referred to in the debate. The honorable member for Blackburn introduced the debate in a speech with the tone of which I think no one can find fault, and which showed a real desire, while upholding the British view, also to understand the views of other Powers. He appealed to me for papers to be laid on the Moroccan question. I dealt very fully with the Moroccan question the other day. Nothing that I said has been challenged and nothing has been contradicted. It is, therefore, unnecessary, as far as my statement of the other day is concerned, that I should lay papers to support what is unchallenged. The history of what passed is there on the records of the House, to be read by everybody who wishes to know it. As to the publication of papers the honorable member said that the French Government were going to have a large publication of papers. I do not know, but very likely it is so. Of course we must wait to see what papers are published by the two Governments who are the principals in this matter before we publish any papers of ours. So far as I am aware the German Government have not published papers, but the German Foreign Secretary published a statement which, of course, is the counterpart of the speech I made the other day and that has been laid before the House. Certainly in a matter of this kind, we ought to see what papers those who are principally concerned in the matter publish before we publish papers which might possibly add to their difficulties, however interesting they might be to the House.

I would make this further comment on the publication of more papers. The German Chancellor spoke of the clean slate. I have not his actual words here as I had not intended to refer to Morocco to-night. But he referred to the clean slate on which there should be fair writing. If I published a great many papers dealing with these controversial matters of the last two months is it not possible that they would be taken as beginning to cover the slate with writing relating to past events instead of starting afresh? Of course it may be desirable and necessary to publish papers, but before I commit myself to the publication of any papers I think it is worth bearing those considerations in mind. The hon. member who opened the debate spoke of the great discouragement felt by the people both in Germany and here who are well disposed and desire good relations between the two countries. I would do anything I could to remove the discouragement. The hon. member said the feeling in Germany was not good at the present time. It may be that we must wait for a little time until the atmosphere is more favourable. But on the other hand remember that the Moroccan question is out of the way, and after what the German Chancellor said in his first speech and what I said in my speech I say again—if I am to repeat anything I said the other day—that the Moroccan question, if it be settled, ought to smooth the path of diplomacy in the future, and France and Germany having settled the Moroccan question for themselves, we shall be only too delighted to take advantage of anything that smooth path has made possible. This I say also as I said in my previous speech, and as the Prime Minister said in his speech, that whatever difficulties occur, jealousy of German expansion is not our motive. (Cheers.) I have been asked various questions on various subjects. There was a question about the Baghdad Railway. That depends on negotiations with the Turkish Government. Proposals of ours are before the Turkish Government, but as recent events have not been very favourable to the conduct of negotiations, there they remain at the present moment. Our proposals are under consideration. One feature of the debate of an interesting character has been the first speeches which have been made by more than one member. The hon. member behind me (Baron de Forest) made a very interesting first speech. He covered a large part of the human field, and I can only say that if he can succeed in affecting public opinion in the direction which he hopes he will have done a great deal to make Governments and diplomats less powerless than they are at the present moment. (Laughter and cheers.)

The hon. member opposite, the member for South Somerset, contributed a most reasonable and interesting speech as his first effort, and one which pleased the House. I will only say this about it, that it is really not right to state that we were unfriendly to the new régime in Turkey. We did all we could to show friendliness. That was our desire. The hon. member for West Donegal asked for the publication of papers about events in Turkey. It is quite true that there has been no publication of papers since the new régime came into power. If we had published papers about events in Macedonia and Albania at the beginning of the new régime we should have been told that we were not giving the new régime a chance. To publish them at the present moment, while war is going on between Turkey and Italy, would undoubtedly be taken as reflecting upon one of the belligerents. I do not for a moment wish to withhold information from the House, but I cannot publish papers without it being supposed that they were published for a purpose at the present moment. Here are two countries at war. You publish papers reflecting on the internal administration of one of them. Can it be supposed that with those two countries at war it will not be taken—not in this House, but outside—as meaning that you are taking sides? There is really no object in publishing papers at this time unless the state of things was such as to demand and require interference, and unless you must interfere. If we and other Great Powers of Europe are not going to intervene in Turkish internal affairs, then the publication of papers may be a provocation and will be absolutely useless. It is not that I have any desire to withhold information from the House that I deprecate the publication of papers; it is because it would undoubtedly be taken that they are published with a purpose, and the effect will only be provocative and irritating, and it may be that at the present time it would be almost unfair to a country which is in great difficulties.

There is one thing more for comment, and that was in the interesting speech of the hon. member for South Donegal, on the subject of secrecy. This is an age of inventions, and perhaps some day something will be invented by which it is possible to publish papers in the House of Commons which shall not be known elsewhere. (Laughter.) I can assure the House that the motive for secrecy in 99 cases out of 100 is not to withhold information from the House, but it is the difficulty of giving information to the House without giving it to the world at large, and the knowledge we give to the world at large may cause difficulties abroad which are unnecessary. The hon. member for South Donegal really does not do me justice in what he had repeated again and again to the House. He talks about the Anglo-Russian Agreement having been signed three days after Parliament rose. I have given the history of it before. I should like to give it again, but really, once a thing which is inaccurate in a statement has taken the floor it holds it against the truth for ever after. (Laughter.) We had been carrying on negotiations for a long time with Russia. I saw the end of Parliament approaching and I did my utmost to hurry the negotiations in order that the Agreement might be concluded and laid before Parliament before it rose. We got nearer and nearer to the end of the Session, to the time when Parliament would rise, and I got more and more anxious to conclude the Agreement. So far as my recollection goes back, we were within a fortnight or so of the end of Parliament, and even if the Agreement were signed before that it certainly would not be published until a copy of it had been communicated to the Persian Government. I was told that it would take weeks. It was not published until weeks after Parliament rose.

MR. MAC NEILL.—On 22nd August.

Sir E. Grey.—It was not published then; my recollection is that it was published much later, and if we had put the date of publication some weeks afterwards I would not have been exposed to this criticism. (Laughter.) But I was not clever. (Laughter.) I signed the document at the earliest possible date it could be concluded, knowing that it would not be published for some weeks afterwards, and the actual time of signing seemed to be a matter of indifference compared with the time of publication.

Then as to the practice in the House, I have never deprecated discussion in the House, but if I were inclined to do so it would arise, not from any want of good will on my part, but from the difficulties of House of Commons procedure. This Government has not been less free with its information than any of its predecessors. An hon. member complained that at the time when Lord Cranborne was in the House he did not answer any supplementary questions. I wonder whether the House realizes how embarrassing it is to answer these supplementary questions. It was easy enough if the House alone were concerned, but every one of these answers given by the Foreign Secretary is liable to be reported in foreign newspapers and accepted there as the deliberate and considered utterance of the British Government (cheers), not as something forced from the Foreign Secretary by a question put in the House, not as something given impromptu, but as the deliberate, considered, and designed utterance of the British Government. (Hear, hear.) It is not surprising that some years ago there had been found some difficulty abroad, and that an answer to a supplementary question, which may be quite naturally harmless in the House, should give rise to misunderstanding abroad. I believe that was a reason why the House had been led to discontinue the supplementary questions; but I think any hon. member who cares to inquire will find that during the last six years more supplementary questions on foreign affairs have been answered than ever before in the history of the House. (Cheers.) To allege that foreign policy is secret as far as the Government is concerned, that it is something carried on in the dark, not only in the House, but as regards the Cabinet, is absolutely untrue. The hon. member said that he had not been in the Cabinet; and that is very obvious. (Laughter.) The policy of the Foreign Office is the one Department about the main procedure of which the Cabinet is kept duly informed ("Hear, hear," from Mr. Asquith); and I can only say that if I were as well informed about the business of the Departments of all my colleagues as they are about mine I should be a great deal wiser than I am. (Laughter.) I make this comment on what the hon. member said, and I frankly admit that he said it in the most courteous way as well as in a way which was interesting to the House. But I will ask the House to believe that we do not oppose or desire to stop discussions in the House, and if there is reticence and difficulty in communicating information it is because in foreign affairs we have to consider not alone the effect of publication here and how it may be taken and understood here, but also because in a great many cases we are dealing with matters in which we are only one party to matters which may be communicated confidentially to us by other Governments. Were we to embark, therefore, on a procedure of as much publicity as the hon. member desires I think we should land ourselves in the position that other Governments would cease to have communication with us and that we should have very little to communicate. (Laughter and cheers.)

Mr. Ponsonby (Stirling Burghs, Min.) referred to the Persian question and the Anglo-Russian Agreement, arguing that we seemed to disregard what Persia wished. The Russian Government had declared that it wished to respect the integrity of Persia, but reading the assurances of the Russian Government and placing them in contrast with Russia's recent action, he thought it justified a suspicion of Russian intentions in the future. (Hear, hear.) The Russian Government had not possibly the means of carrying out their intentions even if their intentions were good. But the traditional policy of Russia was to sow discord near her own territory in order to have an opportunity of stepping in when government of the country became impossible. The Foreign Secretary did not take into account the fact that Persia was trying to work out her own salvation. Our attitude as to Persia was being regarded as weak and undignified because we were playing second fiddle to Russia. We had considered Russian opinion and we had entirely disregarded the needs of Persia. Mr. Shuster might not have been accustomed to diplomatic methods, but it was weakness on our part not to have insisted on his maintenance at Teheran for the sake of the rehabilitation of Persian finances. The policy of the balance of power was at the root of all our international difficulties. It meant a continual readjusting of the scales, and the arousing of suspicion and jealousy in other nations. Until the policy was abandoned it was hopeless to think we could get on better terms with Germany. He preferred Lord Salisbury's policy of the Concert of Europe. It was impossible to preserve absolute secrecy in foreign affairs under modern conditions. Leakages would occur, and he thought it would be well if the country were allowed to know more about our foreign policy. He hoped this debate would form a precedent for the future, and that the Foreign Secretary would do his best to give time for discussion whenever any considerable number of the members wished it, as he thought it desirable to give information to the House. To make negotiations possible foreign affairs must to a large extent be conducted in secret. They did not wish to see the cards in the hand of the Foreign Secretary, but inasmuch as the people would have to pay for mistakes made, it was not too much to ask that they should know what game was being played and no Minister, were he frank and open, would command more confidence from the country than the present Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Wedgwood said however much it might be true that a Liberal Ministry in power was disastrous to Liberal foreign policy from want of criticism, it was certain that the disaster was the worse with the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs in office. It was difficult to attack him, but it was necessary, for the policy of the Government was not a Liberal policy, during the past six years it had been not only a continuation, but an accentuation of the policy of their predecessors. The "balance of power" had been raised to a sort of fetish which the Foreign Office had worshipped, and when it was not the balance of power in view it was material British interests. The pursuit of these two aims had not been until the last few years the Liberal policy. It was antagonistic to the policy of Canning, Palmerston, and Gladstone, and the people who sent the present Government to power were anxious to have the old Gladstonian tradition observed in foreign policy. They did not desire interference with details, but had a genuine right to expect that certain broad Liberal principles would be followed. The majority of Englishmen put the moral results of foreign policy before material results. They would rather have the influence of the Foreign Office directed to the extension of justice and freedom among the nations. How had the Foreign Office influenced the politics of the world on Liberal lines? Not in Turkey, when the revolution gave promise of a bright future, not in Finland to prevent loss of autonomy, not to prevent an Italian attack on Turkey, not to prevent the French going to Fez, not in the Belgian Congo, not in Persia, had British influence effected anything in a Liberal direction. If England had any influence it had failed. But did the Government try? He had a horrid suspicion that they did not try to use influence.

There was no previous Liberal Government which had not used its influence to secure freedom, liberty, and justice. The whole trouble was that the Foreign Office and the Foreign Office staff were too aristocratic in tone and too liberal in principle. The fact that a man must have a private income of £400 a year before he could receive a salaried appointment ensured that there would be Conservative sympathies throughout the Department. It was notorious that there was a very large anti-German feeling throughout the Foreign Office. It was also notorious that Sir Fairfax Cartwright, the British representative at Vienna, held anti-German views, and he could not understand why he should have been appointed to that position. All the recent international troubles had been caused by concession hunters, and people were becoming tired of that kind of game, particularly now that it was becoming dangerous. We were moving now, not towards internationalization of capital alone but towards internationalization of labour also and that would do more than even the diplomacy of the Liberal Government to make our foreign policy more Liberal in the future.

Mr. Barton (Oldham, Min.) said the speech of the Foreign Secretary had left a feeling of complete disappointment, for the Anglo-Russian Agreement had always been regarded as a guarantee of the independence and integrity of Persia. Their fear in Lancashire was that Russian domination in Persia would in the end mean the loss of their trade with Persia. It would be said that even in the event of Russian domination some arrangement such as the open door could be made, but when they had a manufacturing country like Russia in such close proximity to Persia the trade would be captured entirely by Russian traders, whatever arrangement might be made. From what the Foreign Secretary had said it was clear that we could make no friendships with European Powers which in any way interfered with our friendship with France. That policy was not one which commended itself to him as a Liberal. If we were to have special friends he was desirous that Germany should be included among them.

Mr. Whitehouse (Lanark, Mid. Min.) believed that friendly feeling towards the other existed in both the German and the English nations, and that what was now needed was that the forces on the side of an international understanding should be developed and strengthened.

Mr. Morrell (Burnley, Min.) said in the very interesting speech of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs the right hon. gentleman had assured the House of his anxiety to co-operate with Russia in securing Persian independence and in giving Persia fair play. But the events of the past few weeks were calculated to give the Persian people grave doubts as to his ability to carry out that intention which he had expressed. The British Government had advised the Persian Government to comply with Russia's demands when the first Ultimatum was received. When the second, and even more unjust, demand was made by Russia our Government encouraged the Russians and told the Persian Government that it was their own fault because they had employed British subjects in Northern Persia. As an Englishman he could not feel any pride in the honour of his country. Over and over again they were told that it was all the fault of Mr. Shuster, and that he had made things impossible. When it came to dismissing a man instantly at the point of the bayonet, with the approval of the British Government, he would like to know what Mr. Shuster's fault was. All that Mr. Shuster had done—this was the beginning and end of his offence as publicly narrated by the Foreign Secretary—was to transfer Mr. Lecoffre, who happened to be a British subject, from one place to another, both places in the sphere of Russian influence. Because of that, the Persian capital was to be invaded with our consent. A poorer excuse than that for taking away the independence of a people to whom we were bound—for that was what it came to—he had never heard put forward in that House. He would like to know how far we were going in our efforts to drive out Mr. Shuster. He was in favour of the preservation of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, if it could be preserved consistently with the honour of this country; but it could not stand unless the Foreign Office made it clear to the Russian Government that the action they had taken against Persia must not be persisted in. (Cheers.)

Sir W. Byles (Salford, N., Min.) pleaded for more intimate relations between the House of Commons and the Foreign Office. At present they were hardly on speaking terms. (Laughter.) He complained of the system of keeping the nation in the dark as to foreign policy, and said that a feeling existed that the Liberal Party was being hustled along in an anti-Liberal policy. The action which we had sanctioned in Persia was due to the lack of an understanding with Germany. The continued strained relations with Germany, the consequent maintenance of crushing expenses on armaments, and the advance of the Cossacks in Persia with our connivance, were loosening the allegiance of many supporters of the Government.

Reuter wired from Rome.—An Italian column on the 26th instant advanced up the Derna river to protect the Engineers engaged in repairing the aqueduct supplying the town with water. The column came into contact with a large force of Turks, who possessed many quick-firing guns. The Italians failed to effect a turning movement and after a sharp fight retired to their entrenchments. They lost three killed and seventy-seven wounded.

CONSTANTINOPLE, December 13.

Much anxiety has been aroused by the news that the Grand Vizier is about to submit a Bill for the modification of Article 85 of the Constitution respecting the dissolution of the Chamber. The present form of the Article in question acknowledges the Sultan's right to dissolve the Chamber with the consent of the Senate in consequence of reiterated conflict in the Cabinet. According to most accounts the new version does not contain any reference to the Senate's powers. Its immediate adoption in the Chamber by the necessary two-thirds majority is problematical, and the timid anticipate that its introduction will be the signal for a yet fiercer outbreak of party strife.

It is also asserted, though less confidently, that the Government proposes a further alteration in the Constitution to enable the Sultan to suspend Parliamentary debates in war time. The fact that similar proposals engaged the attention of the recent Committee Congress at Salonika, where a majority of the delegates pronounced in favour of the limitation of the powers of the Senate, strengthens the perhaps erroneous but general assumption that the Central Committee, realizing that it is losing ground, has made up its mind to precipitate a General Election while still sure of support from the great majority of the officials of the Ministry of the Interior, whose influence is expected to determine the course of many provincial elections. I may also record the theory that Said Pasha, with the consent of the Committee, wishes to strengthen the power of the Crown.

Smyrna, December 2.

News of a rather conflicting nature is continually been received about the threatened Italian naval raid in the Aegean. The native population views this proposed action with equanimity, if not indifference. The inhabitants of the Aegean Islands are overwhelmingly Christian, the Turks in but few cases numbering as much as 10 or 15 per cent. Consequently the Christian element, mainly Greek, will be the sufferer. An attack against the ports of Smyrna or Salonika is not considered probable, but in the event of hostilities being directed against these towns, which number a large and wealthy European population, far more economic mischief would be caused to the European colonies and foreign interests than to the Turks. As for the Dardanelles, the forts there are considered impregnable. Meanwhile military preparations go on apace, both by land and sea. General Ismail Fazil Pasha arrived this week to inspect the troops concentrated round Smyrna. The Pasha was formerly military commander here, and he was received with full military honours.

Jerusalem, November 23.

THE war continues to be the all-absorbing topic of conversation, and here, as elsewhere, rumour seems to have things all its own way. The local papers quite naturally dilate upon the Turkish successes, and the reports they publish are received somewhat sceptically by cautious folk. An official report, however, lately reached the Commandant here, stating that the Turkish troops, aided by their Arab allies had driven the Italians out of Tripoli. This, of course, gave rise to great jubilation. The guns in the Kishleh were fired, and many proposals for a public celebration of the victory were put forward. Jaffa took the lead in the matter, and Nabulus followed suit.

Nothing worth reporting occurred in connection with these demonstrations, but at Ramleh, a town to the north-west of Jerusalem the excitement unfortunately led to some rioting and disturbance because the Christians did not take part in the celebrations. The Christians left their houses and took refuge in the Latin Convent, and the disturbances lasted for three days. There was, however, no loss of life, and no cases of robbery have been reported. The British and French Consuls, the Kaimakam of Jaffa, and the Commandant of Jerusalem visited the scene of the trouble. As a result of the outbreak, the authorities have declined to allow any demonstrations at all in Jerusalem.

Constantinople, November 8.

A GREAT sensation has been caused here during the last few days by an article in the Yeni-Gasetta announcing that the Russian Ambassador had presented a Note to the Grand Vizier demanding the opening (to Russian warships only) of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles. This news, coming on the heels of the tidings that the Russian troops were on the march towards Teheran, caused the utmost uneasiness here, and its impression has not altogether been dispelled by the numerous official or semi-official denials, which have pounced, like hawks, on the newly fledged canard. It seems that there has been no Note, and that no official communication of any kind has been received from the Russian Government in this connection, but it is not denied by the Turks that the Russian Ambassador—or some other representative of his Government—has sounded the Porte with regard to the possibility of an arrangement with regard to this very important question. There are rumours that high Russian officials discussed it with members of the Turkish Special Mission which recently visited the Tsar. But whether the Russian Government, as our German friends and the German Jewish Press in Austria would have us believe, really contemplates a new treaty of Hunkiar-Skelessi with the Turks without the knowledge of her Western friends and allies, or whether M. Tcharykoff, who is known to be a strong advocate of a Russo-Turkish understanding, simply wished to know what Turkish statesmen thought with regard to the opening of the Straits, and found that his attempts to sound the Turks were "given away" by some indiscretion, who can say? In any case, the reception given to the news by the Ottoman public is not of a nature to encourage those who believe that a formula can be found whereby the secular cause of Russo-Turkish hostility or suspicion can be banished from European politics. Needless to say, the occasion has not been lost by the friends of Germany here, and it is unfortunate that some support has been given to their views by the Russian advance in North Persia, which is believed to have provoked something like a protest from the Porte. Although the Turks who have been encroaching on the Persian borders for years past are not perhaps morally entitled to object very strongly to Russia's action, their annoyance is none the less natural. Turkey does not the laws of neutrality, ammunition is being sent to the Turkish forces from Egypt, and that "the Red Crescent Mission, which went from Egypt to the Turkish camp, was composed of officers disguised as surgeons, and carried boxes of cartridges instead of medical comforts." It is unnecessary to say that there is no foundation whatever for statements of this nature, which can only be accounted for by the fact that in the absence of authentic news the sensational newspapers in Italy find it necessary to pander to their readers by drawing upon their imagination.

SOVIA, December, 5.

Some sensation was caused yesterday in the Sobranje during the debate on the Budget, when Mr. Nicola Constantinic, a former Minister and now Leader of the Opposition, moved the increase of the war Budget from 40 million to 50 million francs, because, as he said at the conclusion of his speech, "our road to Macedonia lies through Bucharest." He referred, doubtless, to the supposition that Roumania would resent, if not prevent, any hostile movement by Bulgaria against Turkey.

Cairo, December 3.

PROBABLY never has a war been carried on in the immediate neighbourhood of Egypt that has created less interest here than that now being waged under such strange conditions between Italy and the Ottoman Empire. Of rumours there are many, the latest being that Hunter Pasha of the coastguard service has been taken prisoner by the Arabs on the Tripolitan border while in the execution of his office, namely, that of maintaining the strict neutrality of Egypt by watching the frontier for contraband of war. There is a far greater inclination to discredit such a rumour than to give it credence, and a dementi is expected in due course. From time to time it has been whispered that heavily laden caravans have left the Nile valley travelling in a westerly direction, but it is considered far from likely that their destination should be the seat of war.

Equally incredible is the strange rumour which has been circulated in the Italian Press and published in a letter from a correspondent in Rome to a Cairo newspaper that, in violation of ly with the object of goading the Turks into reprisals, which would provoke a Bulgarian insurrection, and afford an opening for foreign intervention. The worst of these outrages took place at Ishkib, the centre of a district of mixed Turkish and Bulgarian population, both sections of which are organised in mutually hostile secret societies. On a market day, when the town was crowded with country folk of both nationalities, bombs were exploded in the mosque and in a grocer's shop. The mosque was destroyed and a number of people killed and injured. A riot followed, and many Bulgarians were killed or wounded before order could be restored. In addition to this outrage, various attempts have been made to blow up trains, and some Turks have been killed by Bulgarian bands outside Salonika. Happily, the Turkish Government and the Turkish Press have kept their heads under this provocation. The Tanin, the leading Committee organ, exhorts the public to remember that panic-stricken reprisals could only injure Ottoman interests, and the Porte seems to be taking precautions to prevent the natural indignation of the Mussalmans finding a vent in persecution of the Bulgarian population. Another reassuring feature of the situation is the pacific attitude of the Bulgarian Government, which is warmly appreciated even by the more Chauvinist of the Turkish newspapers. In Constantinople there is a tendency to attribute the outrages to Italian instigation, but there seems to be no evidence to support this improbable theory. Those who remember the outrages of seven years ago will have no hesitation in ascribing these to the same source. But even if the Internal Organisation receives no help or encouragement from outside, its baneful activities are only too likely to bring about a state of civil war in Macedonia.

In spite of the calming effect of the speeches made by M. Venizelos, supported by M. Dragoumis and others, and in spite of the warnings of the Powers, there is a possibility that an attempt will be made to send certain deputies, accompanied by armed followers, to the Greek Chamber. The Cretan statesman who is now Prime Minister in Athens is, however, more than a match for his fellow-islanders. He has hit upon a method of meeting the emergency which is likely to be as effective as it is original. He has imposed a quarantine period of five days on all vessels coming from Crete, with the exception of those coming from the parts which are guarded by the warships of the protecting Powers. The shipping companies have been warned, both by M. Venizelos and by the Consuls of the Powers, not to convey the deputies, and the Greek Government has even notified them that the carrying of armed Cretans will be regarded as piracy and punished as such. If, in spite of these precautions, the would-be deputies succeed in reaching Athens, M. Venizelos is resolved to close the Chamber, so as to prevent them attempting to take their seats. The development of the affair, which, thanks to M. Venizelos, has lost most of its elements of danger, will be followed with interest and amusement.

News from Turkish Sources.

Telegramas received in Constantinople state that Arabs gained a signal victory at Tobruk. A reconnoitring party of Italians had advanced towards them from Tobruk, but Arabs from some tribes of Barca surrounded them in such a manner that all were caught alive after a little fighting and not one was allowed to escape. The number of prisoners thus secured was more than 105. On hearing this a larger body of Italian troops attacked the Arabs and hard fighting lasted for two hours after which the Italians began to retreat and at last fell back on their defences near the shore whence the guns of the warships opened fire on the Arabs and prevented their further advance. In this encounter 50 of the enemy were killed and the Arabs seized several guns and much ammunition. (Al-Ahram 15th December) News received from the seat of war show that the Ottoman forces are shelling Derna from several well-selected quarters and the Italian authorities are anxious to embark their forces on the ships to escape the fire of the guns. It is expected that when the ships move farther from the shore the capture of Derna would become easier. The Arabs attacked the Italian forces at Derna so vigorously that in spite of larger numbers the latter could not withstand it and were compelled to seek the shelter of the shore. Much booty fell into the hands of the Arabs, including several large stores of grain, 45 Italians were also made prisoners. (Al Taraghi, Constantinople, 11th December.) The Ottoman Parliament came to know through some sources that a number of spies were trying to discover the internal affairs of Turkey, the intentions of Parliament and the dissensions of its members. On investigation the police succeeded in arresting an Italian who could not conceal his espionage and confessed. A search is being made for his accomplices. (Tanin, 13th December.)

Our Special Correspondent in Tripoli informs us that up to the 2nd December the situation was thus:

"All was quiet again, but the enemy was busy in the vicinity of Hamidieh, which portends a severe encounter at an early date. Yesterday there was a little skirmishing and we captured 40 men. Other losses are not accurately known. We came out scatheless. For attacking from the side of the Hamidieh our forces are ready and anxious and their numbers and enthusiasm are daily increasing. The new Commander-in-Chief of the Italians had intended to attack vigorously from the Sidi-Misir side, but the courage of our men proved too great an obstruction. This was the severest encounter and lasted till the Zuhri prayers. Our losses were slight, in fact about 8 or 10 men. Their casualties were numerous, and though correct figures are not known, the numbers must exceed hundred. The Ottoman forces in Ainzar are making a counter attack on the enemy who numbers more than 40 thousand. We have little but the mercy of Allah. (Alamdar, Constantinople, 12th December.)

Our Special Correspondent sends news of a severe encounter which occurred on the 4th December. The Turkish troops and the Arabs made a vigorous onslaught and in a few hours compelled the enemy to vacate the temporary fortifications and defences that the Italians had raised. We lost 200 killed and the losses of the enemy could not have been less than a thousand. Much booty fell into our hands. (Alamdar, Constantinople, 15th December.)

The Tanin publishes letters and news showing that the defensive line proclaimed in Africa has kindled a conflagration throughout Africa. Mujahids from Tunis and Algiers have reached the field in large numbers and the efforts of the French Government have proved unavailing in preventing their participation. Algerians have specially taken considerable part in recent encounters.

The Italian Commander had sent a strong force to a place some two hours' journey from Benighazi in order to attack the Arab tribes that had gathered there. But the Arabs surrounded them and in a short time captured many. This victory was gained on the 3rd December. An other encounter occurred the same day. A large force of the Italians had advanced from Benighazi to attack the Arabs and come into conflict with them at a place where the enemy had strong temporary fortifications. For two hours the Arabs fought valiantly and then throwing themselves vigorously on the Italians compelled them to retreat to Jalinana, a place on the coast. They lost about 100 killed and 75 captured. Large quantities of arms and stores fell into our hands. After this battle all those important strategical points which had slipped out of our hands on the recent advance of the Italians have been regained and now our forces are besieging Benighazi from the side of the land. Excessive and incessant rainfall has embarrassed the enemy and caused much loss. The battleships are in great peril and there is confusion in the camps—(Tanin, 13th December.)

The Tanin publishes in its issue of the 13th December a strong indictment against the Italian's "revival of the Middle Ages," referring specially to the ill-treatment of Ottoman prisoners of war and the open and unashamed breach of all international rules on the subject. It says that they are given hard and intolerable tasks to perform every day. When they are unable to perform them they are punished most brutally and in an unspeakable manner. It adds that such newspapers and political groups in Rome as are opposed to the Italian raid are themselves attacking the Government on this score. "But" adds the Tanin bitterly, "Europe demands from the spectators of this degrading scene nothing more than the ticket of Neutrality."

Francis McCullagh and the Atrocities.

In 1876 an Irishman in the service of the British and American Press paralysed the policy of Lord Beaconsfield, destroyed the traditional alliance between Great Britain and Turkey, and created Bulgaria. His name was MacGahan.

In 1911 we have again the apparition of an Irishman in the service of the British and American Press who has exercised and is exercising a potent influence upon the policy of Great Britain, and who may yet make as notable an imprint upon the pages of the history of the Near East as his great predecessor. I refer to Francis McCullagh—McCullagh of Tripoli.

MacGahan three months after the atrocities in Bulgaria visited the decaying remains of the victims of the massacre. He described what he was accurately, vividly like a photographic camera with a heart in it, and the picture which he held up before the eyes of a shuddering world rendered possible Mr. Gladstone's great campaign.

McCullagh had the advantage over MacGahan that he saw the atrocities in progress. Not three months after the event, but as an actual eye-witness on the spot, he saw the massacres as they were being carried out. He had a photographic camera and photographed the murderers and their victims. A host of other correspondents had reported the facts briefly. McCullagh reported them in detail, and backed up his narrative by handing in his papers, as he refused any longer to be associated with an army which had degenerated into a band of assassins. Hence the immediate and far reaching effect of his testimony.

It is illogical, no doubt, but the fact is indisputable that the atrocities committed by the panic stricken Italian soldiery in the oasis of Tripoli created a greater popular revulsion of feeling against Italy than was roused by her buccaneering expedition to Africa. The real crime, of course, was the war. The atrocities were only an incident of the war. A burglar breaks into my house and incidentally kills one of my children in trying to avoid capture. The murder was only an unanticipated corollary of the housebreaking. But the burglar would be hanged for the murder, whereas he would only have been sent to penal servitude for the burglary. So it is in the rough and ready tribunal of public opinion. The Italians are execrated throughout the world for the massacre, which was merely a collateral and undesired accident resulting from their raid on Tripoli, just as the British public revolted against the Turkish Alliance merely because they suddenly realised one of the normal and constantly recurring incidents of Ottoman rule in Europe.

It is this fact which has invested the personality of Mr. McCullagh with such interest both in the Old World and the New.

Francis McCullagh was born in Omagh in the year 1874. He comes of a good old Tyrone Catholic family, and was educated by the Christian Brothers and at St. Columba's College in Derry. As soon as he left college he took to journalism. After a brief apprenticeship in Scotland and in Bradford, he decided he would try his fortune further afield. After twelve months' newspaper work in Britain he started on his adventurous career by going to Ceylon

...and to see whether he could find the lowest rung on the ladder which would lead him to fame and fortune. He landed in England with a tin in his pocket and no engagement, but he soon became attached to a local paper, on which he worked for about a year. Colombo was deadily dull, however, so he went on to Siam.

In those days—now some twenty years distant—Siam was one of the Tom Tiddlers' grounds of international politics. Lord Rosebery, it will be remembered, was within an ace of declaring war on France over the Siamese question. Francis McCullagh had gravitated by a process of natural law to the centre of the danger zone for the time being. He accepted the post of sub-editor of the Siam Free Press, which at that time was edited by an Irishman, Mr. Lillie, who also filled the post of correspondent of the New York Herald. Within a month of Mr. McCullagh's arrival in Bangkok he had the good luck to find himself in sole charge of the paper.

When the Siam question was settled amicably between England and France, Mr. McCullagh scented news in the Farther East. Japan had just concluded her victorious campaign China, and although peace had been signed, there was still a smell of powder in the air. Leaving Bangkok, Mr. McCullagh made his way to Tokyo in the hopes that he would find a berth of some kind. It was not disappointed. He obtained a situation as the only European on the staff of the Japan Times.

McCullagh remained on the Japan Times for four years. Then he felt the time had come for another change. War was brewing in Manchuria. Russia was certain that she could prevent it. McCullagh knew better, for he knew the Japanese, and it was Japan, not Russia, that decided the issue of peace or war. He went to Port Arthur and for six months served on the staff of a Russian paper, the Novi Krai. He soon saw that war was close at hand, and that when war came his chance would come with it. He wrote to several London papers nessed the triumphal entry of Mahmud Shekhet Pasha, at the head of the Macedonian army. He was then corresponding for the New York Times. In 1910 Methuen published his book, "The Fall of Abdul Hamid," to which Mahmud Shekhet contributed a preface. This also was well received. It is one of the best narrations of the end of the Hamidian reign.

Soon after he returned to London he was off to Lisbon to describe the Portuguese revolution. On behalf of the New York World he thrice visited Spain and Portugal, keeping watch on the Royalists, who were intriguing for a restoration.

Then he was despatched to Agadir, after the Panther. Mr. McCullagh described his adventures on the Morocco coast in the Westminster Gazette. On his return from Africa the New York World sent him off to Tripoli to report the Italian invasions. Hence he was on the spot when the massacres of October took place.

Of what he saw and heard and did in Tripoli it is best to let him tell his own story as he told it in the Memorial Hall, London, on Monday night, 20th November.

I was in the chair, or at least on the platform, for owing to the excitability and volubility of the Italians present I was as often on my legs appealing for order as in the chair.

Mr. McCullagh (received with loud cheers), said.—

"I am not going to deliver an oration. I came here as a witness. I have been brought here by two policemen. One is my own conscience, the other is the chairman.

"I am not pro-Arab nor anti-Italian. I went to Tripoli from Morocco, where the Arabs had given me no reason to love them, and when I got to Tripoli my imagination was powerfully impressed by the return of the Italians to their old colony after an absence of some one thousand five hundred years. and to the New York Herald pointing out that a conflict was certainly coming. None of the English papers replied, but the New York Herald with whom he had already had some connection, believed him, engaged him, and wired him one thousand pounds to go on with.

The result justified their enterprise. The New York Herald had a man on the spot from the first, and it was able to beat all its rivals. Mr. McCullagh was the only man to report the first Japanese attack on Port Arthur. He attached himself to the staff of the famous Russian Cossack General Mischenko, and rode with the Cossacks through all the battles of the war until he was captured after Mukden and taken prisoner to Japan. Mr. McCullagh told the story of his adventures in a book published by Evelyn Nash in 1906 entitled "With the Cossacks; being the Story of an Irishman who Rode with the Cossacks throughout the Russo-Japanese War."

After his release Mr. McCullagh came to Europe, and accompanied Count Witte to Portsmouth, in the United States, where peace was signed. He returned with Count Witte to Russia, and witnessed the later scenes of the Russian revolution. He acted as Russian correspondent of the New York Times for three years. Russia then became too quiet for his restless spirit. The Turkish revolution attracted him to the Balkan peninsula, where he travelled through Bosnia, Montenegro, Servia, and Bulgaria. His usual good luck never failed him, for he found himself in Constantinople when the counter-revolution was engineered from Yildiz Kiosk. He wit-of Tripoli is a triumphal arch of Marcus Aurelius. It has, by the way, been converted into a shop, over which is displayed a signboard indicating that it is a cinematograph show. The only business carried on inside, however, is the sale of intoxicating liquor.

"At the corner of every street there are splendid Roman pillars built into the walls. My imagination would indeed have been sluggish if it had not been excited by the return of the race which had built those eternal Roman roads, raised those tall and lonely aqueducts in the desert, erected those splendid temples to the Roman gods. I was so impressed that I did the most risky thing I ever did as a war correspondent: I wrote poetry. (Laughter.)

"A man with such feelings cannot be described as anti-Italian. Judging, however, by the fact that a few moments before I came here I was challenged to a duel by an Italian gentleman, it is evident that I am regarded in some quarters as a bitter enemy of Italy. (Italian interruption.) Ladies and gentlemen, it is love of Italy which makes me speak as I do and makes me write as I do. (Loud cheers.) The worst enemies of Italy are those who try to hush up these horrors—(loud cheers)—and would leave such a man as General Canova in command of a gallant army.

"The Italians say that the Arabs fired upon them from the rear. If a man meddles with a bee-hive, and, being stung by the insects, calls them treacherous scoundrels, I only laugh at him.

"But the Italians say the Arabs swore allegiance. Since the world began it has always been the same story. When a strong nation crushes a weaker, there is always somebody in that weaker nation ready to swear allegiance in the name of all his fellows. As a rule he is some discredited and derelict politician.

"Who is the disreputable Arab politician who swore allegiance to the Italians? His name is Hassan Kammami. He had been bought body and soul years ago by the Italians. When Admiral Rice landed in Tripoli, Hassan generously presented Tripoli to him. What right had he to speak for the Arabs, or even for his own family? He has one son, who is to-day in the desert in charge of the Arab cavalry. (Loud cheers.) A few days before I left Tripoli the father sent a message to his son to come back and accept honour and wealth at the hands of the Italians. What was his answer? He said, 'I will come back, but it will be at the head of my Arabs, and when I come you will be the first man I shall hang!' (Loud cheers.) And yet General Caneva accepted as spokesman of all the Arabs a man who could not answer for his own family. It was very simple of General Caneva to have done so. He seems to have done it in good faith. But the Arabs cannot be blamed for taking advantage of such simplicity, no more than Cromwell can be blamed for taking similar advantage of the Scotch at Dunbar. It was not the peaceful villagers who fired on the Italian rear on 23rd October, it was the Arabs from the desert who had slipped in and taken advantage of the simplicity of General Caneva. Those men lost their lives, and were glad to lose them.

"I do not blame the Italians for what occurred on the 23rd. Many women and children were accidentally killed then, but that was one of the chances of war. I blame them for what occurred on the 26th. Early in the morning of that day, at five o'clock, I heard a very heavy artillery and rifle fire round the Italian lines. I went out and found that at one place on the east the Italian line had been broken. The men had left the trenches and were lying behind sandbags. I noticed blue jackets landed from the ships. The last man was evidently in the firing line. Half-way between the citadel and the Italian front is a large Esparto Grass factory belonging to the Banca di Roma. Round this factory is a village inhabited exclusively by the employes of the mill. They were miserable people, living in a very poor way. While some Italian reinforcements were passing this village on the way to the front on 26th October several shots were fired. I do not know who fired them. It is said that one Italian soldier was wounded in the leg. I never could find that soldier. For those shots over four thousand people lost their lives. (Loud cries of 'Shame!') The massacre began in that village. It lasted for three days, and extended through the oasis. (Italian voice: 'Where do you get your figures?') I have my figures from various sources, including French and German sources. (Sarcastic cries of 'Ah! Ah!') It was a sudden transition from criminal negligence to criminal severity. I shall tell you what I saw. When the village was surrounded and burned down the soldiers were allowed to wander about without supervision and shoot anybody they saw. I saw them do it myself. In the village I found two old bed-ridden women. They had never in all probability seen a rifle in their lives. It was murder to kill them. I saw a little boy lying on the ground, ill. He had evidently been taken from the house in which he lay. I also saw three other women. Assistance had been refused to them. They were left to die on the bare ground like dogs. And they did die. Gentlemen, I do not call that war. (Loud cheers.)

"For three days the butchery went on. The Italians made a rule of sending messages to the relatives of those who were killed. I was seated one day in the Hotel Minerva. In front of that hotel is a shipping office. A policeman came and called the Arab clerk of that shipping office. He told him his brother had been shot. The grief of that man was terrible to witness. He disappeared next day. Where is he now? He is where every Arab should be, where every man and boy in this audience would be if they were Arabs—he is in the desert with a rifle in his hands. (Loud cheers.)

"The Arabs were declared to be guilty on the flimsiest pretexts. For instance, if a house were searched and a knife found there the owner was put to death. All over North Africa the men wear knives as commonly as men in this country wear socks. Men were put to death because razors and empty cartridges were found in their houses. The proclamation of the admiral calling upon them to give up their arms was ineffective. It was ineffective because no Arab knew of it. I employed an Arab to get information for me, and he knew nothing of this proclamation; and yet for disobedience to it Arabs were shot. That I call most unjust.

"General Caneva speaks of the Arabs mutilating the Italian soldiers. Well, every second officer in the Italian army has a camera and generally spends most of his time in photographing the murder of little boys. I have seen one refuse to help a boy who was dying at my feet. I have seen one photograph a boy of fourteen placed against a wall to be shot." ("Shame!") Interruption from Italians present. An Italian officer standing on a chair, asks his compatriots to give order, as he will speak later.)

The Chairman, addressing Italians present: "If you are so indignant at what is said, you cannot be surprised that we are indignant at what was done!" (Loud cheers.)

Mr. McCullagh: "General Caneva says the Arabs mutilated the bodies of Italian soldiers. I could never find any photographs of such mutilation. I think the Italians would have been very glad to have shown them to me. I have been in Tripoli and outside the Italian lines, but have never seen anything of the kind. Even if it were true that the Arabs violated the rules of war, must General Caneva do the same? General Caneva does not understand the dignity of that mighty name,—Rome. If the Bedouin of the desert does wrong, must Rome follow suit?" (Loud and enthusiastic cheers.)

Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, representing Reuter's, said that he had come only out of friendship for Mr. McCullagh, a gentleman for whom he had the greatest admiration and esteem. "I am glad to support him on this occasion. I have no hostility towards Italy. I am in favour of forgiving and forgetting where it is possible to forgive and forget. The foreign war correspondents in Tripoli would have been glad to forgive and forget all that has been done. If General Caneva and the Italian Government had come forward and said: 'We have erred and regret it, and it shall not occur again, we would have accepted it and would have done our best to quiet it down. But they would not do so. They called us liars. They say we are animated by hostility, which is utterly ridiculous and absurd. Every war correspondent always does his very best to be on good terms with the army he accompanies. It makes his stay very pleasant. He has means of obtaining information and has a good time. I am glad to support Mr. McCullagh. The wisest course under the circumstances and for the sake of international friendship is that these things should be forgiven and forgotten. And I will tell you why. I found a more general feeling among the Italian officers that they had erred. They admitted that they had done wrong and regretted the occurrences. I pass a vote of censure on the Italian Government and on General Caneva, but in fairness spare the rank and file of the army, who are sorry for what has occurred.'" (Loud cheers.)

The Chairman said—"No one can listen unmoved to an appeal for forgiveness and forgetfulness. We will respond. We will forgive and we will forget when the crime has been repented of and security taken against its repetition." (Loud cheers.)

SLIDES SHOWN BY MR. MCCULLAGH.

1. Tripoli and district.
2. Comparative map showing relative size of Tripoli, Turkey and Italy.
3. One of the forts.
4. Same fort, with view of one large Krupp gun which was left behind by the Turks. "The Italians have been capturing this gun for the last month."
5. The English officer, Lieutenant Montagu. (Loud and prolonged cheers.)
6. Shows task in which Italians are engaged. They are bombarding the desert. It is expensive work. Every ten-inch shell costs £100. Could Italy not find some better way to spend this money at home? They are bombarding the desert. The only answer they get is the whistling of the Sahara wind and the crack of the Turkish rifles out among the distant sand-hills.
7. Trench. Soldiers facing both ways so as to be prepared for an attack from the town as well as for an attack from the desert.
8. Edge of oasis. Italians in trench firing at enemy.
9. Soldiers hunting through oasis, shooting every Arab they see. (Interruption from Italians. The Chairman: "They have not seen it before, and are wincing under the exhibition of the barbarity of their countrymen.")
10. "All the men in this crowd were shot." (Interruption from Italians.) The Chairman: "My dear Italian officer, you are under my orders. I am colonel of this regiment." (Cheers.)
11. Number of prisoners. "These people were collected by private soldiers, placed against a wall, and shot. There was no sign of justice there was no trial. The New York American says that there was justice, that there were trials, and, to prove its point, publishes a photograph of an Arab being tried. This was the only formal trial that took place. It was held because the accused was a kavass of the German Consulate, and the Italians had therefore to consider the feelings of their great ally."
12. Number of Arabs led out to be shot.
13. Group of Arabs being led out for execution.
14. Same thing again. (Renewed interruption. The Chairman: "If we may judge from the cynical brutality of these interruptions we must consider that if he had been in Tripoli he would probably have been as brutal and barbarous as anybody.")
15. Two prisoners. These prisoners were not well treated. An Italian soldier struck one right in the face with all his force. They may have deserved to die, but ought not to have been treated like dogs.
16. Young men. Led to edge of desert. Told they could go into the desert. They walked slowly forward, and the Italian soldiers shot at them from the trenches. Sometimes a soldier went to finish them off with his bayonet. (More interruption. The Chairman again remonstrates, adding, "I have given you fair warning, and I shall have to send for the police to have you removed." Continued interruption. "It is understood that anyone who feels aggrieved can come on this platform and say what he has to say.")
17. Arab prisoner. Notice how he laughs as he is being led out to his death.

18. Fifty men and boys who were shot. "Most ghastly business ever I witnessed. This is whence I get my figures!"

19. "Two corpses of men killed by an Italian private soldier. I do not like mentioning it, but the soldier uncovered one in such a way that the photographer could not take it in any other direction. The bodies lay there on the street for twenty-four hours. Arab women and children were afterwards led along this road by the Italian soldiery, so as to enjoy, I presume, the view of their dead bodies."

20. Arab ladies being led by Italian soldiers down a road littered with corpses of their own countrymen. Procession headed by a boy twelve years of age. Mr. McCullagh wished to photograph this boy on account of the fact that, though a Mahammadan, he carried in his hand a little white flag whereon was embroidered a red cross. When Mr. McCullagh approached, the boy fell into a panic, dropped on his knees, and thought Mr. McCullagh was an Italian who was about to murder him.

21. Mr. Grant of Daily Mirror, expelled from Tripoli. Took the picture last shown—the picture where Arab women are being led past the bodies of their dead fathers, husbands, brothers, and sons.

The Mutilation of Italian Soldiers.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN."

SIR,—Allow me to express my horror at the mutilation of Italian soldiers by the Tripolitan Arabs, reported this morning; and I am sure my horror will be shared by every Mussulman throughout the world. At the same time I desire to protest against the use of the word "Moslem" in connection with the atrocities which the Times correspondent says he saw at El Henni. No Mussulman called the Italian "blood-lust" or "military exigencies" Christian atrocities.

In Islam the mutilation of the dead and of prisoners is emphatically prohibited. I shall only quote here the injunctions of the first Khalif of Islam to his soldiers, going to war against the Byzantines, to show how utterly abhorrent these savage practices are to the Mussulman conscience—

"See," he said, "that thou avoidest treachery. Depart not in any wise from the right. Thou shalt mutilate none, neither shall thou kill child or aged man, nor any woman. Injure not the date-palm neither burn it with fire, and cut not down any tree wherein is food for man or beast. Slay not the flocks or herds or camels, saving for needful sustenance."

I ventured to predict before the actual invasion the ferocious character this war was certain to assume, and as it proceeds I fear the passions that are being aroused will become more and more vindictive on both sides.

Will not the British nation even now raise its united voice against the continuance of a war to subjugate a people who have shown themselves so repugnant to submit to alien rule? Yours, &c.,

AMFER ALL.

The Powers, and Islam.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST"

SIR,—To any observer the present state of those regions with which your valuable paper deals must give cause for the very gravest anxiety and disquiet. There is one general aspect—which reflects very seriously on the destinies of the British Empire—to which I should be glad to be allowed to draw attention.

I will take only one general consideration—the present tendency of things in Persia, in Tripoli, and in Morocco suggests to the mind that within a few years the last independent Moslem State will have ceased to exist as such, and that within a short time no Moslem will be able to say that there is any region in which his coreligionists have a predominant share in the matter of government, although in vast areas of Asia and Africa they form an overwhelming majority of the population.

This consideration alone, one which fills me with alarm, Islam is compact, yet international, whilst strongly united by bonds of simple ceremonial and even simpler dogma.

Islam since its first inception has always been liable to sudden simultaneous movements, which have hitherto only been limited by the slowness of the communication of news. To-day this factor has been changed, it would now be possible and easy for one sermon to be preached in every mosque from Bokhara to Agadir on a given Friday.

If the remaining Moslem States are partitioned by the Powers of Europe, the day on which the last is dissolved Europe will light a fire of discontent in a large section of the human race, already united and sympathetic. Even now a Moor is more at home in Shiraz than a Spaniard in Berlin or a Rumanian in Vienna. Although there are many Germans in London and few Afghans in Cairo although it is a question of fewer hours' travel from Hamburg to Hull than it is weeks from Kandahar to Suez, yet the Afghani is less of a stranger within the gates of the All Azhar than is the waiter of Gambrenus in the Soho lodging-house.

In England politicians and statesmen are ever apt to take a view biased by the immediate straits of the hour and to disregard the less mutable problems of the world. Our attitude towards the questions of Tripoli and Persia is undoubtedly influenced by fear of vexing those Europeans who might support Germany. I suggest that if in the future we regard such developments with equal passivity we may be preparing for ourselves, our Empire, and the world a terrible catastrophe of immeasurable proportions.

The Dardanelles Question.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—Keen interest is being evinced here with regard to the delicate question of the Dardanelles. Rightly or wrongly, many Germans seem of opinion that the attitude assumed by Great Britain in this matter will also enable them to determine her future role in international politics; that it will, in short, betoken either a rapprochement between England and Germany or a further drifting asunder. The mot d'ordre, as it were, is here to uphold Turkey's interests in this question. Von der Goltz has lent the weight of his experience and opinions to this end by contributing a special article to the well-known weekly Die Woche, while from conversation with some army men, as well as others whose interests are about the Bosphorus, I gather as a general opinion that any endeavour made by Great Britain towards forwarding and favouring Russia's ardent hope and desire would be to pursue a policy of opportunism, such as would inevitably reap the reward of the hand now licked being bitten on the first convenient opportunity.

La Silhouette. France, Spain and Morocco.

France: "Be careful, Alphonse, it is pretty hard, and your teeth might be broken."

To some extent the views here expressed tally with the opinion held by the Frankfurter Zeitung, from whose yesterday evening's leading article (7th December) I quote as follows:—

"If it be possible (before they have become history) to judge dispassionately such questions of counter interests as those here involved (Russia's and Turkey's), we would be inclined to say that this matter is one in which not Russia's, but only Turkey's vital interests are concerned. And what is more, it so happens that in this instance the interests of all the other Great Powers come into line with those of Turkey, whereas they diverge from those of Russia. It is the rarest thing for any of the Great Powers to want to send their fleet either to the Black Sea or to the Sea of Marmora, while, on the other hand, they cannot but all unite in their wishes to keep Russia out of the Mediterranean." Taking the "immediate situation" into consideration, this journal is of opinion that "all things considered," Russia's fleet might possibly be welcomed by the members of the Triple Entente, its addition serving to strengthen their naval position in those waters. Yet the addition in point of quality and quantity is no great thing, and its value becomes considerably lessened in view of the risk thus run by Great Britain in connection with her overseas interests. "For the past century," the Frankfurter Zeitung observes, "England's veto against this opening of the narrow straits has been a fundamental axiom of her foreign policy, and the veto gave safety to both her roads to India—to the overland route via Constantinople and to the sea route via Suez." Should she, therefore, now reconsider this question, and reconstruct her policy with a view to Russian interests, such a determination would (so thinks the paper in question) be regarded as the outcome of a desire to link the Muscovite Power closer to her—a determination which, seeing how many clashing interests stand in the way, could hardly fail to once more raise the suspicion that the policy pursued was aiming at Germany's isolation. "It would," remarks the Frankfurter, "be difficult to discover any other motive which could induce England to consent to an opening of the passage of the Dardanelles."—I am, Sir, yours, etc.

Calcutta, January 7.

The King-Emperor and Queen-Empress attended Divine Service at the Cathedral this morning.

In the forenoon the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress honoured the Governor-General and Lady Hardinge with a visit at Government House, Barrackpore. Their Imperial Majesties remained to luncheon at Barrackpore and returned to Government House in the afternoon.

Calcutta, January 8.

The King-Emperor and Queen-Empress proceeded from Government House to Princep's Ghat at 11 A.M. After leaving taking the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress entered their carriage and drove in procession from Government House to Princep's Ghat.

On arrival at the Ghat, the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress were received by the Governor-General and Lady Hardinge.

The Hon. Mr. Slacke, Vice-President, then, on behalf of the Legislative Council of Bengal, presented an address to their Imperial Majesties, to which the King-Emperor was graciously pleased to read a reply.

The King-Emperor and Queen-Empress then proceeded on board the steamer Hooghly, where Their Majesties were received by the Vice-Chairman of the Port Commissioners, the Port Officer of Calcutta and the Deputy Conservator of the Port of Calcutta.

As the steamer left Princep's Ghat a salute of 101 guns was fired by H. M. S. Higby.

The steamer escorted by six ferry boats, manned by the Calcutta Port Defence Volunteers, proceeded up the Hooghly River to Howrah Landing Stage, where Their Imperial Majesties disembarked and were received by the Commissioner of Bardwan Division, the Magistrate of Howrah and the Agent of the Bengal Nagpur Railway. The procession was then re-formed and the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress proceeded to Howrah Station.

The Governor-General and Lady Hardinge then had the honour of taking leave and Their Imperial Majesties entered the Royal train which left for Bombay at 12.15 P.M.

Nagpur, January 9.

The King-Emperor and Queen-Empress with the suite in attendance arrived at Nagpur at 2.15 P.M. to-day and on alighting from the train were received by the Chief Commissioner, the Lord Bishop of Nagpur and the General Officer Commanding the Jubbalpore Brigade. Their Imperial Majesties paid a visit to the Fort and proceeded again at 3.15 P.M. by special train for Bombay.

His Imperial Majesty's reply to the University address was as follows:—

"I recall with pleasure the occasion on which, six years ago, I received from the University of Calcutta the Honorary Degree of a Doctor of Law, and I am glad to have an opportunity to-day of showing my deep and earnest interest in the higher education of India. It is to the Universities of India that I look to assist in that gradual union and fusion of the culture and aspiration of Europeans and Indians on which the future wellbeing of India so greatly depends. I have watched with sympathy the measures that from time to time have been taken by the Universities of India to extend the scope and raise the standards of instruction. Much remains to be done. No University is nowadays complete unless it is equipped with teaching faculties in all the more important branches of the sciences and the arts and unless it provides ample opportunities for research. You have to conserve the ancient learning and simultaneously to push forward Western science. You have also to build up character, without which learning is of little value. You say that you recognise your great responsibilities. I bid you God-speed in the work that is before you. Let your ideals be high and your efforts to pursue them unceasing and, under Providence, you will succeed. Six years ago I sent from England to India a message of sympathy. To-day in India I give to India the watchword of Hope. On every side I trace the signs and stirrings of new life. Education has given you hope, and through better and higher education you will build up higher and better hopes. The announcement was made at Delhi by my command that my Governor-General in Council will allot large sums for the expansion and improvement of education in India. It is my wish that there may be spread over the land a network of schools and colleges, from which will go forth loyal and manly and useful citizens able to hold their own in industries and agriculture and all the vocations in life. And it is my wish, that the homes of my Indian subjects may be brightened and their labour sweetened by the spread of knowledge with all that follows in the train, a higher level of thought, of comfort, and of health. It is through education that my wish will be fulfilled and the cause of education in India will ever be very close to my heart. It is gratifying to me to be assured of your devotion to myself and to my House, of your desire to strengthen the bonds of union between Great Britain and India, and of your appreciation of the advantages which you enjoy under British Rule. I thank you for your loyal and dutiful address."

His Imperial Majesty in reply to the Bengal Legislative Council's address, said:—

"The Queen-Empress and I are deeply moved by the words of your address. And they are not empty words. They have been amply and visibly proved by the enthusiastic reception accorded to us on our arrival here, and no less by affectionate demonstrations with which we have been greeted everywhere and by all classes in Calcutta and its surrounding neighbourhood. For the remainder of our lives we shall remember with feelings of pride and emotion the stirring experience of these past eight days. We shall recall the warm-hearted greeting extended to us on our arrival in your capital, and the sight of those patient and sympathetic multitudes which had assembled from all parts of the province to testify their loyalty and devotion to my Throne and person. And I am gratified by the assurances given in your address that these outward proofs of allegiance and affection reflect the general sentiments of your fellow-subjects throughout the length and breadth of North Eastern India. Nor shall we forget the striking scenes and brilliant displays which have been so successfully organised and carried out to celebrate our visit. The people of Bengal offer us as a farewell gift their 'overflowing love and gratitude.' Rest assured that the Queen-Empress and I could ask for nothing more precious to us and to our children. We take it back to them to be cherished by them as a priceless heirloom. Our hearts are too full to express adequately the gratitude for all you have done to welcome us at home amongst you. In bidding you farewell, the Queen-Empress and I fervently pray that all my subjects in Bengal, of whatever race or creed, united by the ties of sympathy and brotherly love, may, under Divine guidance, ever strive towards the advancement of their common happiness, contentment and general wellbeing."

Their Imperial Majesties the King-Emperor and Queen-Empress left Bombay on the evening of the 10th instant on board H. M. S. Medusa after being the recipients of most enthusiastic farewell demonstrations from the vast crowds as they passed from the Victoria Terminus to the Apollo Bunder.

On arrival at the Apollo Bunder the King and Queen were received at the pavilion by Sir Richard Lamb who presented an address on behalf of the people of the Bombay Presidency.

The following is the text of the King-Emperor's speech in reply to the address:—

I thank you sincerely on behalf of the Queen-Empress and myself for the kind and generous terms of the address of farewell which you present in the name of the people of the Bombay Presidency. The cordial welcome which we received on our arrival in your Capital was the prelude to that display of warm-hearted loyalty which has characterised every stage of our progress during the past five weeks. And now we have listened with mingled feelings of gratification and sorrow to your touching words of farewell and Godspeed. Your hopeful forecast as to the benefits which India will derive from this visit deepens our thankfulness at having accomplished the earnest wish of our heart. It has given me infinite pleasure to be once more among my faithful subjects in India and the Queen-Empress and I have been touched beyond words by the genuine love and devotion towards us which we feel have entered into the spirit of the people. Our one and only cause of regret during these past happy weeks has been our inability to stay longer in this country and to visit the ancient Presidency of Madras and the States of the many Chiefs who have offered us their generous hospitality. On leaving the shores of India we carry lasting memories of experiences made pleasant by every means that thoughtful care and affectionate regard could devise. We fervently trust that our visit may, by God's grace, conduce to the general good of the people of this great Continent. Their interests and wellbeing will always be as near and as dear to me as those of millions of my subjects in other quarters of the globe. It is a matter of intense satisfaction to me to realise how all classes and creeds have joined together in the true-hearted welcome which has been so universally accorded to us. Is it not possible that the same unity and concord may, for the future, govern the daily relations of their private and public life? The attainment of this would indeed be to us a happy outcome of our visit to India. To you, the representatives of Bombay, who have greeted us so warmly on our arrival and departure, I deliver this, our message of loving farewell to the Indian Empire. May the Almighty ever assist me and my successors in the earnest endeavour to promote its welfare and to secure to it the blessings of prosperity and peace.

In a press communiqué the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal forwards copies of the following telegrams.—

From the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to the Private Secretary to His Majesty the King-Emperor (Jan. 9).—"The Lieutenant-Governor, on behalf of the people of Bengal, tenders respectful and devoted homage. The prayers of all classes are offered for Their Imperial Majesties' safe journey, long life and increasing happiness."

From Lord Stamfordham (King-Emperor's Camp, Kriyan) to Lieutenant-Governor, Bengal (Jan. 10).—"Their Imperial Majesties heartily thank you and the people of Bengal for the kind message of good wishes which you send on their behalf and for their prayers for Their Imperial Majesties safe return home. Their Imperial Majesties most earnestly trust that the future may bring to the people of Bengal all possible happiness and prosperity."

A meeting was held on the 10th instant in the Strachey Hall of the Aligarh College in which Their Majesties' portraits were shown to the audience amidst great acclamation. The portraits have been graciously presented to the College with Their Majesties' autograph signatures. The following resolutions were unanimously passed.—That the Trustees, Staff, Students, Old Boys and Friends of the College assembled in meeting humbly offer Their Majesties their most sincere and hearty thanks for the gracious gift of their portraits to the College. They beg also to offer their best loyal wishes for a happy voyage and the safe return of Their Majesties to England. That the Trustees, Staff, Students, Old Boys and Friends of the College assembled in large meeting convened on the re-opening of the College after five weeks' Puchar holidays offer their most sincere and heartfelt congratulations to the benevolent chiefs of India, Muhammadan leaders, distinguished supporters of the College, kind benefactors of the community and honored members of their Staff upon whom His Majesty has been graciously pleased to confer well deserved distinctions and honours on the occasion of the Durbar and afterwards.

The following Press Communiqué has been issued.—

Raja Bahadur Ram Ranjan Chuckerlary of Itanpur in the district of Birbhum, who has made a gift of Rs. 50,000 for charitable purposes to the Queen-Empress, has received the thanks of Her Imperial Majesty for his signal act of generosity. Her Imperial Majesty has graciously decided to distribute this sum as well as Rs. 20,000 received from the Bengal Government as the proceeds of the ground rent for spectators' stands on the Calcutta maidan to the following charitable institutions—Dufferin Hospital Rs. 10,000, The Refuge, Hindu Widows' (Melvany), St. Vincent's Home, Albert Victor Hospital, St. Andrew's Colonial Homes, Oxford Mission, Little Sisters of the Poor, Hospitals in Suri (Birbhum District), Rs. 5,000 each; Young Women's Christian Association, Young Men's Christian Association, St. Mary's Home, Missions to Seamen (Church of England), Missions to Seamen (Baptist), Rs. 4,000 each: total Rs. 70,000.

China.

Reuter wired from Peking:—The Imperial troops have completed the evacuation of Hankow.

The Powers have occupied the line from Peking to the sea in accordance with the plan recently desired. Foreigners are gratified at this demonstration.

Reuter wired from Shanghai on January 6th:—The Republicans have issued a long manifesto to all friendly nations reciting their grievances against the Manchus. The manifesto declares that it is the determination of the Republic to respect all treaties, loans, and obligations entered into by the Manchus with foreigners prior to the revolution and to repudiate all others. Further, it is the aim of the Government so to reform the laws, administration and finances as to promote the prosperity of the whole country, to abolish restrictions on trade, to ensure religious toleration and to promote better relations with Foreign Powers, to whose support the Republic appeals.

Reuter wired from Peking.—Consular telegrams from Chinking state that the revolutionaries have executed Chaorifeng, Viceroy of Szechuan, and the Imperialist General Tien.

Discussing the Chinese revolution, the Times remarks that Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen's curious manifesto does not bring matters any nearer to a practical solution and excludes a pacific compromise. The sole wish of Great Britain, says the paper, is the re-establishment in China as speedily as possible of a form of Government both stable and progressive. It is absolutely indifferent to Great Britain what that form of Government may be. The Times nevertheless cannot help doubting whether the Republicans for all their Western education can succeed in setting up a system of Government in a setting alien to the most deep-rooted traditions and prejudices of the Chinese nation. The Times welcomes the Foreign occupation of the Peking Railway, which is "authorised by the protocol of 1901 and justified by the uncertainties of the situation."

Sir Robert Fulton (formerly Mr. Justice Rampart of the Calcutta High Court) writing in the Times on the future of Tibet urges that it would be greatly to the advantage of England for the Dalai Lama to resume rule. Sir Robert says the Dalai Lama is indebted to us for asylum and means of subsistence and sees that Great Britain does not want to annex the country. His feeling towards China, continues the writer, must be exactly the opposite. It would surely be easy, therefore, in the present upheaval in China to arrange that Tibet should be an independent State under the joint protection of Great Britain and China but interfered with internally by neither.

Reuter wired from Shanghai.—An Englishman named Felgate, an ex-consular, has been murdered by robbers at Makanshan Chiking, where he was a storekeeper.

Reuter wired from Peking.—The Armistice has not been renewed and negotiations are at a deadlock. Government expects and hopes that the revolutionaries will move northward and thus give an opportunity for a pitched battle, as owing to the want of funds, Government is unable to send southward a sufficient force to secure victory. Merchants at Tientsin complain that the Imperial troops are needlessly side-tracking goods traffic and declare that the foreign trade of Tientsin is impeded.

Russia has notified China that the latter must recognise the independence of outer Mongolia as far as internal affairs are concerned under a dignitary of the Lamaite Church, who was recently proclaimed autocratic sovereign at Urga. Russia will assist the Mongolians in the maintenance of order and will construct a railway from Kialita to Urga. Henceforth China will not be allowed to maintain troops nor colonies in outer Mongolia but external affairs will be permitted to remain in China's hands. China has not yet replied.

The Russian Charge d'Affaires has informed the Chinese Government that a reply is expected to the Russian Note regarding Mongolia without delay.

The report of the Russian demands to China with regard to Mongolia and that she is preparing to occupy Mongolia are officially contradicted in St. Petersburg. The denial has caused surprise in London in view of the positive statement from Peking.

A detachment of Russian troops destined for Mongolia is approaching the Kiakhta frontier in order to clear the adjacent Mongolian territory of wandering Chinese, who will be transported to Manchuria. Several hundred Chinese immigrants have attacked a Mongolian official at Mumeishan who asked the Russians to assist him.

A further detachment of Baluchis and artillery have been despatched to Canton.

The American Government is sending five hundred troops to assist in guarding the railway from Peking to the sea.

M. De Krupensky, Councillor to the Russian Embassy at Vienna, will shortly replace M. Korostovetz, Russian Minister at Peking. M. De Krupensky is a distinguished expert on Far Eastern affairs and was Secretary to the Legation at Peking during the Boxer outbreak.

Russia's move in Mongolia excites little interest at Tokio as it has been expected. It is presumed that Russia previously obtained the consent of the Powers. The Government organ Chuo assumes that the action will be counterbalanced by similar British action in Tibet, thus leading to the internationalisation of the Chinese question.

The Japanese papers are unanimous that the Russian action in Mongolia explodes the theory of the territorial integrity of China.

certainly with regard to the outer provinces. They declare that the move will lead inevitably to a change of the policy of the Powers and to international dissensions which will result in similar action being taken in Tibet, Yunnan and elsewhere.

A long semi-official statement is issued in St. Petersburg on the subject of Russia and Mongolia. The statement says that the Mongolians, after declaring their independence, asked for the protection of Russia, who advised that efforts be made to come to an understanding with China. At the request of both parties Russia undertook to mediate. She pointed out to the Chinese Government that Mongolia's individuality must be safeguarded against violation, such as the organisation of Chinese troops and the settlement of Chinese in Mongolia. Russia had no aggressive designs on Mongolia, but should Mongolia break her bonds with China, important interests of Russia would compel her to enter into business relations with Mongolia.

The Reunion of Bengal.

The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the Anjuman Islamiya held at Manikganj on the 10th instant:—

"Since Islam preaches loyalty to the Sovereign and loyalty consists in implicit obedience to his will, resolved that not even a feeble voice be raised against the announcement of His Imperial Majesty regarding the partition, fatal though it is to our cause, but that His Excellency the Governor General may be approached by our leaders and impressed with the justice of our demand for the removal of our grievances."

At a large and representative meeting of Muhammedans of Feni held on the 9th instant the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"The heart-rending news of the modification of the partition of Bengal was received by the Anjuman with a considerable amount of disappointment and despair, but our Islamic loyal feeling dictates to us to accept the announcement of His Imperial Majesty, which is considered to be irrevocable. The injury done to our cause, however, necessitates our leaders to move the Supreme Government to favourably consider our critical situation and safeguard our interests."

The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the Gribandha Muhammedan Association held on the 10th instant:—

"That the Muhammedans of this part have received the proclamation of His Imperial Majesty modifying the Partition of Bengal with grave concern and demands acquiescence, and they therefore accept it, while they consider it high time, since this administrative change seems prejudicial to their interests, that their leaders lay bare the situation to His Excellency the Governor General and do all they can to protect Muhammedan interests."

The Imperial Legislative Council.

At the meeting of the Supreme Legislative Council, held on the 10th instant, the Hon. Sir S. H. Butler in reply to the Hon. Mr. Gokhale's question re expenditure on primary education, said:—"The sum of 50 lakhs for 'promotion of truly popular education' announced by His Excellency the Governor General on the day of the Coronation Durbar at Delhi will be an Imperial grant in addition to the existing expenditure on primary education and will be an annually recurring grant."

The Hon. Mr. Syed Ali Imam in reply to the Hon. Mr. Gokhale's question re Elementary Education Bill said:—"All communications which have been received on the Elementary Education Bill have been printed as papers relating to the Bill and copies thereof have already been sent to all hon. members. A set of such of them as contain opinions or summaries of opinions of Municipalities and District Boards or Councils is laid on the table; the information which the Hon. Member desires will be found, so far as it can be obtained, in those papers."

The Hon. Mr. MacLagan in reply to the Hon. Mr. Gokhale's question re the position of Provincial Engineers of the Public Works Department said:—"The despatch on the subject of the position of Provincial Engineers of the Public Works Department was sent to the Secretary of State by the mail of the 10th August last. It is expected that his reply will be received at an early date."

The Hon. Sir Archdale Earle in reply to the Hon. Mr. Subba Rao's question re recruitment for the Executive Branch of the Provincial Service said:—"The necessary information has been obtained from Local Governments and a statement is laid on the table which answers the first part of the question asked by the Hon. Member on the 2nd September 1911."

"As regards the second part of the question the Hon. Member is informed that the only province where the executive branch of the Provincial Service is filled exclusively by promotion from the subordinate service is British Baluchistan. The reasons why such a course is adopted are (1) that residents of Baluchistan are not yet fitted for the work of an Extra Assistant Commissioner without considerable preliminary training in subordinate posts and (2) that residents of other provinces can only obtain knowledge of the special conditions of Baluchistan by working in subordinate posts."

TETE À TETE

With the departure of the Medina on the homeward voyage, one of the most significant and fruitful events in Indian history has come to a close.

The Royal Visit.

The visit of Their Imperial Majesties to this country has been, from start to finish, a triumphal progress, carried out with superb grace and brilliance of ceremonial and amidst the unbounded enthusiasm and acclamations of the people. Conceived no doubt with the best of goodwills, the visit was in its nature a unique political experiment, and there were not wanting some in England who felt a little uneasy as to its final results. To-day both England and India are the richer for the visit, and the experiment has been a success such as even the most sanguine optimists could not have dreamed of. It has been to the Indian people a symbol of the union and beneficence of the Empire. It has not only brought Indians and Englishmen nearer together in loving homage to a common sovereign, but has also lifted Indians of all races and creeds out of petty differences and rivalries to a higher plane of self-consciousness and unity of purpose. These are the significant results of the visit which we hope will endure for ever and keep its memory alive as a great landmark in the history of British Rule. Much of the unique success of the Imperial Mission of sympathy and goodwill has been due to the personality of the King-Emperor. Every function in which Their Imperial Majesties took part was a brilliant spectacle, but the personalities of Their Majesties always imparted to it an eminently human note, which rendered the ceremony gracious, beneficent and wise. They have said farewell to their Indian people with a "message of hope" which will keep their memories consumed for ever in hearts full of gratitude. It seems as if a new spirit has come to dwell in the land, and we believe our rulers are beginning to address themselves to the government of the country with ampler sympathy, courage and confidence. With the dawn of a new era the memories of the past racial strifes and communal antagonisms may well be buried in oblivion and all should turn to the problems of the future in a spirit of mutual tolerance, cooperation and regard. Although the recent administrative changes announced at the Durbar have hit the Mussalmans rather hard, they have, nevertheless, quietly bowed to the decision of the Government communicated through their Sovereign. They have no desire to embarrass the Government by the sort of agitation which success has so remarkably justified. Let us hope that the Government will take the earliest opportunity of restoring confidence to millions whose only asset in the bitter political struggles and jealousies of the last decade has indeed been their confidence in the piety and sense of justice of their Government. We are sure His Imperial Majesty, while thinking of India, will not forget the hopes and fears of a community of 70 millions whose loyalty and devotion to his throne and person is second to none in this country. If His Majesty's ministers could be induced to infuse a wider element of sympathy in their relations with the Mussalman races of the world, it would lift a heavy weight of sorrow from the hearts of His Majesty's Mussalman subjects and earn their undying gratitude.

"THE FRIEND and biographer of the late Sir Syed Ahmed", who has obviously secured an active patron in the Associated Press reporter of Lahore, has rushed into print once more, "strongly condemning the advice given by Nawab Vicar-ul-Mulk to Muhammedans in the Aligarh Institute Gazette as regards the revocation of the partition of Bengal." Not very long ago this "friend and biographer" had figured in a vernacular paper of Lahore "strongly advising" the Mussalmans to have no sympathy or interest in the affairs of their brethren abroad. Now he has advised them to cease meddling in their own affairs at home. Perhaps the only decent occupation now left for about 70 millions of poor souls is to furnish a silent background for the evolutions of the self-advertising gentry. To take this ubiquitous tribe seriously is to give it the much-desired notoriety which is the vital breath of its being. The only dignified method of dealing with its virulent manifestations is to treat it with silent contempt. But the ways of the charlatan and the quack are inscrutable, public credulity is sometimes amazing, and then, there is the sensational press. That is why to expose sham and imposture becomes sometimes a public duty. Now, this "friend and biographer" of Sir Syed has thrown out no original idea of a great dynamic force that the Associated Press of India should have been busy telegraphing it to the four corners of the land. The only sensation about his effusions has been that they are paltry, presumptuous and futile. Of course it is open to every notoriety-monger to set about to lecture a whole community or traduce its accredited leaders whose shoes he may be unworthy to unloose. It is, however, little short of the scandalous that this impertinent flapdoodle should be industriously advertised about by a responsible press agency. We do not know who told the press reporter that the author of these precious communications on Moslem affairs and policy is the "biographer of the late Sir Syed Ahmed," unless it be the writer himself. That distinction belongs to General Graham in England and the great Hali in India. As to his being a "friend" of the late Sir Syed, all we need say is that never was the privilege, if at all enjoyed, more shamelessly abused. It is indeed a matter of humiliation and shame to all genuine friends of the great reformer that the community for which he laboured so unselfishly and so hard should have fallen on the type of "advisers" who have begun to exploit the prestige of his great name in serving their own ends. "This friend and biographer" of Sir Syed is not the only gentleman who, in these anxious times, fishing in troubled waters. Let us hope he will catch, if nothing more substantial, at least a stray Khan Bahadurship, and thenceforth cease from troubling the Mussalmans. It is a characteristic weakness of the community that it suffers fools gladly. The only way of getting rid of them is to pray that they may speedily get what they want. That is their only punishment.

THE Statement showing the proportion of appointments of Rs 500 and over held by Indians and Europeans in 1910 as compared with 1903 and 1867 which was promised in reply to a question put by the Hon. the Raja of Dighapata was laid on the table of the Viceroy's Legislative Council on the 10th instant. It shows the following interesting results —

Communities	1867		1903		1910
	Number of posts	Per cent	Number of posts	Per cent	Number of posts	Per cent
Europeans and Europeans	2,048	93.8	3,254	94.3	4,466	87.4
Hindus ..	99	4.5	525	13.1	782	14.5
Mussalmans	35	1.0	96	2.5	142	2.6
	134	6.1	626	15.6	924	17.1
Total	2,182	99.9	3,876	99.9	5,392	99.9

It is some consolation to think that more Indians are securing higher posts in the administration of their country every day; but when the rate of progression is taken into account, it appears that instead of advancing we are retrogressing. An increase of 9.5 per cent. in the 36 years that intervened between 1867 and 1903 gave hopes that in 130 years from 1903, Indians would hold about half the number of such posts. But in the seven years that have elapsed since then the rate of progress of the previous 36 years has not been maintained, and even if there is no further falling off and the rate of the last seven years is maintained, it will take 153 years to arrive at that devoutly to be wished consummation. In 1910 exactly 153 years had elapsed since Clive won at Plassy, and at this rate the same time must elapse again before the fast multiplying three hundred millions of Indians secure an equality of high posts with half a hundred million of His Majesty's white subjects. But unless every five years similar statistics are compiled, and a searching inquiry takes place into the progress of Indians in sharing in the administration of their country, there is grave danger of their lagging behind. A hundred and thirty years was in all conscience a long enough time to wait, but it has been prolonged by an additional thirty, or the life of a whole generation. The fear is that after another seven years the interval of waiting may be prolonged by an added generation or two. But while we deplore the reduced speed of the advance of India as a whole, we have to mourn in a greater degree the slackening speed of Moslem advance. In 1867, the Hindus held 4.5 per cent. and the Mussalmans 1.6 per cent. of such posts. That was something like proportionate misery, and although in 1867 it was felt specially severely by the Mussalmans, who had been ruling for all practical purposes until a decade ago, it could well be explained by the suspicions entertained of them by panic-stricken and nervous officials and by their own backwardness in western education. But in the next 36 years, while the Hindus improved their position from 4.5 per cent. of such posts to 13.1, or nearly trebled their share, the Mussalmans advanced from 1.6 to 2.5 per cent. merely. This rate of progress was only a sixth of that with which the Hindus advanced, and had it not been for the efforts of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan the Mussalmans would have totally disappeared from the higher branches of the administration. But what shall we say of the advance made in the last seven years? It is true that the Hindus advanced from 13.1 to 14.5 per cent. or merely 1.4 per cent. in seven years. But even this low figure gives them a rate of 2 per cent. of advance every year, while the Mussalmans, who have been making rapid strides in higher education for some time past, advanced from 2.5 to 2.6 per cent. or 1 per cent. in the whole period. It cannot be said that the Moslem advance in education in the last seven years has been only half of the improvement that has taken place in the condition of Hindus every year, and if that is not so, may we ask those good people who are never tired of accusing the Government of unduly favouring the Mussalmans to explain this demonstration of tender regard for the "favourite wife"? We hope this is the last that we have heard of favouritism towards Mussalmans. But we have still a word to say to those estimable leaders of the Mussalmans who have been most strenuous in hushing Moslem cries for justice with counsels of patience and perfection. Are they sure they are satisfied with a dividend of 1 per cent. in seven years on their precipitate investments in the Bank of Contentment? Possibly they have been favoured with bonuses and private perquisites in the shape of titles. But they have been purchased rather dearly at such tremendous cost to their community and, even at that, what are they but trifles and gewgaws? In the last 13 years while Indians have advanced from 6.1 to 17.1 per cent., the Mussalmans have progressed from 1.6 to 2.6 per cent. Out of an increase of 11 per cent. the shares of the "favourite" is a paltry 1 per cent. Such is "favouritism" and such the fruit of contentment. Could the Dead Sea apple of the fable be fairer to the eye and more like ashes in the mouth?

THE forebaste of what Russian "provisional occupation" means in reality has been supplied in unstinted measure to the credulous world that still pinned its faith on the hopes of Sir Edward Grey and the vociferous phariseism of the Times.

Persia

After expelling Persian officials, shelling down prominent buildings to the ground and occupying Tabriz, the Cossack legionary was let loose on peaceful inhabitants who were massacred indiscriminately in cold blood. As if this was not enough to satisfy the blood-lust of the invader, a regular court martial was set up to hunt out and put to death all the most prominent and self-respecting Persian patriots who had by chance escaped death in the general massacre. This codified institution of murder has since been doing its work of execution with unsparing thoroughness and despatch. The "military exigencies" with which the Times sought to condone the Italian atrocities in Tripoli have again been invoked by this abject admirer of Russian methods, though naturally in this case the phrase is more decisive and the tone more relentless. "It is not wonderful that Russians should refuse to treat such adversaries, many of whom are Russian subjects, as ordinary belligerents. The disarmament of the Eidars would be justified in self defence and the destruction of places of resistance may also be justified if carried out without unnecessary harshness. We have never yet known any aggression, tyranny, international iniquity or crime — be it the suppression of a just and humanitarian cause or the destruction of a struggling nationality — for which the Times has failed to find justification. If Russia were to crush the whole Persian nation under her iron heel, the Times would perhaps still justify it as a measure necessary in the interests of 'peace and order,' and in the silence of death it would thank the Russians that the destruction was 'carried out without unnecessary harshness.' As to the many adversaries being 'Russian subjects,' we imagine the theory is not at all a novel one in view of the Russian pretensions over the whole of Northern Persia. All Persians may have been claimed as subjects of the Tsar, but leaving aside the sickening humbug of the Times, even the 'semi-official Rossiya' admits that fifteen Persians have been executed, though it considers the murders as 'a mild satisfaction.' As a matter of fact the best and noblest of Persians, devoted patriots, men of intelligence and courage, and venerable and pious leaders of faith, have been picked out and shot one after the other for the 'satisfaction' of the Russian soldiery. Their only crime was that they had yet some spark of self-respect and manhood left in them and could not see unmoved the humiliation and enslavement of their motherland. They are martyrs in the cause of liberty, surely the noblest cause that ever moved man to death-defying heroism. Yet Europe is silent, Sir Edward Grey is, ostrich-like, denying that anything of the sort has happened, and the Times is by its cynical effusions tarnishing the most glorious chapter of English history. Europe may have lost its moral sensibilities but the murders have created immense horror and disgust amongst the nations of the East. The consequences of the Russian action and Sir Edward Grey's shuffling will be, in pursuance of the modern practice of statecraft, visited on Persia. Every possible device has been resorted to in order to render the establishment of peace and good government in the country impossible. And now that the desired chaos has been created, the Persian Government is being accused of incapacity and impotence. The Times, therefore, thinks itself "justified" in recommending "the immediate occupation of the harbours of the Gulf." It is needless to trace the successive links in the diplomatic chain, from the faint growls of "correspondents" to military intervention, with which territorial aggrandisements are accomplished in these piping times of peace. The history of some of the recent transactions about Morocco and Tripoli furnishes the classical examples of the modern method. What we are concerned with for the present is the hope that British statesmen may yet recognise the supreme danger that threatens the most vital interests of the Empire before it is too late. We know that the Indian Government was from the very outset opposed to the policy hitherto pursued by Sir Edward Grey. But in view of the recent misadventure of Consul Smart, it is quite possible that the central facts of the situation may be ignored and the passion for revenge or vindication of British prestige may become predominant. It has not often happened that a measure or a policy of the British Government was condemned by overwhelming public opinion, but that when some untoward incident occurred as a direct consequence of that policy, the initial blunder was for the moment forgotten and the cry went up to punish those who happened to be the more secondary and incidental causes of the incident. This is characteristic of the British public whose tiger qualities the Jingo Press never fails to call into play. We hope the British Government will look upon the Smart incident in its true proportion and would be satisfied with the reparation promised by the Persian Government without taking undue advantage of its weak and helpless condition. In the present helpless state of Persia does the prestige of the mighty British nation need any vindication? It is some consolation to think that the Liberal Press has at last awakened to the terrible muddle into which the British foreign policy has been allowed to drift by the incapacity of Sir Edward Grey. The fall of this weak minister may or may not come soon, but he would leave behind a mutilated Persia bleeding under the heels of a ruthless enemy and a heavy responsibility for British statesmen. If any prediction can at all be safe in the nebulous atmosphere of modern diplomacy and international relations, it may be confidently asserted that the Middle Eastern problem is only just entering the stage that will tax all the resources of British statesmanship. It has in it all the elements of becoming the most formidable danger to the British Empire in the East. It has already changed the whole trend of Middle Eastern questions and it will call new and uncalculable forces into play in the near future. Turkey is directly concerned in the Russian aggression in the North West of Persia and Afghanistan is equally involved in the advance of the Russians in the North and of the British in the South. Is the British Government prepared to embitter Turkish feeling still further, and to weaken the position of Afghanistan, which it has ever sought to strengthen, simply relying on the goodfaith of the Muscovites and trusting that British complaisance in Persia will purchase Russian indifference if not hostility towards Germany? Then what of the Moslem feeling in India and elsewhere? We are glad that the Englishman regards it as a "difficult and delicate situation" but we doubt whether the difficulty or the delicacy could be diminished by the publication of such leaders as the one that appears in this morning's issue of that journal, which betrays in every line scissors-and-paste and perhaps the hand of the office-boy in revising the proofs. Surely the transfer of the capital is not but our contemporary so hard that it cannot afford to ask someone to write its leading articles who understands the difference between Darul Harb and Darul Salam. We do not know what cases of Mussalman speak of Darul Harb as if it was the same as "Islamistan." But the office-boy of the Englishman knows better, and we bow to his omniscience.

M. TOFAI AHMED SAHEB, an Old Boy and Trustee of the Aligarh College, undertook some time ago to compile a Directory giving the names, addresses and some other particulars of all those who had received their education at Aligarh. The labours of M. Tofai Ahmed Sahab have almost been completed and the Directory is now in the press. The task has been rather heavy and it is quite possible that several names may have been missed. We have, therefore, been asked by the Honorary Secretary of the Old Boys' Association to request all gentlemen to communicate to the compiler their present addresses with particulars about their respective residence, date of admission in the college and the class they joined. We hope the information will be supplied without delay to M. Tofai Ahmed Sahab, Manglaur, District Saharanpur.

The Comrade.

The Recent Changes and the Indian Member.

WE PUBLISH elsewhere the letter of a correspondent who takes the Hon. the Law Member of H.E. the Viceroy's Executive Council to task for not having seen things eye to eye with us and our correspondent. We are rather sorry for the Law Member, for it is not customary here, as it is for Cabinet Ministers in England, that individual members of the Government take up cudgels on their own behalf. A Member of the Executive Council in India must suffer in silence, for he cannot defend himself individually, and it is for this reason perhaps that individual members are not generally singled out for attack. With this opening remark we must leave the Hon. the Law Member to discover what procedure he can find to defend himself. We are, however, chiefly concerned about ourselves, for our correspondent also tells us that we have been "strangely silent" on the subject of the Law Member's attitude. Our position is easily explained. In fact our correspondent has already explained it for us. When the Government of India has been criticised by us as a whole it is clear that the Hon. the Law Member has not escaped scotfree. We certainly expected and still expect from him a good deal more than from his colleagues, whose knowledge of India cannot be half as intensive as his own, even if it be regarded as equally extensive. To that extent his share of blame must be greater, for he cannot plead ignorance as easily as his colleagues, though we have yet to discover a bureaucrat who publicly relied on that plea and acknowledged, like our ex-Minister of England, his "colossal ignorance of India." These considerations appeared to us to be too obvious to need emphasis. But if "Azad" thinks it necessary for us to admit all this, we can have no hesitation.

Soon after he had taken over charge of his new post, the Hon. Mr. Ali Ibrahim had an opportunity of explaining his general attitude to his fellow countrymen at the public dinner given in his honour at the Town Hall here. He said on that occasion that "it has to be remembered that he is first and above all a minister of the Crown." In view of the difference in the constitution of the Government of India and the British Cabinet, this reminder was, we think, a word in season, for we were apt to imagine that the Indian Member of the Viceroy's Council was a representative of the people, and as such responsible to them precisely in the same manner as a Member of the British Cabinet returned to Parliament by a constituency of the people. We are glad that the correspondent whose letter we publish has not fallen into that error. But we trust the Indian Member of the Council will not fall into the opposite error of regarding himself as nothing beyond a limb of the bureaucracy which, with the best of intentions, knows, alas! so little of what passes in the heart and the brain of India.

Like "Azad" we, too, cannot conceive that the Indian Member knew so little of India as to think that the scheme of the Government of India which on the face of it has his full approval, would also meet with the approval of all communities and classes in India, including the Moslem community of which he is so distinguished a member, and which he led so ably at a very critical juncture in spite of the insurgents. If the supposition that he did not know this cannot be correct, one of two things must have happened. He may either have considered the case of the Mussalmans of Bengal and Behar too weak to merit his support, or he may have consented to his colleagues' scheme with the assurance that some "compensation" would be offered later on to the Mussalmans as well. We do not know which of these suppositions is true, and we have no means of knowing either. The published despatch bears clear evidence in every line that it was written more in order to be published to the people of India than with a view to convince the Secretary of State in England. The papers display a remarkable unanimity of opinion not only in the Viceroy's Council, but also between the Secretary of State and the Government of India. It is inconceivable that changes so tremendous and so sudden could have been conceived, discussed, elaborated, and decided upon without giving to the various Members of the Viceroy's Council, who may be presumed to think each for himself, many occasions for differing from their colleagues, and to an independent Secretary of State innumerable opportunities for legitimate criticism and for referring repeatedly to the Government of India. But so far as the Secretary of State is concerned, his despatch betrays an abnormal degree of complaisance. Are we to believe that a masterful Viceroy, or some other individual Member of the Government of India, carried all before him in the Viceroy's Council as well? Such complaisance as Lord Crewe has shown was unthinkable in the case of Lord Morley. But it was after all the tradition of the India Office in the days of Sir Henry Fowler and Lord George Hamilton, and also of Mr. St. John Brodrick before he quarrelled with the Government of India over the Kitchener-Curzon affair. As for the Viceroy's Council, it is well known that there was far too much of the Viceroy and far too little of the Council in the days of Lord

Curzon. In Lord Minto's Viceroyalty the Secretary of the State was much more assertive than he had been in recent times, and what initiative and control the Government of India retained is supposed to have been the dear possession of the secretariat. A Bombay contemporary rejoiced not so long ago at the fact that India possessed under Lord Hardinge a real and not only a nominal Council Government. If that be true, there must be many interesting papers relating to the new changes which are not yet published, and which may never be published at all, and we trust that somewhere among them there are clear and emphatic minutes written over the signature of the Hon. Mr. Ali Imam displaying his "distinct individuality."

All this, however, is mere conjecture. All that we are permitted to know is that the Government of India found discretion to be the better part of valour and sought refuge from Bengali agitation and the consequent bureaucratic repression in the flight to Delhi; that they knew only too well that the transfer of the capital would mean a terrible recrudescence in Bengal of the agitation and anarchy that were only just subsiding; that the reunion of Bengal alone could prevent this; that a mere reversal of the policy of Lord Curzon would be too great a triumph for the Bengalis and too great a humiliation for the Government, while creating a province too big to be well administered, that this could be prevented, and the face of the Government saved to some extent, by making Behar a separate province, and adding to it Orissa and Chhota Nagpur; that the triumph of the Bengalis, who are discontented, would be tempered by the greater triumph of the Beharis, who are sturdy and loyal, and that their sorrow would be drowned in the greater sorrow of the Mussalmans, who are only loyal and contented.

This chain of reasoning is indeed so well linked together that once the flight to Delhi was decided upon no other conclusions could have been possible except those arrived at by the Government of India. We are not, therefore, able to guess what the Law Member, or any other Member of Council, has done for the "loyal and contented" Mussalmans. It may be that he took a leading part in inducing his colleagues to transfer the capital and, if so, the Mussalmans of India as a whole owe much to him. But, as we have explained in an earlier issue, the "restoration" of Delhi is in itself no "boon" to the Mussalmans. Moslem Delhi is, perhaps, beyond the skill of the restorer. Even a quarter of a century ago when a Hindu-Moslem riot took place at Delhi, a Mussalman rowdy caught a Hindu merchant, who was driving in a carriage and pair, and began to belabour him. Thanks to the social assimilation of the Moghals, the Hindus of Delhi can hardly be distinguished from their Moslem brethren, and this astute Hindu at once cried out that he was a Mussalman. "Do you think I am a fool?" said his assailant. "My good fellow, there are no Mussalmans in Delhi who could afford to drive in a carriage and pair!" What a commentary this on the thoroughness of the revenge that was wreaked in 1858 for the wickedness of a few and the weakness or folly of many. Sir John Tenniel then drew a powerful picture of the "Revenge of the British Lion on the Bengal Tiger" for Punch, but more than 50 years afterwards it appears that it is the Bengal Tiger that has frightened the British Lion, while the descendants of those on whom the vengeance was wreaked in the madness of excitement and in utter ignorance more than fifty years ago are now expected to find comfort in their vainly-hoped-for resurrection. Well may Moslem Delhi say with the Poet of Delhi.

ہاے اوس زود پھیمان کا پھیمان ہوا

(He has resolved to give up oppressing his friends after having killed me. Oh the premature repentance of the penitent!)

But while Moslem Delhi is dead, Islam is not yet dead in India, and the transfer of the capital to the North, where Moslem rule lasted for eight centuries, and which is even to-day the seat of their culture and the nerve-centre of 70 million Mussalmans, will give to them at least one fair chance of competing with other communities of India which they sorely needed, but which they could not have secured from a Government too much under the influence of Bengal. The rest lies with them; not with the Government. We do not mean to suggest that the Government has no duty to Mussalmans left unperformed. The interests of the minorities are safeguarded in the Councils to some extent, but the pledge of Lord Minto to give to the Mussalmans separate and adequate representation in the local bodies is still unredeemed, and Lord Hardinge as well as Mr. Ali Imam would be judged by the way they honour the pledges of their predecessors. There is still a great disparity between the proportions in which Hindus and Mussalmans share administrative appointments, and this too must soon be removed. Last, but in point of usefulness the foremost, is the question of Moslem education. The Moslem University is not yet an accomplished fact. Mussalmans have yet to secure the removal of hampering, and in some cases humiliating, restrictions which the Government would impose on them, and even those good folks who had such a tender regard for the position of the Government and its difficulties and possible embarrassment must have by now been convinced that the Government for which they have always been so abnormally solicitous has not the same tender regard, at any rate, for their position, their difficulties and their certain embarrassment. Moreover, the Mussalmans must agitate—though not exactly in the now approved fashion of Bengal—for a pro rata allotment of the educational grant for the education of the Mussalmans. With as full a control of their education in their own hands as possible under the altered circumstances, the Mussalmans can yet work out their salvation without waiting for the tardy doles of Government, which are extorted from pity not unmixed with contempt. In everything must they guide their actions according to enlightened self-interest, and in everything must they be self-reliant. As "Azad" well puts it, they must be "loyal" to the core, but not "contented." In the words of the Zamindar,

آسمان سر پہ ارٹھا لو تو کہلنا در لطف

کہ وفا اور عقیدت کی یہ پہچان ہے آج

(Move heaven and earth with clamour and the gates of kindness will be opened unto you, for to-day clamour is the surest sign of loyalty and faith)

But, although to our infinite regret the Government failed to utilize the presence of His Majesty the King-Emperor in India at this juncture for restoring its equilibrium to Moslem feeling, which is, for obvious reasons, far from normal, we have still reason to believe that the universal grievance of the Mussalmans of Bengal has attracted the notice of the Secretary of State and of the Government of India and that their claims are receiving serious consideration at the hands of the Local Government of Eastern Bengal and the Imperial Government. We do not know to what "safeguards" "Azad" refers as "promised in the Despatch of the Government of India." We have failed to discover any such promises, and perhaps the writer is misled by the hope expressed by the Government that the existing provisions for safeguarding the interests of minorities would prevent any untoward results that may follow the extinction of a Moslem majority in Eastern Bengal. Be that as it may, we are led to believe that the "compensation" is the subject at present of the fullest deliberation. But we may be permitted to ask if such deliberation could not as well have been bestowed on the "compensation" to other interests before the bolt was hurled from the blue a month ago? Are we to understand that sins must always be committed in a hurry but that repentance alone must come at leisure?

In the whole situation there is, however, one redeeming feature. Since "the most commendable departure in throwing open the Council preserve to the people of this country" was made, two great questions have come up before the Government, the Reform of the Councils and the modification of the Partition; and it is significant that while the former, which received the wholehearted support of the Mussalmans, was carried out when a Hindu was a member of the Government, the latter, which receives the universal approbation of the Hindus, comes into effect while a Mussalman holds his portfolio. Apart from the merits of both measures, it is a great source of satisfaction to us to feel that both the eminent Indians who were entrusted with such unique responsibility have acquitted themselves in a manner which may or may not deserve the applause of their co-religionists, but which cannot, and does not receive the least opprobrium from those of the other faith. This must give the quietus to the prophecies of evil that emanated from such Cassandras as the Pioneer on more than one occasion. To the Hon. the Law Member we wish to say only one word and no more, and we trust we may say this without casting the least reflection on his character or actions. Lord Minto rightly said that a strong man was he who was not afraid of being called weak. It is our belief that, similarly, a just man is he who is not afraid of appearing a partisan.

Europe and the Muhammadan World.

SIR HARRY H. JOHNSON has contributed an article under the above heading to the December issue of the Nineteenth Century in which, taking as his text the Italian invasion of Tripoli, he discusses the general situation in the Moslem world and more particularly the bearing of Islam on human development. The theme is vast beyond imagining, and Sir Harry has approached it with the brusque assurance of a dilettante nurtured on agnostic philosophy. Naturally enough, his treatment of a most complicated subject is a powerful illustration of the absurdities characteristic of the method. An impressionist study of the character and influences of Islam, based on a priori assumptions that are no better than, for instance, the vexatious vanities of a dandy about his smart appearance, cannot furnish even a faint suggestion as to the true nature and import of the dynamic forces of ethnology, race, climate, social and political environment regulated by the religion of Islam. As it is, the writer has addressed himself to the discussion of this tremendous problem with a mind singularly intolerant, untrained to complex sociological reasoning, reflecting the worst illiberalism of doubt and obsessed by Christian bias.

We need not, even if we could, traverse the illimitable field of inquiry that Sir Harry Johnston's wild assumptions might naturally tempt one to explore. The utmost that is possible at present is to state his central thesis with reference to the nature of Islam as a force in the secular development of mankind. He proceeds with the hypothesis that religion, like any other important factor in human progress, is a secular force, that it must grow and develop and undergo necessary modifications in order to adapt itself to growing human needs. From this he argues that Islam, a very imperfect creed at best, became atrophied in process of time, and has since then kept its followers weighted down with the burden of dead formulas and "narrow mentality." That the writer has scant belief in religion as Divine revelation, absolute and immutable, would be amply borne out by the following passage:—

Perhaps, indeed, Islam may never precisely range itself under the banner of Christ just as the Jews will go on for a century or so pretending to ignore the greatest Jew (if he was a Jew) in history. Similarly, during the same period much that is extravagant, outworn, pagan, open to doubt, will drop off from European Christianity. At the rate at which the world is now advancing all civilised peoples in the Old and New worlds may be agreed fifty years hence on a common basis of religion, the Service of Man.

To outward seeming the language used in this passage might well delight the soul of a Christian zealot, if there were any difficulty in reading the standpoint of the writer between the lines we have italicised. Christianity has for him the attractions of a heirloom, he loves it as one loves his cat, his trim garden or his native atmosphere. All the same it is not a creed fixed and ordained for eternity. It will "drop off" what does not suit the secular needs of the times. With this attitude one need hardly quarrel, as it is mainly a matter of temperament and no discussions about the nature of religion and the root-purpose of creation can avail in changing a fixed habit of mind. All we need say is that Mussalmans believe in a different philosophy of life, that they recognise in the main doctrines of their faith a series of laws, universal, immutable and Divine, comprehending human nature in its entirety and indicating the direction of human endeavour. Differences of opinion about the ultimate purpose of life are as old as human life itself. They will exist, in spite of the onslaughts of bigotry, shallow puerilities of Atheism and the agnostic cant about "the Service of Man."

If, however, Sir H. H. Johnston had definitely formulated his arbitrary principles and applied them with logical consistency, we could have dismissed him as a harmless faddist, only playing at the old game of recreating the universe after his own image. But he does nothing of the kind. It is only his style that has betrayed his intellectual mood and bias. Perhaps he does not know it himself. His arbitrary assumptions are honeycombed with logical errors and inconsistencies. Along with his tacit belief that it is only the temporal affairs of man that matter and that religion is a mere servant of humanity and not a guide, it is infinitely amusing to see him turn again and again and hold up Christianity to the wonder and admiration of the world. When Christianity has been "dropping off" its excrescences and will continue to do so till it is entirely reformed out of existence, when there is hardly a permanent thing in it that may abide, it is a strange mental perversity that can see in this evanescent "creed" "the only real value yet discovered in religious development." By his own fundamental assumption the evolution of modern Europe has proceeded at the expense of Christianity. It is, therefore, not a religion conducive to the progress of civilisation. It was, so to speak, a fortuitous development in human affairs against whose pernicious influences, according to the writer, other secular human agencies have had to fight. Yet in the same breath we find the writer breaking forth in a cocksure vein and holding forth on the unique achievements of Europe under the inspiration of Christianity. The Christian creed is everything, at once the symbol and source of European power, and all Christendom is solemnly warned against taking any step which "should diminish the power for common action of Christianity against the non-Christian world." Here is a supreme example of the exaltation of a mere race-prejudice through self-deception. After this one is fully prepared for the following baldness, conceived, it may be, in the spirit of "the actual teaching of Christ and of some amongst His immediate disciples," and unredeemed even by a narrow rationalism:—

The only hope of ultimate reconciliation between Christianity and Islam and of the raising of the peoples now Muhammedan to absolute equality, intellectual and social, with the leading Christian Peoples, lies in the "defecation of Islam to a pure transparency" through which may penetrate the only real value yet discovered in religious development: the actual teaching of Christ and of some amongst His immediate disciples. The greatest foe of Islam is undenominational secular education, and at present this is impossible of attainment in any professedly Muhammedan school, college or university. All human knowledge, especially the most marvellous developments of the human mind in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, have to be subjected to the intolerable yoke of the narrow mentality of Muhammad, an illiterate, uneducated, bandit-mystic of the seventh century, A.C.

We have nothing to say about the last lines of this presumptuous deliverance, except that the incredible ignorance about the life and teachings of the purest and most unselfish man the world has ever known could at least be tempered with good taste if not with Christian charity. The Prophet of Arabia lived in the light of history; and no monstrous myths and legends have grown round his personality. It is, therefore, all the more unpardonable in a man who loves to pose as a student of sociology to call him a "mystic-bandit," whose career was one long protest against spiritual sham and humbug, who scorned delights and lived laborious days, whose life was clean of all worldly dross, who was called "Amin" because he was honest, and died so poor that his funeral expenses were defrayed by his friends. As regards the general condition of the Mussalmans, the writer seems to think that their only hope lies in their conversion to Christianity, and that they cannot be educated as long as they are Mussalmans. "Undenominational secular education" has been imparted in India to Hindus and Mussalmans alike for upwards of 50 years, and yet Islam is not only believed in but practised by the educated members of the community. The Christian missionary has more than once confessed to his sense of failure in converting the educated Mussalmans. "The greatest foe of Islam" is not "secular education" but the Christian and racial prejudice of some of the pseudo-scientists of Europe who affect agnosticism and consider the social practices and moral conventions of a materialistic civilisation as the last word in human felicity. Race, convention, and religious prejudice have come to be invested with all the sanctions of divine right.

The writer has made some fugitive excursions into history and come to the conclusion that the backward condition of the Mussalman races, of the Turks, the Persians, the Arabs is due to a general intellectual paralysis brought about by Islam. He doubts if the Moslem woman is supposed to possess a soul. She is kept under tyrannical subjection and enjoys no status in society. Whether Islam is inimical to secular progress is a vast question with which we will deal in a separate article. As regards the status of women in Islamic society, it is perhaps the best, most equitable and humane that any religious system of the world has yet prescribed. This too we will consider at a later date. For the present we may only say that the laws of human progress are the same all over the world, that initiative, intelligence and strength of character and mind are not the sole monopoly of the Christian races in Europe, that if the present and the immediate past have witnessed unparalleled ascendancy of the West in human affairs, the East shall not fail in the ultimate balance of human achievement.

European civilisation, which Sir Harry Johnston is pleased to designate as "Christian," is in fact a secular process carried on in the teeth of what is usually styled as Christianity. The teachings of the Evolutionary Philosophy and some of its moral implications have made short work of the story of creation as disclosed by the Gospels and of the Sermon on the Mount. The heresies of Darwin, Wallace, Russel, Huxley, and Herbert Spencer—undisputably "the most marvellous developments of the human mind in the nineteenth century"—must have made the early fathers move uncomfortably in their graves. To boast, therefore, of European achievements in Science, Art, Philosophy and Politics as the direct result of Christianity is strangely to misread history. It would have been less incomprehensible, though hardly less irrelevant if the writer had elected to swear by geography or ethnology. As it is, he indulges in a sort of mad war-dance round the fact that Europe is great. It has completely obsessed his mind: the rest is a mere carnival of tall talk and vainglory. It is a matter of supreme satisfaction to him that Europe is so rich, so powerful, and so wise. The rest of the world appears to him to be a mistake and a sheer impertinence; and it seems as if he would like to accuse Providence of a primeval error of judgement in creating coloured humanity to "multiply and replenish" so large a portion of the earth. This attitude is common enough among a certain type of Europeans, though it is not a new phase, characteristic only of Europe. Self-sufficiency and arrogance of temper have marked every dominant type of civilisation in history. Ancient Egyptians considered their achievements so perfect that they daily propitiated their gods lest they should grow jealous. The Chinese felt that they had realised their heaven on earth. The Greeks imposed constitutional checks even on divine prerogatives and vainly imagined that they had reduced such an inconceivable thing as life to a system for all eternity. Rome thought itself to be the hub of the universe. It is now the turn of Europe to do as Egypt did or follow the example of Egypt and ancient Babylonia. The world may laugh and the wise may shake their heads, but when Sir Harry will have their day. They will come to see that the babble of words and the life-purpose glibly repeated of a new centre, for another cycle of change.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Recent Changes and the Indian Member.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I am sure I cannot be guilty of the least exaggeration when I say that in no newspaper in India, whether Anglo-Indian or Indo-English, have the recent administrative changes been so admirably, exhaustively and dispassionately dealt with as in the last three issues of the Comrade. While bowing to the Imperial Decree and accepting as a "settled fact"—if indeed such nomenclature can henceforth be justly used for anything under the British administration, except for the sure success of a particular kind of agitation—you have successfully dissected and laid bare the hollowness of the principal arguments contained in the now memorable State documents in favour of the amendment of the partition of Bengal. There is, however, one point about which you have been strangely silent so far, and that is the part played by the Hon. the Indian Member of His Excellency the Governor-General's Council. I take it that this gentleman was selected for his present post not only for his legal acumen but also because he was a representative Indian in close touch with the ideas and aspirations of his countrymen. He could not, therefore, have been ignorant of the arguments and facts so ably marshalled in the Comrade against the unsettling of a settled fact and the injury that this act is bound to cause, not only to a large section of His Majesty's subjects, but also to the hitherto unsullied reputation of the British Government for keeping its word when once vouchsafed to a people. It will be awfully uncharitable to suppose that he was not cognisant of all this. But if he was cognisant of it all, why is there no indication in the despatches published that the above point of view was pressed before the Council and successfully defended against the probable onslaught of the rest of his colleagues? In every Cabinet in the world the rule of the majority obtains in the transaction of business entrusted to its care, and the same must be the case with the Viceroy's Executive Council. Unless, therefore, the Hon. Mr. Syed Ali Imam's arguments were completely demolished by the other Councillors and he was won over to their side, which is unthinkable, we have a right to have expected a note of dissent from him in respect of so much of the proposals of the Government of India as adversely affect the interests of the majority of the population of the province of Eastern Bengal and Assam. The Government scheme would have even then been carried out by the force of a majority, but such action on his part would have raised him at once in the estimation not only of his own countrymen, but also in that of the Government. To say that, because the Government was bent on seeing its scheme through, his dissent was practically of no use, is no argument at all, and overlooks the great moral advantages which always attach to such a procedure. It would not have averted the catastrophe but would most probably have minimised, if not quite taken away, the sting of it by the introduction of the doctrine of "give and take" in the case of the poor Muhammadans also. It may be that Mr. Ali Imam did not press his dissent on account of the "safeguards" promised in the despatch of the Government of India and that he has had satisfactory assurances in regard to the details of such safeguards, which for some reason or other have not so far been made public. If this be so, it was, I am bound to say, a serious tactical blunder to have given up this coin of exchange. In these days of the doctrine of compensation he would have secured better terms when the Flanther of dissent was in full steam than after the steam has been let off. I do not for a moment suggest that if there has been any such compact between the Hon. Member and his colleagues the Government will not abide by its promises; but I must be excused if recent events have made me somewhat sceptical on the point. I am indeed one of those who, when standing on our remaining "loyal" to the core, think it absolutely necessary, not to remain "contented." Englishmen with all their anxiety to be just and impartial to the Oriental races under their sway cannot, owing to the peculiar traditions of their own upbringing, but look at things through an Occidental medium. It is but right, therefore, that in asking them for our dues we should employ their own weapons of strife. They cannot—from what I think of them—but appreciate and respect such a proceeding, and it is from this point of view that I think the Hon. Member has intentionally or unintentionally missed a great chance.

I do not overlook the fact that in criticising Government as a whole you have not spared the Indian Hon. Member who is a part of the Government and is thus covered by your criticism. This is no doubt perfectly true, but we expect a good deal more from the Indian Member than from any of his colleagues, unless his distinct individuality ceases to exist as soon as he enters the charmed circle of officialdom. No thinking person can, however, for a moment agree to such an effacement, as the mere fact of allowing Indians an increased share in the administration of the country clearly implies that the Indian point of view should henceforth be better represented than has been the case hitherto. This is the whole raison d'être of the most commendable departure in throwing open the Council preserve to the people of this country. We have, therefore, a right to watch closely the doings of our representative in Council and to see to it that he does not fail to put forward the Indian point of view in matters which spell life or death to a community. This can only be accomplished by clearly pointing out to him any mistakes of commission or omission which he happens to make, and as he, to my mind, does not appear to have risen to the necessities of the great and momentous occasion, it is nothing but right and proper that the matter should be thoroughly ventilated in the Press.

AZAD.

Verse.

After Hafiz.

The Nightingale in verdant bowers
My soul with song of Love inspires;
The Roses bloom with vernal showers;
My Heart with Passion Flora fires.
Then let yon liquid ruby flow,
Taza ba taza, nau ba nau.

What gladness whispering Love can bring!
What bliss can Beauty's charms unfold!
Then seek at once the bowers of Spring,
And think no more of sordid Gold.
In sparkling Goblet drown thy woe,
Taza ba taza, nau ba nau.

What Casuists preach and Zealots pray
Ah! none but Fools and Clowns admire.
When Roses bloom, the Bulbul's lay
Is all that can the Soul inspire.
Thy ears to whispering Love bestow,
Taza ba taza, nau ba nau

I love and I must die for Love;
This passion I can ne'er forego.
My fate's decreed by One above.
It cannot change. Let Mentors know
The One above is friend, not foe,
Taza ba taza, nau ba nau.

All, all must yield to Beauty's power;
No Hermit can resist its charms.
Observe Zuliekha's fatal hour,
When first she flew to Yousuf's arms:
How Beauty rules the Heart all know,
Taza ba taza, nau ba nau.

The lays of Hafiz are so sweet,
But those of Imdad sweeter still.
Then Minstrel sing his notes and greet
My ears with all thy songster's skill.
In cadence sweet let music flow,
Taza ba taza, nau ba nau.

IMDAD IMAM.

The Council.

By THE HON. MR. GUP.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As you Like It

After the April showers of the reform controversy, the full bloom of summer came with the regulations published by the Government towards the end of 1909, and early in 1910 followed the autumn of the new Councils, full of a gold and red glory, when the first-fruits of the Morley-Minto orchard began to ripen on the branches. Well, horticultural critics may now be inclined to liken them to a medlar which, in the expressive phrase of Rosalind, is rotten before it is half ripe. For there January was no life in the Councillors when they met on the 10th to commence their last winter session, and the first of H. E.'s Hijra, the year of the Flight to Delhi.

There was a total absence of colour also, and the Council Chamber, unredeemed even by the bright silk of Maung Bah Poo from the Silken East, resembled the Hades of Sir Herbert Tree which the half a dozen Enrydicea in the Visitors' Gallery in company with the big blue bottles of Olympus feebly endeavoured to relieve. The sugar-coated Pandit was there, of course, in his customary suit of angelic white. But the Kunwar Sahab had discarded the fourteen yards of dove-grey silk for a creamy confection, and the Gates of Burmah did not hoist the usual danger signal, having exchanged it for the white flag of Maung Oh My! The solemn black was, however, a relief after the Field of Cloth of Gold of which the world and his hobble-skirted wife had seen such a Durbarbaric display.

His Excellency is the possessor of a name familiar enough to the students of India's long annals; but His Excellency's Council includes the possessor of a still more historic name. It is not exactly a usitly name, but a namesake of the Hon. Finance Member has one day out of the three hundred and sixty-five (with a buttock) consecrated all to himself in the British Calendar. If he could thus have a portion of the year earmarked for himself, why could not the Finance Member budget one all to himself? Yes, why not? Fired with this ambition he arranged with St. Vincent that the Council should meet when His Excellency should be washing Godspeed to Their Majesties, and while Sandow II. was still indisposed. It was thus that the 10th of January became Sir Guy's Day, and as the most senior member of the Supreme Government he presided on the opening day of the new session. With a becoming apology, Sir Guy entered upon his responsible duties and in the solemn tones of the Ghost in Hamlet called upon new members to swear. First came the Honourable Gurguri who hobble-bobbled his allegiance. Then came St. Vincent who stiffened himself up in a manner appropriate only to the eminent Service of India's mandarins. The Carr of Juggernaut rushed headlong in his unchecked career till he reached the steps of the Presidential dais, and halting there turned and faced the officiating functionary who feared being run over. When he had done his awe-inspiring duty, the British Lyon was seen to approach the reporters' table. All were prepared for a leap and a roar; but evidently afraid to fright the ladies and his colleagues out of their wits, he aggravated his voice so that he roared as gently as any sucking dove—he roared an 'twere any nightingale.

Then came the rest, Maung Oh My!—who gave promise that this time at least Burmah shall be heard—and Beethoven and Drum Major Fyffe. But the most graceful entry was that of the Khan Bahadur, the clirging ivy round the sturdy British oak, who walked smilingly like a French Count getting out of the tumbrel to go to the waiting guillotine. When he swore allegiance the Council recognised the true accents of loyalty and the unmistakable ring of the plus royaliste que le roi.

Thereafter Sir Guy rose and commanded the Hon. "Mr." J. S. Meston to lay on the table on his behalf the statements promised to Dug-er-patty and Mud-Holkar. Many a time a king has made a plain "Mister" kneel before him and then commanded, "Arise Sir Such-and-So-forth." That's how Knights used to be dubbed in the brave days of old. But in these braver days of Sir Guy, Knights dubbed by the King are undubbed by the President of the Council, and "Sir James" Meston is once more the Hon. "Mr." Meston. Not much of a loss though, for there's such a plethora of Knights gracing the carpet on the floor of the Council to-day that if a jubilant journalist throws a paperball from the Press Gallery into the Council Chamber below, ten to one it would perch on the bald pate of a Knight and, sliding down that declivity, would drop into the lap of a Companion. The only distinction to-day is to have no titles before or behind one's name.

The interpellations were few, but the replies were not without interest. Sir Spencer, or—if the Faery Queen is discarded for the undying fame of the Death Duties—Sir Harcourt, hitherto yeleft Bootlair Sahab, informed the Mild Hindu that the half a crore announced at Delhi for "truly popular education" was to be a recurring decimal fraction of the Budget and elicited cheers from the non-officials and tears from the others. When the Mild Hindu asked for the opinions of the local bodies on his little Bill received by Local Governments, the absent-minded Moslem Dowager, eager to deliver his speech on the Delegation Bill and be done with it, rose to move that the Bill to provide the delegation of executive powers and duties in certain cases be referred to a Select Committee. St. Vincent, the prompter, promptly fed him with another printed paper; but even a saint can sin sometimes and this one had handed somebody else's answer to his Chief to read out. The Dowager essayed again, then stopped short when the gay irrelevancy of the answer dawned on him, and at last found the proper reply for the query of the Mild Hindu. But the latter was not satisfied and hurriedly framed a supplementary question, which in fact was not a question but an explanation. More used to cross-examining others than being cross-examined himself, the Dowager took refuge behind the plea of "further considerations." Sobraon, the Pantaloon, sent a reminder to the Beloved Earl, who immediately laid a statement on the table. But Sobraon thought Supplementary Questions had come into fashion in India since Sir Edward Grey had boycotted them and dumped them into the bin, having followed the example of the Mild Hindu. The Beloved Earl in his turn asked for notice and started the business of Sobraon.

Then come the Committee-appointing stage and Sag-Sabzi MacLagan added a couple of names to the Select Committee on Co-operation. Thereafter the Belted Earl enumerated the experts in lunacy and the name of the Hon. Hooda with its ponderous prefix cost Sir Guy many a pang of effort before he was finally delivered of it.

The Moslem Dowager then moved that the Delegation Bill be referred to a Select Committee and in doing so sighed mournfully that the desire to centralize authority was no longer capable of receiving gratification, and delegation was the necessary consequence of the growing complexity of the administration. And yet foolish people think that such matters as the reversal of the Partition and the transfer of the Capital which were disposed of so easily by the eight Patriot Kings of the Government of India and the Secretary of State without reference to a single Local Government were indeed difficult and complex. Oh, the sancta simplicitas of the sceptics—and the affairs Referred with becoming and much appreciated emphasis to "the legitimate aspirations of the people to take intelligent part in the concerns of their country." But the people could well exclaim, "Country? What country? We have no country," when it can be parted and united and its capital can be shifted without as much as a hint thrown out to three out of three hundred millions. Also mentioned "the development of her moral and material resources" as "evidenced by the ponderous bulk of her Statute book," meaning no doubt the hastily enacted repressive laws of the land, and dangled sub-clauses 6 and 7 which gave "the first glimpse in India" of "mutual help and co-operation" and opened "a new chapter in the public life of the country in its relations to administrative reform."

The Mild Hindu did not wish to offer any opposition to day, but wished it to be understood that he and his friends had kept their peace "without prejudice." He had a mortal horror of giving a blank cheque to the executive, which showed that there was a respectable balance at the People's Bank.

Other Select Committees were proposed and, once he had successfully negotiated the stiff gradient of the Hon Hooda's prefix, Sir Guy had no difficulty in rushing over the rest at May train speed without the stoppages due to the Durbar. In spite of the Official Secrets Act, it had indeed leaked out that the Registrar of the Legislative Department used to write the names of all Councillors on little chits, make paper pills of them, and then drop those of the non-officials into one clerk's hat and those of the officials into another's. It is now generally known that he used to invite the most unintelligent office-boy to draw lots, taking care that he drew two or three more pellets out of the latter than out of the former, and it is believed that he used to note down the results as the most appropriate names for the various Select Committees. But with eight Committees to appoint he had some difficulty this time, and it is suggested that a mathematician was sent for from the Calcutta University to make permutations and combinations of non-officials and officials taking five of one and seven of the other at a time. But a careful analysis of the Committees shows distinct traces of unusual skill. The selection of the Committee of Lunacy is worthy of a Napoleon selecting his Marshalls or an Akbar choosing his Nauratan. But even then Man's work is imperfect, and there is a divinity that shapes the ends of Select Committees, rough how them as he will. For what was it but the unmistakable hand of Providence which prevented the Local Administration of the Central Provinces from sending their opinion on their Excise Bill and thus forced the Administrative Orphan to withdraw his motion for yet another Select Committee? Witness the consequences. All have a few Select Committees to sit on, except those that are mere birds of passage, but Melancholy Mudge is represented on only one, and that solitary Select Committee the one connected with Lunacy! And what, again, but Providence could join with Mudge the necessary complement of Mudge Vincent—the Hon Mr. Vincent! For he is the only Councillor who shares with Melancholy Mudge the splendid isolation of a single Select Committee, and that the one for Lunacy.

When the Council had met all had looked out for the "Coming of Arthur." But Arthur did not come. Nameake of a king himself, he felt doubts about the necessity of his owning the allegiance to another. So, at the time of the swearing in of new members he had slipped away, and when all were busy with questions and the formation of Select Committees, Arthur had quietly slipped in. But Sir Guy, whose very name betrays some respect for kings, could not tolerate such behaviour in the modern King Arthur, and had lain patiently in wait for him. When the business for the day was over, Sir Guy jumped up from the Presidential Chair and called upon the unsuspecting King Arthur to come up to the Reporters' table and swear. And by George he did!

Council adjourned till the 13rd February.

Anecdote.

IN A recent sitting of the House of Commons a certain M.P., after elaborating in a speech of two hours a statement that would have been better made in a speech of two minutes, concluded:—

"And that's the situation in a nutshell."

"Gracious!" said Winston Churchill, sotto voce. "What a nut!"

SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON, in New York, said of a piece of geographical ignorance:—

"It was incredible. It reminded me of a little waiting-maid As she brought me my tea and toast and bloater one morning I said to her:—

"What a rainy morning, Mary! It's almost like the Flood,"

"The Flood, sir?" said the puzzled maid.

"Yes," said I. "The Flood—Noah, you know—the Ark—Mount Ararat."

"She shook her head and murmured, apologetically: 'I ain't had no time to read the papers lately, sir.'"

MR. HARDIE is noted for the carelessness of his attire. Not long since, when some repairs were being done to the House of Commons, Mr. Hardie was lounging in the library, when he was accosted by a friendly policeman, who quite failed to recognize him in his somewhat shabby clothes. "'Ullo, matey!" exclaimed the man in blue. "Are you working here?" "Yes," replied Mr. Hardie, laconically. "On the roof?" asked the champion of law and order. "No," said the Labour leader, with a quiet smile; "not on the roof. I work on the floor of this house."

Petty Larceny.

[MOTTO—"Wit is your birthright, therefore steal it wherever you find it."—Rigmarole Veda.]

"I SUPPOSE," said the City man, "there are some queer characters around an old village like this?"

"You'll find a good many," admitted the native, "when the hotels fill up."

IT WAS married men's night at the revival meeting.

"Let all you husbands who have troubles on your mind stand up!" shouted the preacher at the height of his spasm.

Instantly every man in the church arose, except one.

"Ah!" exclaimed the preacher, peering out at this lone individual, who occupied a chair near the door. "You are one in a million."

"It ain't that," piped back this one helplessly, as the rest of the congregation gazed suspiciously at him. "I can't get up—I'm paralysed."

"So you are going to marry Miss Clever?"

"No. She's far too up-to-date for my simple tastes."

"How is that?"

"Why, I wrote to her last Monday to say I was coming down to propose, and when I arrived I found she had sold the rights of photographing my proposal to a cinematograph firm."

BUTCHER: "Now, John, look sharp; break the bone in Mrs. Smith's shoulder, and put Mrs. Brown's ribs in the basket for her."

Butcher's Boy: "All right, sir; I'm just finishing off Mrs. Wilson's leg."

FATHER wanted to test the generous nature of his son, so, as the boy was going to church one morning, he said:—

"Here, Benny, is a sixpence and a penny. You may put whichever you please in the contribution box."

When he returned his father asked which coin he had given. Benny replied:—

"Well, papa, it was this way: the preacher said the Lord loved a cheerful giver, and I knew I could give a penny a good deal more cheerfully than I could give sixpence, so I put the penny in."

ENPECK: "Meeker is certainly a lucky individual."

Slowen: "What's the explanation?"

Enpeck: "Last year he tumbled into an open sewer and recovered £500 damages from the town council and yesterday he fell out of a third-storey window and alighted on his mother-in-law."

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

Lord Lamington has started for Persia to study the general situation. He returns in May. He proceeds first to the Gulf where he will visit Bunder Abbas, Bushire and Shiraz. His further movements will depend on the situation. Lady Lamington has abandoned the idea of accompanying him owing to the unrest in the country.

A body of Semirchensk Cossacks have passed through New Bokhara en route to Mashed.

News has been received in India that Consul Smart and his escort of the Central India Horse reached Shiraz on the evening of the 5th instant. Reuter wired from Teheran that Consul Smart and the Indian sowars have arrived at Shiraz.

Reuter wired from Teheran—By order of the Government a commission consisting of four Persians and M. Mornard, the Belgian Director of Customs, has taken over Mr Shuster's duties, M. Mornard acting as Provisional Treasurer-General.

Reuter wired from St. Petersburg—The Russians at Tabriz have executed the Chief of the Fida'i Military organisation, his lieutenant and two editors of a revolutionary paper.

Reuter wired from Teheran.—One member of M. Mornard's commission has already resigned. The Regent has decreed that all orders and documents must henceforth bear M. Mornard's signature but the language of the decree appears to indicate that M. Mornard's appointment is not intended to be permanent.

The Times commenting on the Commission considers that it is an evasion of the Anglo-Russian demand for the appointment of a foreign successor to Mr. Shuster and desires to know the names and qualifications of the members of the Commission. The Paper concludes the article with a reference to the troubled state of South Persia and says that should the situation not improve very speedily it may be necessary to consider whether the immediate occupation of the harbours of the Gulf may not be imperative in the commercial and political interests of Great Britain.

Russia's action in Mongolia, following upon events in Persia, is the theme of editorial articles in British papers drawing attention to changing the map of Asia. The Daily Chronicle, referring to the suggestion that a British expedition may occupy Gulf ports, describes the results of the Anglo-Russian Agreement in Persia as humiliating and laments the new and unlovely code of ethics that an old country bent upon reform becomes immediately a suitable victim for spoliation and robbery. The Daily News says that never before has a British Foreign Secretary crusaded so consistently against the liberties of struggling peoples, or collaborated so zealously in the destruction of supreme British interests. The time has come to state with unmistakable clearness that Sir Edward Grey as Foreign Secretary is impossible.

The semi-official Rossiysa repudiates the charges of cruelty against the Russians in Persia. The paper says the execution of fifteen and acquittal of twenty-six ringleaders in the Tabriz horrors constitute mild satisfaction for the death of an officer and thirty nine soldiers, and severe wounding, mostly by means of explosive bullets, of five officers and forty-nine soldiers. Moreover the bodies of twenty-three Russians, who were tortured to death, have still not been surrendered.

The Swedish Colonel Hjalmarén has assumed command of the Treasury Gendarmerie.

A frontier correspondent of the Pioneer states definitely that the Amir of Cabul, who is now at Jellalabad, received a formal letter early in the month from the Mōjliās, Teheran, appealing for sympathy and assistance. It is not known whether any reply has yet been sent, but as stated last week, the Amir has ordered Afghan outposts on the border to be strengthened.

Mr. Shuster has left for Europe. He issued a statement opining that M. Mornard's Commission was unfit for the Treasury administration. The Commission has resigned and it is understood that M. Mornard will take over the post.

It is reported that the Chief Mullah at Isfahan is inciting the people to a Holy War.

The Pioneer hears the Amir's orders regarding the defence of his North-Western border districts were very distinct. Supplies are to be collected at the heart of Maimana and other important towns.

All outposts are to be strengthened, and breech-loaders are to be issued to the tribal levies on the Persian frontier. A security of Rs 50 is being taken for each rifle. These are merely precautionary measures, the idea apparently being that Russians may put pressure upon Massad and Khorasan generally, as they have done upon Tabriz and Azerbaijan, thus causing alarm in Herat.

The Pioneer says that the Kabul Durbar need have no apprehensions of trouble from Russia. The Tsar's Government is concerned only with straightening out the tangle of Persian politics, and though its method may be summary, it can have no desire to raise additional complications in Central Asia.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" CORRESPONDENT.)

It has been evident for some time that the malady from which this country is suffering must sooner or later reach a crisis. This crisis would now seem to be upon us, though whether it will lead to the death of the organism, or whether it will mark the starting point of a new and more vigorous existence, it is yet too early to say. Desperate as things look for the moment, the final outcome largely depends upon Persia herself. The Persian feels instinctively that one day Russia will swoop down from the North and absorb his country, and now he feels that that day has come. He is suspicious of the fact that Russia should seize upon so frail a pretext—a pretext which of itself cannot warrant invasion and annexation, and he believes that whatever course Persia may now adopt the end will be the same. Some show of resistance would seem becoming, and indeed a country which would lose its independence without striking a blow for freedom would only be worthy of its fate. One hears this view of the situation on all sides. But it would be most deplorable should Persia really decide to try conclusions with her powerful neighbour in the open field, and thus render annexation a certainty. She has nothing to gain and everything to lose by such a course, whereas a policy of conciliation now may stave off the evil day indefinitely. There are some grounds for the belief that Russia is not altogether sure of the wisdom of expanding in this direction for the present, and especially in view of possible untoward developments in the Far East. A situation is arising there which may absorb her attention for many years to come. Hence, therefore, there would seem to be still some hope for the continuance of Persian autonomy.

All opposing factions are now showing a tendency to unite in face of the common danger. The democrats have come into line with the Moderates in an earnest endeavour to save the situation. An amnesty has been granted to the Salar-ed-Dowieh, and he has been invited to throw in his lot with the Government to save the country from national extinction, and to the north it is stated that Samad Khan (Shojed-Dowieh) has joined forces with the Tabrizis. Here, it must be admitted, we have a show of national spirit which is most refreshing to witness.

In the meantime the Russian army of occupation is advancing. Tabriz has been occupied; 4,000 Russian troops are said to have already arrived in Resht, and a portion forming the advance guard are now on their way to Karvin. In a day or two, therefore, we should hear of the re-entry into that town of the Russian garrisons, which was withdrawn some months back. As to whether the advance will be continued in the direction of the capital is as present impossible to offer an opinion. Much depends upon the line which the Government decides to take.

During the last few days disorders have broken out again in Teheran, similar to those which occurred last year, and which culminated in the forcible disarmament of the perpetrators in the Bagh Asem's Park in July. As was the case then, the disorderly elements are the Muxahedin, Caucasian riff-raff, who have been of the greatest use in dealing with the Mohammed Ali and Salar-ed-Dowieh incursions, but who now have nothing better to do than to create trouble, and, being armed, constitute a real danger. The murder of Ali-ed-Dowieh, recently Governor-designate for Fars, that of Abdol-Mohammad Taghy, the great pillar of the Nationalist movement, the robbery and the attempted murder of the Muxahedin-Sultans are all the work of these ruffians. The Caucasian levies have, however, been removed, and are now concentrated at the frontiers, where they are being held in readiness, in view of possible war with Russia. As might be expected, the town is now quiet.

No one quite knows the reason for the murder of Ala-ed-Dowleh. Except amongst the Bakhtiari he was not over popular. It is said, too, that he was very friendly with the Russians, that he has been seen on several occasions recently visiting the Russian Legation at night, and that these visits were connected with the sale of wheat for the use of the Russian troops. How far these stories may be accepted as gospel it is impossible to say, but they are very widely credited, and the public have given their verdict accordingly. The murder took place in broad daylight in one of the principal streets. The victim was driving in his carriage, when the assailant approached and fired at him several times. Several gendarmes were in the vicinity but made no attempt to capture the murderer until he was clear away when a hue and cry was raised. The latter, after having made a quick change, returned, and actually assisted in the fruitless search which was so tardily begun!

Sardar Assad is once more among us. He arrived in Teheran late on the evening of the 4th December. Though tired after his long journey, he lost no time in making himself au courant with the political situation. He is for the moment the most popular man in Persia, and high and low all look to him to save the country from the blow which threatens to fall. Whether or not he will succeed in this, his wise counsels will go a long way towards correcting the firebrand tactics of the wilder Democrats whose "Death or Independence" ravings, though all very well under some circumstances, are hardly likely to produce a satisfactory solution as matters stand at present.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, December 17

The Turco-Russian situation is the chief diplomatic preoccupation. It is admitted that the Porte made the strongest remonstrances to Russia on the subject of the occupation of Khoi. The Russian troops are expected to advance from Kazvin on Thursday.

The ex-Shah's troops are advancing and have occupied Damghan, they are reported to be near Semnan. The ex-Shah himself is still near Gumesh Tepe. The Bakhtiari are concentrating on Teheran and by to-morrow 2,500 will be here.

The plan to deprive the Mejliss of a quorum appears to have definitely failed. The members who had resigned have withdrawn their resignations, unable to withstand the public odium and accusations of having accepted Russian gold. Women are going about armed. A large deputation have visited the President of the Mejliss and the Premier and offered to sell their jewelry to raise funds. They declared that they would shoot their husbands unless they fought and accused the Premier of not supporting Mr. Shuster with sufficient vigour.

The Government is using every endeavour to arrest the British boycott. The Deputy Governor of Fars has provided a week's supplies for the Indian sowars. Mr. Shuster has telegraphed a personal appeal to the Chief Mollah to stop the run on the Imperial Bank. The situation has been eased, as an escort has been found to guard one caravan conveying specie.

The Trans-Persian Railway

Reuter learns that a meeting of British, Russian and French banks will be held in the course of the next few days in Paris to arrange for raising the capital of £100,000 for the preliminary studies of the Trans-Persian Railway scheme by the Societe Etude, whose business it will be to obtain the necessary concession from Persia, after definitely determining the alignment of the railway and making the final survey. The Russian Committee possesses nearly a complete survey from Astara to Teheran, but only the preliminary survey from Teheran to Guattar on the Perso-Baluchistan frontier. Both Britain and Russia approved the scheme in principle a year ago, and Russia has since promised definitely to support the scheme. Britain has, in the meanwhile, consulted the Government of India which advocates that the Indian junction should be at Karachi, instead of Nushki, and that the line should enter the British sphere at Bunder Abbas instead of Kerman. The Russian committee deprecates the long detour by Bunder Abbas, and recommends that the line should run from Karachi to Guattar, and thence northward via Kerman. The Indian Government also wants a check in the gauge wherever the railway reaches the limit of the British sphere. The other conditions put forward are that Russia shall not, without the assent of the British, support any proposal for railway construction near the Perso-Afghan frontier, and that equality of treatment in trade shall be guaranteed. Britain has also proposed the construction of branch lines, of which three, within the neutral sphere, would be internationalised, and another line from Bunder Abbas or Guattar to Kerman, which would be purely British. The Russian committee do not anticipate any serious difficulty in raising the capital for the railway, nor regarding the permission from Persia to prosecute the scheme.

REUTER wired from St. Petersburg.—Among the prominent hosts of the members of the House of Commons and the House of Lords about to visit Russia are the leading promoters of the Trans-Persian Railway Scheme, the details of which will certainly be discussed during the visit. It is calculated, at present, that the total outlay will not exceed £15,000,000 sterling and that the net revenue will amount to £709,000. Although the Russian Government is not in favour of the idea of a direct guarantee it has conceded the possibility of indirectly assuring the interests of share and bond holders from the surplus revenues of the Russian railways, which may result from the opening of the new Trans-Continental communications. It is thought that the Government of India may possibly adopt the same standpoint. The Russian Committee compares the Persian Railway with the great trunk lines of America and Africa and expects that it will be similarly profitable. It describes the project as a direct result of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, of which it will be the consecration.

Mr W. A. Johns, C.I.E., sailed from Karachi in the Patrick Stewart on the 15th instant and it is believed, writes the Sind Gazette, that he proposes to make a survey of the coast line of Makran in connection with the Trans-Persian Railway Survey. Sooner or later this coastal survey may be expected to extend all the way from Cape Monze, just outside Karachi to Bunder Abbas in the Persian Gulf, with connecting points at Ormarah, Pasni, Gwadar, Chabbar and Jask. The distance from Karachi to the outer confines of British territory near Gwadar would be about 350 miles and the further distance from Gwadar to the outer point of the British sphere of influence in Persia at Bunder Abbas would be about 400 miles. The coastal railway from Karachi to Bunder Abbas would thus be seen to traverse nearly 800 miles of lowlying sandy shore with a buttress of hills all along its northern flank and the open sea for its southern flank. From one or more points between Ormarah and Bunder Abbas there would probably extend inland projects for carrying transverse railways northwards into the central parts of Persia.

The Englishman gives interesting details regarding the Trans-Persian Railway project. As will be seen, the Government of India has put forward certain conditions regarding the construction of feeder lines.

These conditions are not final in all details, and may be varied with the concurrence of the Indian Government. There is, so it is stated, no prospect of the British or Indian Government entering into a financial guarantee of the railway. Before discussing the conditions of the Indian Government it is advisable to state exactly what the figures upon which the promoters of the line base their scheme.

Net deficit to be met by rebates from traffic on connected lines or partly from this source and partly otherwise			£380,000
NOTE.—The net income on the Russian system which would be available at least partly to meet this deficit is estimated at	£467,500

To this one point may be added. The promoters of the line hope to obtain, in addition, the Russian assistance above-mentioned towards meeting the deficit, what are known as normal Indian Company terms for feeder lines. These are those under which the interest in the capital cost of branch lines is guaranteed by a rebate on the receipts from traffic on the main line contributed by or carried over the branch line. It can also be stated that the above estimates are in the opinion of experts by no means of a too optimistic nature. There is encouragement in a comparison between the estimated total receipts per verst, which amount to Rs. 11,066, and the actual receipts per verst on the Siberian Railway which in 1908 amounted to Rs. 11,942. The country to be traversed by the projected line is undeveloped, but it is in part well cultivated and is held in expert circles to compare on the whole favourably with a large extent of the country through which the Siberian line runs. Moreover, in the estimate for revenue the receipts from the carriage of the mails, including parcels, have been purposely estimated at a very low figure, and no allowance is made for many commodities such as tea, in which a large and increasing traffic may be anticipated.

The Indian Government has formulated some six conditions, the most important of which is that the railway shall follow the coast from Karachi to Bunder Abbas, and it is further understood that Mr. Johns, the chief engineer of the Oudh and Rohilkand Railway, has been detached to examine its feasibility. At the same time, the Indian Government does not preclude the alternative scheme of the railway leaving the coast at Charbar and thence going direct north west to Kerman, which is in the British sphere. It will, therefore, be necessary to make two surveys, one along the coast from Charbar to Bunder Abbas, and from Bunder Abbas up to Kerman, and the other from Charbar direct to Kerman. The Indian Government also stipulates for the ultimate construction of five feeder lines, of which the most important is what is known as the Karun Valley line from Muhamrah to Khoramabad. Finally, there is also a reference as to further railway construction.

Recently the Comité d'Etudes met in Paris and formulated proposals for the survey, under which, so it is thought in expert circles, French capital secures in altogether disproportionate interest, since Russia and France would practically survey two-thirds of the line, partly, too, in our sphere of influence, while we should only survey one-third. It is true that such a survey does not bind the British Government or the Russian Government as to the conditions under which the construction of the route shall be ultimately carried out, but both in political and in financial circles it is regarded as a very inadvisable precedent, and the hope is expressed that it will not be adhered to. The original scheme was that Russia should survey her portion of the line, and Great Britain her portion, and that an international company could be formed, and a basis to be considered subsequently, to carry out the work of construction, due regard being had to the independence of Persia. Therefore, it is held that French capital should be in a minority, both in regard to any assistance it intends to give to Russia, on the one hand, and may wish to offer to Great Britain on the other. The scheme thus presents a signal opportunity for British finance to secure due British participation in one of the most important lines of modern times—a line which ultimately is held to have very hopeful prospects.

The main condition of the Indian Government that the line should skirt the coast to Bunder Abbas is by no means approved in well-informed circles, and there seems to be considerable doubt as to whether it will be insisted on. Bunder Abbas is in the neutral, not in the British zone, while it would considerably add to the length and cost of the journey if Kerman, which is one of the chief trade centres, and is in the British zone, was approached by such a circuitous route. The crux of any such transcontinental line will be the decision as to where the break of gauge is to occur. To be of any use to British trade, it should not be further south than Isfahan, if it were to be at Bunder Abbas, it would be altogether disadvantageous both for this country and for India.

Finally, it may be stated that arrangements for the survey will at once be taken in hand. The proposed line is wholly surveyed to Teheran, and a sort of survey embracing levels was made some ten years ago as far as Charbar. Probably all the figures require revision in view of the lapse of time since the estimates were made. It is held that the sum of £40,000 should amply suffice to complete what is necessary to enable a project to be drawn which will satisfy the British Government's requirements.

Although there is no mention of German capital in the undertaking the belief prevails in financial circles that to some extent the German banks are operating through the five French banks backing the proposal.

The Near East also writes on the subject:—

At last—and the exclamation would be pious if British prestige were not suffering at the hands of Russian supremacy in the Middle East—it seems as though the idea of a Trans-Persian line to India were about to materialise, and that at no very distant date—say, ten years—we will be able to journey by rail from London to Bombay, via St. Petersburg, Baku, Astara, Guatlar, and Karachi.

At present, however, the scheme is still in the air. It has one advantage over the other projects which have time and again been dealt with in these columns, in as much as it has received the approval, in principle, of the Indian Government. This is an enormous step in the direction of an ultimate decision favourable to the railway, the construction of which under Anglo-French and Russian auspices, is estimated at about £13,000 per mile, representing, for the Persian section alone, a capital sum of about £25,000,000 to be provided for by shares to the amount of £2,125,000 and 4 per cent Debentures at 85 to the value of £19,875,000. The link between the Persian and Indian sections has not been definitely agreed upon, and the surveying parties will proceed to investigate the claims of two routes, the one over Charbar and Bunder Abbas to Kerman, and the other from Charbar direct to Kerman.

In the above paragraph we referred to the projected Trans-Persian Railway as a financial undertaking bound to shorten the distance between India and the heart of the Empire. In the words of the sailor, the proposed route would follow the arc of a circle which is, in nautical phraseology, the shortest way between two given localities. From this point of view, therefore, the Trans-Persian scheme has to be applauded as representing the shortest possible route between London and Bombay. There are other aspects of the question, however, which do not, cannot, meet with the same approval in so far as Great Britain is concerned. Russian advance in Persia means that Iran will no longer serve as a buffer State between our Asiatic possessions and those of Russia, in future a frontier line will, theoretically, separate the two empires. Nor is this all; as though the elimination of the buffer State were not sufficient evil in itself, we must needs go to the extreme of assenting to a linking up of those two empires by means of a Railway practically under Russian control, and enabling the War Department at St. Petersburg to throw soldiery on to the Indian Frontier quicker than we can send reinforcements around the Cape to Bombay. The matter, therefore, requires careful consideration before we sign away the remnants of our prestige and the safety of our Indian Empire.

Press Opinions.

The "Near East."

Another, and, to our mind, even more futile, argument which is largely used in the English Press is that our relations with Russia are of such supreme importance to us that we must make no protest and indulge in no criticism, whatever Russia may see fit to do in Persia. It is scarcely caricaturing the attitude of the Daily Telegraph and the Morning Post to say that they show their devotion to the Anglo-Russian Agreement by inviting Russia to break it in the spirit and in the letter. The suggestion is that by sacrificing our position in the Middle East we shall make sure of Russian support in our rivalry with Germany, and that by showing any care for our own interests in Persia we shall be driving Russia into the arms of our rival. We do not believe for a moment that the support of Russia or of any other Power can be brought in this way. In her attitude towards our struggle against German hegemony in Europe—hegemony as distasteful to Russia as to ourselves—Russia will be guided by considerations for her own interests, not by gratitude for past complaisances. She would not value our friendship the more, but rather the less, if we showed that we were too terrified of the German menace and too dependent on Russian assistance to dare to say a word in defence of our own rights and interests. Moreover, such a policy could not be carried out to its logical conclusion. If it were really followed by us, it would stimulate the forward party in Russia to courses which even the Daily Telegraph and the Morning Post would not wish to tolerate. The guarantees for our position in the Persian Gulf contained in the Anglo-Russian Agreement are much less definite and less binding on Russia than those for the integrity and independence of Persia. If the Pokhiltonoffs and Hartings and their supporters in Russia were allowed, without a murmur from us, to establish their domination in Teheran, we should soon see a revival of their designs on the Gulf—designs which we should have to frustrate at all costs.

The "Times."

If it were not for the grave dangers involved in the childish inability of the Persians to look facts in the face, one would have little but pity for the extraordinary delusions in which they have indulged throughout the present crisis. At first they were confident that the Government of the United States was going to intervene in their favour, because Mr. Shuster happened to be an American citizen, as if Americans would not be themselves the first to resent the adoption in any foreign country to which they had political interest, of such an attitude as Mr. Shuster was fit to adopt towards Russia and Great Britain at Teheran. Then when this foolish expectation was disappointed, they began to pin their faith on Turkish interference on their behalf, conveniently forgetting for the moment that Turkey could least of all come into court with clean hands as the champion of the independence and integrity of Persia. We have no wish to enter into the merits of the longstanding frontier disputes between Turkey and Persia. But the fact remains that, whilst Persian apprehensions of aggressive designs upon Persian territory on the part of Russia are at any rate so far merely apprehensions and nothing more, Turkey has for some years past taken advantage of the chaos in Persia to instal herself by force, and with every appearance of permanency, in quite an extensive tract of territory along and beyond the debateable borderland which was hitherto regarded as an integral part of the Shah's dominions, and to which Persia has never yet surrendered her title. To people less hopelessly inexperienced than the patriots of the Persian Mejliss, the idea that, whilst already engaged in hostilities with another European Power, Turkey would challenge Russian resentment for the beaux yeux of Persia was from the very first preposterous, and the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs really rendered the best service he could to Persia, by the statement made on Saturday in the Ottoman Chamber. He announced that, as the result of conversations with the Russian Ambassador, the Ottoman Government had confidence in the sincere declarations of the Russian Government as to the temporary character of the Russian military intervention in Persia, and had tendered friendly advice at Teheran recommending moderation with a view to the speedy removal of the present misunderstandings. The Ottoman Chamber declared itself satisfied by the Minister's declarations, and authorized the President to reply in a similar sense to the telegrams received from the Persian Mejliss. We trust that this intimation will strengthen the hands of the Persian Ministers, who appear to be themselves growing desirous to meet the Russian demands in a conciliatory spirit, and anxious to find some way of getting over the obstacle presented by the obduracy of the Mejliss.

SIR EDWARD GREY gave last week, as is his wont, a clear and sober account of the present situation in Persia and of the position taken up towards it by His Majesty's Government. He stated in very explicit terms the reasons why Great Britain could not demur to the chief demands put forward in the last Russian ultimatum, whilst the six points which he had put to the Russian Government contain just those reservations in regard to the proposed indemnity, to the possibility of the ex-Shah's return to Teheran, and to the strictly provisional character of Russian military intervention which moderate public opinion in this country expected of him. It will certainly approve the stress he has laid upon the urgency of selecting a successor to Mr. Shaster who will be acceptable to Russia and Great Britain, and upon the expediency of giving Persia all reasonable assistance in finding the money of which she will more than ever stand in need when she has emerged from the present crisis, but he wisely did not blink the fact that the present crisis has to be got over first, and that Persian independence, of which we have every reason to desire the preservation, can only be maintained if Persia takes due account of the situation created by her geographical propinquity to two powerful neighbours who have definite interests to safeguard. Criticism of the Foreign Office policy in regard to Persia, both in the house and outside, is frequent and passionate. But, such as it is, it is merely destructive. The British Government, we are told, have failed to do this and have failed to do that. But none of the critics comes out into the open with a definite statement of what the British Government should have done. We hold no brief for the Foreign Office and we think that possibly the frank and full exchange of views which is now taking place between London and St. Petersburg might with advantage have been initiated at an earlier stage.

What we want to know from those who so loudly denounce the Anglo-Russian Agreement and constitute themselves the uncompromising champions of Persian independence, is whether they really believe Persian independence would be safer without the Anglo-Russian Agreement, and, if not, whether they hold it to be the duty of this country to proceed to the last extremities in defence of Persian independence. There are only two policies possible. One is to exert, as we are doing, the moral influence which the Anglo-Russian Agreement gives us at St. Petersburg. The other is to substitute for amicable suasion the threat of force. To repudiate the Agreement and merely stand aside, nursing a more or less righteous indignation, would be no policy at all, for it would simply precipitate the catastrophe which those who claim a monopoly of friendship for Persia profess to dread. We need only state the two alternatives. There is not a man in this country who would seriously advocate that Persian independence, even if it were threatened with absolute extinction, would in itself be worth the bones of a single British Grenadier. Yet it is, we fear, the sort of speeches delivered by so-called friends of Persia in the House on Thursday by which the Persians, only too liable themselves to get drunk with words, are induced to maintain an attitude of obstinate resistance to Russian demands that can only lead to disaster. Not to speak of the intolerable boycott of the British Consular Guard at Shiraz, the menace of a Holy War shows how threadbare is still the democratic mantle in which Persian constitutionalism tries to drape itself for the benefit of its Western sympathizers. The Russian troops are at Kazvin and the Russian Government is willing to arrest their further advance for a time if there is any prospect of wiser counsels prevailing at Teheran. But the sand is running out of the hour-glass, and a grave responsibility rests with those in England who encourage Persia to take risks for which not they, but the Persians, will have to pay.

The Persian Situation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—In your leading article of to-day's date on this subject you speak of the "childish inability of the Persians to look facts in the face" and you go on to refer to the grave responsibility which rests with those in England who encourage Persia to resist the Russian demands. The Persia Committee have consistently refrained from giving any advice to Persia, and have confined themselves to presenting her case for the verdict of public opinion. But when you speak of the childishness of the Persian people in the present crisis, are you quite sure of your facts? It is obvious that no Persian Cabinet could possibly propose acceptance, even in a modified form, of the terms of the second ultimatum unless they held in their hands an undertaking from the Russian Government to withdraw their troops from Kazvin directly satisfaction had been obtained. After what occurred subsequent to the acceptance of the first ultimatum, any Persian Cabinet would be unable to face the representatives of the Persian people unless they were in possession of a definite and binding engagement by Russia on the subject of the troops. So far as we know, no such engagement has yet been given, and it is this fact which underlies the present crisis.

When you state that "none of the critics comes out into the open with a definite statement of what the British Government should have done," you are surely not just to the critics. We have on more than one occasion laid down in precise terms the course which in our opinion British policy ought to have pursued. We ought never to have deviated from the principle of maintaining the integrity and independence of Persia and from the interpretation of that principle in practice given on behalf of our Government and that of Russia to Persia by our Minister in Teheran in September, 1907. We are partners with Russia in an agreement for the maintenance of Persian independence. It was the plain duty of our foreign Minister to exercise vigilance that the terms of the partnership should be observed. Who can affirm that he has recognized this duty? To take only one instance, if he had informed Russia at the time of the escape of the ex-Shah to Persia in July of this year that, as co-signatory of the Protocol of 1909 for his detention, Great Britain could never recognize him as ruler of Persia, all or most of the present difficulties in Persia would, we have little doubt, have never occurred. His present representations on that subject, highly as we approve them, have, we fear, come too late.

As to the alternative policies which you set out, we are all for the exercise of "moral suasion" with the Russian Government. But so far this persuasion has been all on one side—that of Russia. We have been dragged into repudiation of our pledges to the Persian people. If there is to be persuasion, that influence must now come from our side and be directed to the observance in future of the terms of our partnership. Should this fail, it is not only the Agreement with Russia which will fall, as you imply, but the whole policy embodied in our Entente with her. As a result of that Entente we are sending large sums of money to Russia and a glance at the Supplements of the Times of 20th November and 15th December makes it quite clear that further investment of British capital in Russia is greatly desired by the Russian Government. What else is this but the policy embodied in the testament of Peter the Great. Make friends with the English, obtain their gold, and march to India, the treasure-house of Asia?

As for your statement that "Persian independence, even if it were threatened with absolute extinction, would not in itself be worth the bones of a single British Grenadier," it is surely only fair to add that the alternative policy of yielding to Russia at every step may ultimately result in enormous sacrifices of British blood and British treasure. Moreover, such a purely passive policy must involve us, sooner or later, in a coterminous frontier with Russia drawn across the open plains of Persia. How many additional British Grenadiers would be required to place behind that frontier? What increase would be required, even in time of peace, in our military and naval expenditure? And, if Persia be not worth the risk of a single British Grenadier, was Morocco?

Yours respectfully,

19th December.

News of the Week.

Reuter wired from Constantinople:—The recent rumour to the effect that peace would shortly be concluded between Italy and Turkey has surprised Ottoman political circles. The journal Zahin says Turkey is firmly resolved not to accept a settlement affecting Ottoman sovereignty in Tripoli. Possible complications in the Balkans will not deter Turkey from continuing war in Tripoli and will not affect her military strength.

Reuter wired from Rome:—The Minister of the Treasury in his financial statement estimates that the surpluses in the financial year 1911-12 will total 23,700,000 lire and in the financial year 1912-13, 14,500,000 lire. The Minister reviews the progress of Italy during the last half a century and illustrates the fact that the expenditure on national development has increased by 593,000,000 lire during the ten years previous to 1912-13. The Minister lays stress on the statement that the Treasury is able to meet all war expenditure from existing sources without in any way diminishing the votes for social reform, in which education and public works are chiefly concerned.

A strong force attacked the Italians while the latter were constructing outworks at Homs on Saturday. The assailants were repulsed after a three hours fighting. Twenty-one Italians were wounded.

Reuter wired from Cairo:—The Khedive has visited Sollum and found the Bedouins there happy and contented. They have also had good crops. H.M. cruiser Suffolk has arrived at Sollum.

The exhibition of cinematograph views of the Italo-Turkish war at the Skating Rink in Bangalore by a local company was stopped under Magisterial orders on the 6th instant. A large crowd of Muhammadans had gathered to see the picture as a result of wide advertisement. The police, however, were apprehensive of angry feelings being needlessly awakened by the exhibition and Chief Inspector Bartels applied for Magisterial injunction. On communicating it, the crowd received it in good part. This cinematograph company has no connection with the one exhibiting Durbar pictures.

Reuter wired from Rome on the 12th that the cruiser Nemonte and two destroyers yesterday encountered seven Turkish gunboats and an armed yacht off Kufudra. After a stubborn resistance all the gunboats were destroyed and the yacht was captured, as also were guns and other trophies. Warships were despatched to intercept other gunboats which are conveying arms and troops who, it is intended, shall enter Cyrenaica via Egypt.

Smyrna December 8

This morning H. E. Armenak Effendi, Chief Secretary of the Governor, informed the German Consul that orders had been received from Constantinople that all Italians are to leave Smyrna on or before Thursday, 14th December. This order of expulsion has caused great consternation in the city, as the Italian colony is a very large one, and is composed mainly of the poorer class, such as railway labourers, fishermen, engineer labourers, etc. The Italian clerks in the banks have already received notice to leave their employment, and the shopkeepers of Italian nationality have received orders to close their shops.

A commission is to sit at the Konak to judge the case of any Italians who may desire to show cause why they should not be expelled or that the time given for them to do so is not sufficient, and a representative of the German Consulate will be present at all the sittings. It is hoped the order will not be made general and that the Government may yet rescind it.

The order of expulsion has, however, been becoming more or less necessary, for the presence of so many Italians in the country, especially in the interior, is a source of great responsibility to the Turkish Government, which has up to the present shown remarkable restraint. Should any reverse take place in Tripoli, or should the Italian fleet blockade Smyrna and the Dardanelles, the natives might well make reprisals on the Italians resident in Turkey; and by expelling them this source of anxiety to the Government is removed.

Constitutional ideas are working a change in the relations between the Turks and the European of foreign element, which is likely to become more and more pronounced with time. Not so long ago the foreigner, safeguarded by his Consul and the Capitulations, enjoyed a degree of immunity from all official interference which the unfortunate native, crushed under the iron rule of Hamidian absolutism, could never hope for. To-day the Turks resent the existence of all Capitulations, which in many respects still confer a privileged position on the foreigner and exempt him from a certain amount of taxation. As a consequence, all those in authority spare no effort to neutralise their effect and influence, and few who know the country will question the statement that, in spite of all ambassadorial and consular protection, foreigners now frequently encounter great difficulties in their relations with the Government.

The Turk, however, is by nature a gentleman. Animated with the spirit and haughtiness of a conqueror, he is fond of ceremony and is keenly susceptible to a polite recognition of his authority. He values courtesy and justly appreciates any honest and genuine regard shown towards him. The personal equation has always counted for much in Turkey. From the highest provincial official to the most humble civilian, the Turk has seldom failed to appreciate and reciprocate little social amenities on the part of the foreigner. The latter will be well advised to consider this susceptibility. Where he comes into frequent contact with the Turk, experience will prove that visits of courtesy on official occasions, on national fêtes, at Bairam, or on the occasion of a change of governors are attentions which pave the way for a better understanding and good feeling.

There are in this country many foreigners, especially among Englishmen, whose tactful and considerate treatment of the Turk, irrespective of his rank or social position, has enabled them to wield a surprising influence and to be held in high personal esteem. Consular authority, however, is certainly on the wane. The grim old Consul of the 'sixties and 'seventies, who often made the Turkish official believe that he always kept an ultimatum in his brass-buttoned waistcoat pocket, and could dispose of his country's army and navy without reference to headquarters, is now an anachronism. Consular representatives in Turkey to-day are an intelligent and capable body of men, well trained to their duties; but they have in most cases a healthy notion of their position and of the limitations of their authority.

Constantinople, December 15.

To understand the situation created by Said Pasha's proposals for the modification of the Constitution one must go back to the Committee Congress held at Salonika in September last. It was there decided that the Committee of Union and Progress must add to its programme an article advocating the modification of Article 35 of the Constitution in a sense unfavourable to the Senate. By the Constitution, as drawn up by Midhat Pasha and since modified, the Sultan may, in the event of a continued dispute between the Chamber of Deputies and the Cabinet, dissolve the Chamber, should the Senate give its consent. The Committee in Congress pronounced in favour of the abolition of the Senatorial veto. The outbreak of war with Italy prevented much attention being given to this decision at the time, and it was generally believed that the Committee would keep this political card up its sleeve till the time for the next elections drew near, or, if the electoral outlook was favourable, till after a new Chamber had been elected. Meantime the anti-Committee movement gained ground despite martial law and the suppression of over-critical newspapers. Rumours that the Committee had made up its mind to force a dissolution were rife, but the result of the Salonika Congress, where the dissidents were in a great minority, apparently encouraged the leaders of the organisation to let matters remain as they were. Then came the formation of the new party—the "Union and Liberty" group. The Committee rebuked the Opposition for opposing, but expressed its confidence in the speedy dissolution of the new party.

The new party, however, set to work to contest the election of a deputy to replace Rifaat Pasha and began to canvass vigorously among the electors of the first and second degree. Over-confidence prevented the Committee of Union and Progress from following its example. Memduh Bey, the new Minister of Justice, was chosen as the Committee nominee, but nothing was done to secure his election. His opponent was Tahir Hureddin Bey, son of a former Grand Vizier, Hureddin Pasha, of Tunis, and proprietor of the Alamdar, ex-Hemrah, ex-Shahrak, etc., a vigorous critic of the Committee and all its works. The elections duly came off, and to the intense surprise of the Committee and of his own supporters the Union and Liberty candidate obtained a majority of votes, thanks to the support of the Christian element and the defection of the Committee of Union and Progress by many of its former adherents. Several prominent supporters of the Committee thereupon left for Salonika.

On the 13th a rumour which had been floating vaguely in the air for several days crystallised into fact. Said Pasha intended to summon the Chamber, as a measure of urgency, to pass a proposal for the modification of Article 35 of the Constitution. The text of the proposed modification has not yet been published, but there is no doubt that it does away with the Senate's right to veto a dissolution ordered by the Sultan in consequence of a situation such as foreseen by Article 35. Rumours are also current that the Grand Vizier also intends to propose an alternative modification permitting the Sultan to suspend Parliamentary discussion during wartime. These reports may not, however, be well founded.

It is not surprising that everyone is asking what is the object of the Grand Vizier in raising this question at the present moment. Three theories are propounded. The reader may take them for what they are worth.

1. That Said Pasha is intentionally riding for a fall.

2. That he proposes to risk a defeat in the Chamber which will bring about the fall of the Ministry. The Grand Vizier will then be able to form a new Cabinet composed of less colourless persons than the majority of the present Government. This theory presupposes that he will remain the nominee of the Committee of Union and Progress for the Grand Viziership.

3. That the Committee of Union and Progress meditates a sort of coup d'état. The supporters of this view maintain that the Central Committee has been greatly alarmed by the news of its defeat at the Constantinople election, and that its leaders, knowing that, or believing that, they can depend upon the support of a great majority of the Valis, Kaimakanis and Mutessarifis (Governors, sub-Governors, etc.), who can do a great deal to control the election, and fearing that further delay may prove prejudicial to their chances, have decided to play a bold game and strike for the dissolution of the Chamber. Should they obtain the two-thirds majority in the Chamber which is necessary in the case of any modification of the Constitution, the Senate can be dealt with by the creation of a sufficient number of "Union and Progress" Senators to ensure the passing of the revised version of Article 35 in the Upper House. If the Chamber proves recalcitrant, and even the Committee oath may not prevent numerous Committee deputies from opposing the measure, a new Cabinet will be formed under the Presidency of Said and a sufficient number of Senators created to secure the Senate's consent to the dissolution of the Chamber should it again prove hostile.

The Press is naturally agitated and nervous. The majority of the local organs attack the proposal as tending to strengthen the Sultan at the expense of both Senate and Chamber. The Terdjuman-i Hakikat, a minor Committee organ, finds Said's proposals eminently reasonable and constitutional. The Tanin maintains a modest silence. In the Macedonian provinces the extremist journals support the Grand Vizier.

Rumours of the discovery of bombs on the bridge of Galata, at the Porte, at the War Office, and heaven knows where else, are rife. There appears to be no foundation for these reports, but the precautions taken at the War Office and elsewhere seem to indicate that the authorities are nervous—or wish to create an impression.

The destruction by fire of the British Summer Embassy on the banks of the Bosphorus at Therapia appears to have been purely accidental, although no coherent theory as to how the fire started is current. In spite of all efforts most of the Ambassador's furniture was destroyed with the building, though a good deal of Government property was saved. There is widespread sympathy with Sir Gerald Lowther for his loss and for the great trouble and inconvenience which will inevitably be caused him by the destruction of the Summer Embassy, which cannot possibly be rebuilt in time for occupation next June.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST")

The Macedonian Internal Organisation continues its work of attempting to provoke massacres in European Turkey by indulging in bomb outrages and the wrecking of trains. They have not yet managed to bring off another coup so disgraceful and so successful as the explosion in the mosque and market place of Ishtib, where they not only killed and injured a large number of perfectly innocent people, but brought about a riot in which the Turks, maddened by the outrage, killed and wounded an even greater number of Bulgarians before the local authorities could restore order. This "massacre" they are now exploiting to stir up feeling in Bulgaria against Turkey, and through their friends in the European Press, to promote an anti-Turkish agitation in Great Britain and other countries. Violent protest meetings have been held in Sofia. By that and other measures pressure is being applied to the Bulgarian Government to force it into an attitude of unfriendliness towards Turkey, and the correspondents of foreign newspapers have sent telegrams dwelling with horror on the misdeeds of the Turks and making little or no reference to the way in which the "massacre" was engineered by the Internal Organisation. The only way the Turks can defeat these tactics is by keeping their heads vigilantly watching out and punishing the authors of outrages, and sternly suppressing all attempts at reprisals. If they do this they may, we hope, count on the loyal co-operation of the Bulgarian Government, which has, on several occasions, disavowed any sympathy with the campaign of outrage in Macedonia, and expressed its desire for friendly and even cordial relations with the Porte. M. Gueschoff, there is some reason to think, is as firmly convinced of the wisdom of this policy, at any rate for the present, as is M. Venizelos, on whose determined resistance to the Cretan attempts to force his hand we comment in our leading article.

Cairo, December 14.

Three further missions organized by the Red Crescent Society in Egypt and consisting of a number of doctors and nurses have left Cairo by way of Matruh to join the Turkish forces in Tripoli. After reaching the railroad the missions will make their way across country to their respective stations at Tobruk, Derna and Benghazi, since, shortly before their departure, the Italian Government withdrew the permission which had been granted to proceed to the seat of war by sea. In all, four missions, to defray the cost of which considerable sums of money have been raised by public subscription, have been despatched by the society.

As is natural, the Moslems of Egypt are deeply interested in the course of the war, but while, equally naturally, they feel the greatest sympathy for their co-religionists, complete tranquillity prevails throughout the country. In Cairo not the slightest hostility has been manifested by the native population towards even Italians, of whom there are large numbers resident in the city. In accordance with Egypt's attitude of neutrality strict measures are being taken by the Government to prevent the passage of arms or ammunition into Tripoli from Egypt.

Constantinople, December 17.

An iradeh has been issued appointing Sir Richard Crawford as Financial and Economic Adviser to the Ottoman Government. I understand that Sir Richard Crawford, whose appointment is highly popular, will retain control over the Customs administration which he has done so much to purify and to reorganize.

The Austro-Hungarian Ambassador informed Assim Bey on Thursday that in the event of Russia's making definite official proposals to the Porte in regard to the question of the Straits his Government would declare itself in favour of the status quo, in conformity with existing treaties, until such a solution was found as would safeguard the interests of Turkey and the other signatory Powers. It is believed that the German Ambassador made a similar statement on the following day.

In the meantime Hussein Djahid Bey, editor of the Tanin, who recently published two articles hinting at the possibility of a Russo-Turkish agreement on the subject, is not only severely attacked by the rest of the Press, but is taken to task by the majority of the Committee, which is understood to be averse to any such concession to Russia.

Salonika, December 19.

It is believed that the Ottoman Government have found a means of settling the war, but complete independence and the dissolution of the Chamber are indispensable for the carrying out of their scheme. Hence the Government's anxiety for the modification of Article 35 of the Constitution.

Sofia, December 19.

I learn from a trustworthy source that on the night of December 11-12 a special train conveying war material from Germany arrived at the Turco-Serbian frontier station of Zibeftche, where it was met by an officer of superior rank despatched specially from Uskub. The utmost secrecy was observed, and the train, preceded by a pilot engine, left for Salonika and Constantinople, its progress being reported from various stations along the line. Another train, similarly laden, was expected to reach Zibeftche on the 16th instant, but information is not yet forthcoming with regard to its arrival.

According to the same source, the Turkish Ambassador in Berlin has tendered the thanks of his Government to the Emperor William for the convincing proof of German friendship furnished by the despatch of munitions of war to Turkey at this critical juncture.

War preparations are being rapidly pushed forward in the European vilayets of Turkey, especially in the Albanian districts and in the neighbourhood of the Montenegrin frontier. All the reservists of the Salonika Division have been supplied with uniforms and ordered to hold themselves in readiness to proceed to headquarters. The officers of the reserve are stated to have already been summoned to join the colours. The troops at Skutari will shortly be reinforced by 5,000 men.

The situation of Macedonia daily grows worse and the authorities evidently anticipate serious trouble in the near future. Notwithstanding their positive assertions in regard to Italian complicity in the bomb outrages, they now declare that the authors of these crimes are Montenegrin Anarchists working in collusion with the Internal Organization.

The Bulgarian population of Ishtib are much reassured by the presence of the Parliamentary Commission, which is stated to have already obtained clear evidence of the participation of gendarmes and police agents in the "pogrom" of December 4.

Rome, December 20.

A reconnaissance was made by the Italian troops yesterday morning from Ain Zara in the direction of Bir Tobras. Some resistance was met with and fighting took place which, according to an official despatch of to-day's date from Tripoli, resulted in the retreat of the enemy. The Italian troops passed the night on the scene of the encounter.

The following semi-official statement is issued here to-day:—

The Ottoman Government has circulated throughout Europe a communiqué, in which it is declared that Italian warships bombarded a mosque at the time of prayers, killing 15 and wounding many others. The object of this fiction is obvious, and it is equally clear that, apart from considerations of what is right and humane, it is in Italy's own interest that she should not offend the religious sentiments of her Mussulman subjects or of the populations with whom the Italian colony of Eritrea in peace time carries on an active trade. No Italian vessel carried out any bombardment in the neighbourhood of Moka on the day named in the Turkish communication. A week previously the gunboat Vulturio fired several shots at some troops at Moka who had opened fire on one of its cutters from a building and its vicinity.

An official despatch from Tripoli reports that on the 16th instant, the Italian gunboat Iride and the torpedo-boat Cassiopea, which were engaged in a reconnaissance of the coast, landed a company of bluejackets near Suara at Sidi Said. The landing party, having reached the shore without opposition, was later fired upon by some hundreds of Arabs who had collected there. The fire was returned both from the sailors on shore and from the ships with such effect that the Arabs were dispersed with heavy loss. Only two men were wounded on the Italian side. The object of the Italian operation was to prevent further reinforcements from reaching the Turks by the eastern coast road from the Tunisian frontier.

The correspondent of the Tribuna sends an interesting account of the discovery of the remains of an ancient Roman temple at Ain Zara, made while intrenchments were being dug. The ruins are said to date from about the time of Septimius Severus, to judge from coins found in an amphora.

Commenting upon the occupation of Sollum by Egyptian troops and of the oases of Djanet and Bilma, on the Tunisian frontier, by the French, the Tribuna says that in neither case is any unfriendly act done towards Italy. The right of Egypt to Sollum and of France to the two oases in question is indisputable, and there can be no reason for surprise that both countries should regard this as an opportune moment for asserting it.

Paris, December 17.

The Temps receives from its special correspondent with the Turkish forces at Azusa, some 40 miles south of Tripoli, a telegram, dated the 15th instant, to the effect that thousands of well-armed Arabs have been assembling during the two preceding days. A contingent from Faizan arrived on Friday after a 48 days march. These men are described as splendid fighters.

Paris, December 20.

It appears that the object of the occupation of the oasis of Djanet by a company of French Sahara Police on November 27, which was announced yesterday, is to put an end to the insecurity which has prevailed in the Hinterland of Tunis since the departure of the Turkish troops at Ghat and Ghadames for the scene of military operations near Tripoli. The oasis, which consists of six villages sparsely populated, owes its importance to the fact that it is one of the principal stations on the caravan route from Ghadames to Sinder, which, with the more easterly route from Murzuk to Lake Chad, connects the Mediterranean with the Sudan. Djanet has been the point whence numerous bands of raiders have started both to the west and south. In order to suppress those raids Djanet was occupied for the first time by Captain Touchard in July, 1905, and was reoccupied in 1909 and last year.

The present occupation will also, according to the Temps, settle a question between France and Turkey which threatened to become acute. When, in 1906, the Turks claimed Djanet, in spite of the previous occupation by Captain Touchard, the French Ambassador in Constantinople obtained from the Sultan an irade, dated August 27, 1906, which provisionally declared Djanet to be neutral pending a definite delimitation of the frontier and created a buffer zone in the region known as Tasli des Asjer, which stretches from Ghadames to Djanet. This agreement, the Temps states, was broken by the Turks when they occupied Djanet with regular troops in May, 1908.

Amsterdam, December 20.

The Netherlands Government refuse to allow the passage of aeroplanes for Turkey through Holland. The police have confiscated at the office of the Compagnie Internationale d'Aviation at Bois-le-Duc all documents relative to the supply of aeroplanes and armaments to Turkey for military purposes, as the Government consider such supply to be a breach of neutrality.

British Policy and Islam.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—Mr. Sykes' letter in your last issue is timely, and all the more welcome as it comes from one of the most able critics of Near Eastern policy in the House. I should like to use a little of your valuable space to make a few remarks on British policy towards Islam. It seems incredible that a great Muhammadan Power like Britain should allow its Foreign Office to adopt a harsh and unfriendly policy towards Muslim States and Muslim susceptibilities, but such is the case. Ever since the Akabah question in 1906 (I was in Tunis at the time and well remember the regrettable impression produced among Muslims by the unnecessarily brutal tone that Downing Street adopted towards the Porte) it seems to be a maxim of the Foreign Office to treat Muslims as a negligible quantity, to be disregarded altogether or simply bullied, as the case may be.

Young Turkey has been treated with entire lack of sympathy in her difficult struggle towards new and high ideals, and where a little wise encouragement could have worked wonders, only silly and irritating criticism has been poured on her by British diplomacy. Had Turkey not been wise enough to disregard the foolish cries of certain London papers about increase of armaments (instead, presumably, of spending the money on Christian rebels in Macedonia), she would be in a worse position than she is now. Then, in the matter of the Tripoli massacres, the House of Commons was "gagged" upon any attempt to criticise Italian crimes, but a ready hearing was always given to tales of "Turkish atrocities" in the past. To say that, because in the past the Powers have helped to keep Turkey alive (?), they have the right to criticise her actions, but not those of Italy, who would not be a Power at all had it not been for France and England, is pure nonsense, though it is nonsense believed to be sense in certain high places in London. Italian susceptibilities must be protected, but Muslim feelings don't matter apparently.

The Persian business is deplorable. The Muslim world sees the humiliating spectacle of Great Britain acting as the mercenary tool of Russia and doing her best to bully the Persian people into submission to the Muscovite. Why British interests, prestige and honour should be sacrificed in order to gain the uncertain friendship of St. Petersburg is explicable only on the ground that we are too weak to stand without it. This explanation, though untrue, has done our prestige more harm than one cares to realise.

The vast soundingboard of Islam has echoed the names of Denshaw, Akabah, Tripoli, Morocco and Persia throughout Asia. Each name is an unhealing wound in the body of Islam and Great Britain is more or less connected with all of them. Islam is more united than ever, and united action by Muslims all the world over is within sight, and no longer far off. Unless our present shortsighted policy towards Islam is changed (it has, alas! achieved almost irreparable mischief), we shall live to see a catastrophe. Upon the day of European warfare, Muslims will rise, from Fez to Cairo, from Calcutta to Kabul, from the Bosphorus to Yunnan, and Christian domination will fall in the conflagration which its own errors and injustice have kindled.—Yours, etc.,

Position of the Forces.

(BY THE "TIMES" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT)

So far as can be judged from unofficial information, the Italians must have not much fewer than 80,000 men in North Africa at this moment. There are from 40,000 to 45,000 near Tripoli itself; 15,000 men at Benghazi and perhaps more; 12,000 at Derna; 5,000 at Tobruk; and perhaps 3,000 at Homs. The 4th Division is ashore at Derna under General Vittorio Trionfi, less one regiment sent to Benghazi; but the position of the regiments of the 1st Division cannot be ascertained from any reports that have come through, and for all that we know it may be still in Italy in reserve.

The Italian Staff, warned by recent experiences in Albania and Hungary, have taken steps to reorganise their divisions. The two classes recalled to the colours, which are normally under arms, have given Italy a fresh reserve.

285,000 men, or 300,000 deducting the troops in Africa, while the Royal Decree of December 9 has given authority to reconstitute in Italy a complete Army Corps to take the place of the eventual and permanent garrison of Italian North Africa. It is no doubt intended to create gradually a voluntarily enlisted Army for this purpose and the measures taken to carry out this idea will be watched in England with considerable interest. The strength of the Army in Italy exceeds the normal peace effectives very considerably, so that, even if the want of good cadres should be severely felt, and if the drain upon brigades and corps for troops and drafts should diminish somewhat the general efficiency of the Army at home, the Italian Staff should still be ready to confront without undue anxiety any trouble in Europe.

The Hoetzendorf episode in Austria-Hungary has probably not been without influence upon the Italian conduct of the war in the higher sense. Italy, no doubt, reserves the prescriptive right of a belligerent to take what military action she pleases, and in her own good time, against her enemy. But if she has decided to keep clear of the Aegean for the moment, and to restrict herself to the rapid prosecution of the war in North Africa, she has probably decided upon what is not only a prudent course, but one that is best in her own interest and best also in the interest of eventual if not speedy peace. The return of the Duke of the Abruzzi to Brindisi with the Vettor Pisane and 25 destroyers and torpedo-boats is to some extent an indication that naval operations of a new and active character are not for the moment within sight. Professors at staff colleges can point to the campaign as an example of the limited objective in strategy—a chapter in the art of war which is less well explored than it might be.

The environs of Tripoli are now clear from Gargareschi to Tajura and for at least 25 miles south of Tripoli itself. The whole of the oasis has been occupied, and it has been discovered that practically all the male population has fled. Italian advanced guards have penetrated for some 20 miles into the desert on the roads leading to Gharian and Gebel Tarhuna, encountering only a few Arab scouts, while the Lancers from Florence and the aeroplane officers have not caught sight of any hostile gathering. The main body of the Turks has apparently retreated to Gharum, possibly leaving a rearguard at Arziieh, while the Tarhuna tribesmen have retired to their native hills round Kasrdoga and Kasr Tarhuna. Only three or four mountain guns are believed to remain in Turkish hands. Two Italian dirigibles have reached Tripoli, where hangars are under construction for them. The use of airships and aeroplanes in combination will arouse much interest in all armies, but we must not draw hasty conclusions from their use, since the Turks have neither aircraft nor anti-aircraft guns.

The Infantry at Tripoli must amount to nearly 40 battalions. The regiments present include the 1st and 2nd Grenadiers, the 6th, 18th, 23rd, 37th, 40th, 61st, 82nd, 84th and 93rd Regiments of the Line, the 11th Bersaglieri and the Fenestrelle Alpine Battalion. It is not yet known what course the Italian command proposes to take. Reports indicate that there are not more than 1,000 camels in Italian hands, and it is likely that more would have been collected from Entrea, Italian Somaïland, and other quarters had an immediate advance into the interior been intended. An advance as far as Gharum and Gebel Tarhuna may still be on the cards, and a light railway is projected as far as Am Zara, which is now a strongly fortified post. It is not often, however, that a Regular army confronts the difficulties and dangers of desert campaigning with impunity, and on the whole, we must reserve our judgment upon the future prospects of the campaign until we learn the principles upon which General Caneva proposes to conduct it.

In Cyrenaica the Italians have hitherto maintained a more or less defensive attitude; but the arrival of the 4th Division at Derna and the probable strengthening of the garrison of Benghazi suggest that offensive movements will shortly take place. Derna is now in wireless communication with Tobruk and Benghazi will be joined up in a few days. The three chief Italian posts in Cyrenaica will then also be connected with the wireless station in Italy at Caltanissetta. At Tobruk, which includes among its garrison the 21st Infantry and an Alpine battalion of the 5th, there were last week the Pisa, Enna, Etruria, Vulcano, repair ships, and a dozen destroyers and torpedo boats. At Derna there are the 7th, 22nd and 26th Regiments of Infantry, two Alpine battalions and one each of the 20th and 40th Regiments. At Benghazi there are the rest of the 20th, besides the 57th, 58th and 63rd Regiments, but it is possible that reinforcements have been or will be despatched to the town. All three posts are now strongly defended and the Turkish attacks upon them have had no luck. No one appears to know precisely how many Arabs, and of what tribes, are with Turks, and estimates vary from 7,000 to 70,000.

Hostilities have extended to the Red Sea, where the Italians have a little squadron made up of the Piemonte, Volturno, Puglia, Arbus, and one other small cruiser, besides several armed sailing craft. Several points on the coast of Arabia have been bombarded and numerous boats of a new invasion flotilla have been sunk. It is scarcely credible, but reports show that the Turks intended to capture the strait from Spalikh Said, to attack the Italians in Eritrea, and then to march through the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan into Cyrenaica. Alexander could scarcely have been more ambitious.

The Italians at Tripoli.

Without labouring the reasons which prompted Italy to engage in a little adventure of "High-Tobyism" in the Mediterranean, it is impossible to discuss her campaign in the Tripolitaine without making reference to the passions which prompted the declaration of war. Italy has nursed a sentimental claim upon the northern coast-line of Africa for more than a generation. Her claim has mainly rested upon propinquity and the tradition of Roman conquest. The poignancy of this claim has been enhanced by the episodes in Mediterranean history that have narrowed its scope. Egypt on the one hand, Tunisia on the other, have passed to England and France, leaving to Italy only the Tripolitaine oasis ports and the ghosts of a civilisation in Cyrenaica.

There was also another impetus to Italian military energy. For fifteen years there has hung over the Italian nation a great shadow—the shadow of a miserable defeat and national degradation suffered without remonstrance. Civilians may forget these things, but an army never forgets. For fifteen years the "skeleton in the cupboard" of Italy's army has been Adowa. No amount of gay cavalry cloaks or skilful military horsemanship could eradicate it. No peace excellence in embarkation duties could dislodge it. Nothing but a victory in blood could destroy it. It will be seen later in this article how the influence of Adowa was to dominate the campaign in the Tripolitaine.

Once a powerful country has turned covetous eyes upon a weaker land there is one royal road that leads to annexation. The covetous power schemes to lay a railway, open a bank, or build harbour works in the poorer land. As sure as a sleeper is laid, a counter opened, or crane erected, the independence of the weaker country is doomed. In Tripoli it has been the Banca di Roma that has furnished the necessary casus belli to precede annexation. Again we have the shadow of Adowa pervading Italy's African adventure. Ever since that memorable reverse the Porte has treated Italy, if not as a negligible quantity, at least as a third-rate fighting Power. Though unable to prevent the establishment of the bank, yet each Vali of Tripoli has had orders to thwart its development. Only those who have knowledge of Turkish passive resistance can fully appreciate what these orders meant to the sovereign dignity of a great European Power. Nor was the cause of complaint shadowy. Even though the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs only four months ago made a public statement to the effect that there were no difficulties between the Italian Government and the Porte, yet the world knows that this was not the truth, and that the Italian Consul-General in Tripoli was smarting under a campaign of pin-pricks that became unbearable. To be fair we must admit this, especially when we know that one Vali who was suddenly recalled as the result of Italian insistence complained bitterly that he should be publicly degraded for carrying out the policy with which he was provided by his own Foreign Minister.

THE DIRECT CAUSE.

Without a doubt, ever since the Young Turk revolution, Italy has had in contemplation a sudden descent upon Tripoli at the first favourable opportunity. It was only the fear of European objections that prevented her from falling upon Tripoli when Austria mulcted the Ottoman empire of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Ferdinand established the complete independence of Rumelia. Matters had therefore to remain in abeyance until a more favourable opportunity presented itself. The opportunity, strangely enough, came to the present Italian Ministry. I say "strangely enough," because it so happens that members of the present Ministry are not unconnected with the financial fortunes of the Banca di Roma. It was the trend of events in Morocco this summer that gave to Italy the cue. In spite of Socialism and its dwarfing influences, Italy is still a patriotic country. If this patriotism is somewhat of a hysterical order, none the less it proved valuable to the statesmen who were intent upon robbing Turkey of Tripoli. Such an unusual proceeding was quite sufficient to influence journalists in their judgment. It was insidiously suggested that the German occupation of Agadir was but a preliminary to a German campaign of aggrandisement that destined Tobruk as the next probable seizure. Italian public opinion was inflamed by a mysterious statement that negotiations were already on foot by which the Porte was ceding the port to Germany. Having manoeuvred public opinion in this way, the Italian Government gave its preliminary orders for the mobilisation of an expeditionary force. Public sentiment waxed strong in their favour, and Italy armed; while neither Europe nor Turkey believed that she was in earnest.

It was only about the 15th October, three days before an ultimatum was sent to Turkey, that Europe woke up to the realisation.

* The Italians were crushingly defeated by the Abyssinians at Adowa and the prisoners of war were said to have been mutilated.

tion that she was on the brink of a European war from an altogether unexpected quarter. Since the beginning of September all eyes had been glued upon the Franco-German frontier, looking for that trivial affair of outposts that would have rocked the whole civilised world to its foundation. There had been no attention left for Italy and Tripolitania. The Ottoman Government, even, had not taken the warnings too seriously until the beginning of October. Then the latter suddenly realised that while the first three Orders of the Ottoman army had been placed upon an efficient war-footing, the Tripoli detached division was hopelessly unaided and under strength. To send men in the present juncture was impossible, but it might be practical to send arms and ammunition to the local Arabs. The Derna, an Austrian Lloyd steamer, was therefore chartered. Her hold was filled with arms and ammunition, and she was cleared for Tripoli. The sailing of the Derna had the effect of "speeding up" the Italian plans, with the result that the declaration of war came just a little too soon. As events were to prove, it would have been far better for the Italian campaign if they had arrested the Derna on the high seas, and let this incident establish the casus belli, than to have chaperoned her with a cruiser all the way from the Dardanelles to Tripoli without action. As a result, she was able to disgorge her dangerous cargo some days before hostilities were begun.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF WAR

The Italian ultimatum was presented on 28th October and expired on 30th October at 4 P.M. The document was couched in language which no self-respecting Government, however impotent, could have suffered, and it was, therefore, ipse facto, a declaration of war. This outbreak of war created one of the most curious strategical situations that has ever come before the student. It demonstrated conclusively the impossibility of empire unless it be adequately based upon sea power. Here we had Turkey, with no navy to speak of, yet with a powerful European and Asiatic army, practically powerless before Italy. The latter Power's fleet, while it rendered Turkey's main armies innocuous, enabled the army to throw its weight upon a detached portion of the Ottoman empire. The more curious result from this apparently one-sided affray is the fact that while Italy could not effect any great material damage upon Turkey, beyond the destruction of the Ottoman forces marooned in the Tripolitaine, Turkey is able to effect considerable economic punishments upon her enemy. As the Ottoman subjects have already demonstrated on several notable occasions, they are wonderful agents in the application of a national boycott. The Turkish empire is a great market for Italy's small wares. This market is now completely closed. Over and above the financial losses effected by this means, the cost of the war, with its large expeditionary force that has to be fed entirely from Italy, is a heavy drain upon a country that is not noted in Europe for its financial stability. The other belligerent, however, has practically no expenses, as it can do but little to further the fortunes of its tiny army detached in the Tripolitaine. While the war is costing Italy nearly three million sterling a week, it is not costing the Ottoman Empire as many piastres a year. If the situation were not so pathetic it would be almost humorous. However brave and expeditious the Italians may be against the handful of Turks opposed to them in the Tripolitaine, they dare not disembark an army either on the Macedonian or Anatolian coast line. Yet without an army to impress their will upon the Turkish capital, they have as much chance of forcing Turkey to make peace and to pay an indemnity as a pretender would have of seizing the English throne. This, be it said by way of parenthesis, is a lesson which we in this country might do well to take to heart. We, like Italy in this war, have the naval power to limit most operations in which we may be engaged without the striking force that alone can make naval force productive. The best of battleships cannot go over land, or for that matter force the Dardanelles.

The disparity between the navies of the belligerents is such that it is barely necessary to enumerate the "strengths" of both countries. Italy entered the campaign with a battleship squadron of two divisions, and a cruiser squadron of similar strength, only that one division was a ship short.

Against the Italian battleships of 10,000 tons displacement the Turkish navy could only show the two old ships that had recently been purchased from Germany, and the two small protected cruisers, Hamidiye and Medjidieh. In the smaller craft Italy also held a big advantage, though there was one division of Turkish destroyers that was said to be a credit to the British officer who had instructed officers and crew.

Until the time of writing, the naval history of the campaign has been meagre in the extreme. When the ultimatum was despatched from Rome the Turkish ocean-going squadron was on the point of sailing from Beirut, where it had put in for coal, after exercising in the Aegean waters. It had been Italy's aim to arrange the expiration of the ultimatum so that Admiral Aubry could send the first battleship division and first cruiser division to intercept and destroy the Turkish sea-going fleet before it reached the Dardanelles. This was to have been the first paralyzing coup by which Italy trusted to make the war short and decisive. There is little information of what happened to the Italian fleet: this much is known, that the Turkish squadron, all ignorant of the declaration of war, arrived safely at the entrance to the Dardanelles. It is possible that the British officers who were on board had some inkling of what was in the wind, and that they induced their admiral to steer a false course, and thus eluded the Italian greyhounds. The Italian newspapers, to save face, say that the Turkish squadron was permitted to escape, since it was the plan of the Italian Government to extend the operations beyond the Tripolitaine waters. It should be remarked, however, that the Italian fleet went down to the Dardanelles and arrived there in time to see the smoke of the Turkish vessels that had disappeared in the direction of the Sea of Marmora. Once the Turks had disappeared into the Dardanelles, there was little left for the Italian navy to do but to aid in the disembarkation of the expeditionary force. There was a tiny affair at Prevesa, where the Italian first destroyer division swept up a couple of Turkish small craft. A Turkish electric launch was also captured in a Red Sea harbour.

THE RIVAL ARMIES.

The Italian General Staff calculated that two divisions would be sufficient for the occupation of the Tripolitaine coast towns. It was argued that if Italy could put a division on shore at Tripoli, a brigade at Benghazi, and split up another to guard the other coast ports, that Turkey, with her fleet destroyed, would have no choice but to accept the inevitable and surrender her claims in North Africa at discretion. How often have those who thought to base their plans upon the hypothesis that Turkey would act in a certain manner, suffered through the inconsistencies of the Oriental mind! How often has the plain path of diplomacy and strategy been vitiated by the curious stubbornness of the Turk! History is replete with such instances, and again has history repeated itself in the brief period of this Turco-Italian war. Turkey has done nothing that Italy expected she would do, and Italy, instead of occupying the Tripolitaine with 40,000 troops for a few weeks until the country was ceded to her, finds herself under the obligation of entering upon an Arab war that may last for months, and necessitate the mobilisation of perhaps 200,000 men. We are, however, only concerned with the first mobilisation. This consisted of two infantry divisions to take the field and one division in reserve. Although a large number of reservists were called to the colours, the two service divisions were almost entirely completed by serving men. The peace establishments were extended by drafting serving men from adjacent units. The staff intended by this method to save the time which would have had to be spent in the reinstruction of reservists. For the immediate purposes of war it was a doubtful expedient.*

It will be seen that the Italian force was very generally drawn from the whole of Italy, though perhaps a southern element predominated. To convey the force to the coast of Tripoli a great fleet of transports had been taken up, which was gathered in Naples harbour.

There is not the same information available concerning the Turkish garrison in Tripolitania. The Tripoli Command is an independent division directly controlled from Constantinople. It has some of the peculiarities of a Colonial army, as it is supposed to dispose of 10 battalions of local militia, which are neither nizams nor redifs. The composition of the Tripoli division is returned as 4 field-batteries and 2 mountain batteries, 17 battalions of nizam infantry and 10 squadrons of nizam cavalry, plus the 10 battalions of local militia already mentioned. At normal peace strength the totals would give roughly 10,000 nizams and 5,000 militia. It may be taken, however, as practically certain that the garrison was starved, and that the peace strengths were not up to the establishments. The nearest estimates of the troops actually found in Tripoli town at the declaration of war is that based on the review which the Vali attended on "Independence Day." Then about 4,000 Turkish troops of all arms marched past. Although the Tripoli garrison had been neglected by Istanbul, it must not be thought that it was in the decayed state that one connects with the Turkish army of a few years back. The supply of quick-firing field and mountain artillery (Krupp 1908) was up to establishment. The men throughout the division were equipped with khaki uniforms and the new faïce and bashlik. There was an adequate supply of small-arm ammunition, and, as the Italians were to learn to their cost, there was also a fine supply of reserve magazine rifles. What Tripoli lacked was land defences, the semicircle of forts that defended the harbour were of ancient construction, and were furnished with an obsolete model of Krupp fortress artillery. Moreover, there were not trained fortress gunners to man the batteries and to get from them the best of their puny powers. At a liberal computation the most that Neshet Bey, the chief military commander, could count upon in the matter of trained Turkish soldiers in the whole vilayet of Tripoli could not have exceeded 10,000 men. That he was able to enlist a large amount of raw material amongst the Arabs and Bedouin came as another great surprise to the Italians.

On the 20th September two divisions of the Italian fleet appeared off Tripoli and manoeuvred in a menacing manner in the offing. The acting Vali, Munir Pasha, had already been informed of the ultimatum. Munir Pasha is a feeble old gentleman, and the direction of affairs fell automatically into the hands of Neshet Bey, his senior staff officer and the virtual commander of the garrison. Neshet Bey knew that it was hopeless to attempt to oppose a naval attack with the fortress armament existing in Tripoli. He therefore decided to arm all the Arabs in the Tripoli environment, and to fall back himself to one or another of the large oases in the interior with all the regular troops at his disposal. To this purpose every camel in the Tripoli oasis was commandeered, and all the army contractors, under pressure, were instructed to collect as much food-stuffs as would be necessary for 5,000 men for three months. As many of the local militia as could be found were immediately mobilised and issued with arms and uniforms. The Regular troops left barracks and encamped at the Bomelliana pumping station on the outskirts of the desert, ready to march southward the moment the Italians attempted to throw a force ashore.

While all these preparations were being hurried forward, certain conversations were taking place in town. Tripoli, like all Ottoman towns of importance, was cursed with a consular body that took unto itself all the airs and graces, if not the functions, of a diplomatic body. These people hectoring old Munir Pasha about the safety of the Christian population. Neshet Bey, however, had no misgivings about the Christian population. They were to serve a military purpose here. He let Munir's agents parley with the perspiring consuls while he himself gave instructions to the Arab boatmen that no fugitives, except Italians, were to be allowed to leave Tripoli by sea. Neshet Bey, in his wisdom, deemed that it was as well to have witnesses in Tripoli of Italian actions. The Turkish troops evacuated Tripoli by detachments between 30th September and 2nd October. By the evening of October 2 the last échelon had moved out into the desert, and there were no troops left in the town except a few seedy fortress artillerymen who had orders to man the forts "just to make a show." The townspeople had already shown signs of panic. The population of Tripoli does not differ materially from that of other seaports in the Levant. It has a large population of the parasitical races that cling to the fringe of the Ottoman Empire. These are Jews, Maltese, Greeks, Levantines, Syrians, and nondescripts of no definite nationality. There must be some 20,000 of these, with another 40,000 of the Arabs of the oasis.

TRIPOLI.

It will be well here to give some description of Tripoli. The town itself stands upon the enclave of a little bay that forms a natural harbour. The town of Tripoli has been built partly upon a sandy beach, partly upon an excrescence of rock that juts out into the sea. The feature of the place, however, is the oasis. A strip of moisture-retentive soil about 12 kilometers in length divides the coast-line from the actual desert. This fertile strip, which has an average depth of about a mile and a quarter, is one immense palm-grove. Between the interstices of the palm-trees flourish cacti, fig, and olive trees. Nestling beneath the shade of this very lengthy grove are the villages of the town Arabs. These are usual flat-roofed mud edifices that are common to North Africa. For the most part they are encircled, or their garden patches are enclosed, with low mud walls and a bewildering labyrinth of cactus hedge. Among the villages are a number of Moslem burial-grounds, which in many cases have been walked in to save the tombs from the wear of the water courses formed during the torrential rains of the rainy season.

The town proper is just one of those mazes in oriental architecture that bewilder the Western conception in sanitary town-planning. It is a medley of tall house enclosing courtyards, and forming, in consequence of their grouping, those dark alleys and hideous streets which breed the diseases inseparable from Eastern life. In places the monotony of these dingy streets is relieved by the frescoes to the mosques, and here and there is found a long covered in bazaar of the model that is common to Turkestan, Persia, Syria, and North Africa. The defences of this town consisted of a few mud batteries on both horns of the bay, and a group of forts on the seashore, where on the west the palm-grove terminates in desert. This latter group is locally called Gilgursh, though in the Admiralty charts the group of earthworks are styled the Sultanah Forts. As these forts were unable to oppose the Italian naval attack, it is unnecessary to make further reference to them or their armament.

On 3rd October Admiral Faravelli, who commanded the two naval divisions before Tripoli, bombarded the land defences. The few seedy Turkish artillerymen that were left behind, aided by some Arabs, just fired sufficient rounds from the obsolete Krupps "to save the garrison's face," and Tripoli was henceforth at the mercy of the Italians.

It is difficult to understand why Admiral Faravelli took this occasion to bombard Tripoli. In pursuance of a strategy that would seem to be logical, one would have thought that he would have waited until the army was ready to be landed before proceeding to extremities in Tripoli. As it was, there was no chance of the army appearing on the scene for another ten days, and the onus, not only of occupying Tripoli town, but of preventing the Turks from re-occupying it, fell upon the navy. There is a theory that in Italy, as in some other countries, there is jealousy between the sister services, and that in the case of Tripoli the navy wished to show their independence of the army. This seems hardly credible; but in acting as they did, the sailors undertook a grave risk, and if they had been actuated by jealousy, they had subsequently to swallow their satisfaction, since they were driven to appeal to the soldiers for immediate succours. (To be continued.)

The Royal Visit.

The King telegraphed to Mr. Asquith on January 10th.—"Before leaving India on our homeward voyage, I am sure that you as the head of my Government will be glad to know that from all classes, private and public, I gather that my highest hopes have been realized and that the success of our visit has exceeded all expectations not only in Bombay, Delhi and Calcutta, but in every other part of the country where the Queen and I have been. All classes, races and creeds have united in receiving us with admirable signs of enthusiasm and affection. The magnificent display at the Durbar was the outcome of wise and well-considered plans brilliantly carried out through the untiring efforts of the Viceroy and those working under him. During our pleasant visit to the Viceroy all Calcutta combined in doing everything possible for our comfort and enjoyment. I rejoice that, thanks to the mutual confidence between me and my people at home, I have been enabled to fulfil the wish of my heart. This satisfaction will be still greater if it should prove that our visit has conducted to the lasting good of India and of the Empire at large."

China.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 11th.—The Chinese revolutionaries have seized the arsenal at Kuldja in Chinese Turkestan, killed four hundred Manchus and proclaimed a Republic.

The Revolutionary Government at Kuldja, under General Maanah as President, issued a proclamation on the 14th enjoining the preservation of order and respect for foreigners under pain of death. The new Government does not trust Manchu soldiers and employs Zhetpai mercenaries. All is quiet.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 11th.—Russia's denial that she is preparing to occupy Mongolia is considered here as obscuring the issue as there was no question of occupation. The Wai-Wu-Pu says that the statement issued on the 8th instant was a faithful summary of Russia's communications. In view of the inconvenience of negotiating during the upheaval, negotiations are being transferred to St. Petersburg. It is understood that China is prepared to discuss the railway proposals, including the linking up of the Kaikhtaurga line and the Siberian Railway.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 14th.—It is semi-officially denied here that Russia intends to establish six new consulates in Mongolia beyond the existing consulates at Urga, Kobdo and Uliassutai, or to increase the guards, the number of whom is 150 at Urga and 25 each at Kobdo and Uliassutai.

A telegram received from Harbin states that armed Mongolians have seized Khailar. They have declared their independence and have appointed new authorities. The Chinese troops and authorities have taken refuge in the Russian settlement at Khailar station.

The newspaper report of the despatch of Russian troops to Mongolia is officially denied.

Reuter wires on the 14th.—The whole Imperial army from Hankow is on its way to Honan with the object of crushing the combined army in Shensi and Shansi.

The Revolutionaries, who are invading Honan, are meeting Manchu princes to-day. They have resolved to request the Throne to retire immediately to Jehol.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 15th.—The Imperial Army from Kansu, which has hitherto been regarded as mythical, has arrived after much fighting within sixty miles of Sianfu, the capital of Shensi, which province is in a state of complete turmoil. Many towns have been looted and are deserted.

The massacre of ten thousand Manchus is confirmed. Nineteen English and thirteen Swedish missionaries have arrived at Honanfu from Sianfu.

The Imperialists were defeated on Thursday by the revolutionary troops which are invading Honan.

The armistice has been extended by fourteen days.

The Chinese armistice expired on the 15th. The Republicans are moving from Wuchang to attack the Imperial base at Siakan, forty miles north. Eleven transports and six cruisers are being prepared at Shanghai to proceed to Chifu to co-operate in advance of the other insurgent forces who are proceeding to Peking by four routes. The Imperial troops are hastening to oppose them.

Three Revolutionary cruisers and three transports conveying troops and artillery have left Shanghai for Chifu. Additional troops will follow in a week.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 14th.—The Throne has practically decided to abdicate and to retire to Jehol almost immediately. Arrangements have already partly been made.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 15th.—The decision of the Government to abdicate was the outcome of secret meetings of Manchus of all classes who considered that abdication was necessary to save the country from chaos.

Yuan-Shi-Kai will remain at Peking and effect the best possible arrangement with the Republicans in the way of providing for the Emperor's and the Dowager Empress' future.

It is understood that the Powers will support him. The abdication is expected before to-morrow.

Telegrams from the provinces give a shocking picture of murders, rapes and arson. Hundreds of women are committing suicide to escape violation.

Reuter wires from Shanghai on the 14th.—Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen in his capacity of President of the Republic to-day inspected the warships at Nanking and steamed between lines of eight beflagged warships. The banks of the river were crowded. The British, German and American ships did not acknowledge the salute of the President's yacht.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 15th.—A bomb was thrown at Yuan-Shi-Kai as he was returning from the Palace. Two policemen were killed but Yuan-shi-Kai was unhurt.

Reuter wires from Tokio on the 15th.—The Government has refused to assist the Chinese revolutionaries to negotiate for a loan declaring that it will not swerve from its policy of neutrality.

A message to the Times on the 16th from Peking states that its correspondent has excellent authority for believing that an Edict will appear in a few days not only announcing the abdication of the Throne but decreeing a Republic, the President of which shall be elected by the people.

It is confidently believed that the Republican leaders at Nanking will recognise the paramount claims of Yuan-Shi-Kai to the Presidency.

Tong-Shao-Yi has received a telegram from Peking stating that the Imperial Princes are unanimously in favour of the acceptance of the Republican terms. It is believed that the negotiations with a view to peaceful settlement are nearing completion.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 16th.—The man who threw a bomb at Yuan-Shi-Kai with four others was subsequently arrested at a tea house. The High Executioner is now parading before the building awaiting orders. Twelve soldiers and three civilians were wounded as the result of the explosion. The route was lined by troops. The would-be assassin's aim was bad as the bomb fell twenty feet from Yuan's carriage. The explosion shook the houses in the neighbourhood. Yuan's visit to the Palace was in connection with the abdication of the Throne. An officer and soldier have died of the wounds received in the bomb outrage. Forty have been arrested.

The Pioneer understands that it has been decided to reinforce the garrison of Hong-Kong by two battalions of Indian Infantry, and the Indian Mountain Battery troops warned for embarkation at Karachi are the 25th and 26th Punjabis, while the 24th Hazara Mountain Battery will sail from Rangoon.

The Sowerby Relief Mission has returned. It found the provinces of Shensi, Shansi and Honan in a state of anarchy. Outlaws and revolutionaries could not be distinguished from Imperialists, who were equally lawless. Towns and villages were deserted and people were hiding in caves in the mountains. The gates of Shan-Pu were closed for four days, while mobs murdered 10,000 Manchus.

Home Rule.

The Ulster Unionist Council has decided to take steps to prevent Mr. Churchill and Mr. Redmond from holding a demonstration in favour of Home Rule in Belfast. The Daily News says that the great difference between the forthcoming and the preceding Home Rule Bills will lie in the inclusion of the principle of Home Rule all round.

The Unionist papers say that the decision to prevent Mr. Winston Churchill from speaking at Belfast is due to the certainty of trouble and even bloodshed if he does. The Lord Mayor of Belfast in interviews with the representatives of the Morning Post and the Daily Telegraph said that Belfast was at present like an explosive magazine which only wanted a match to cause an upheaval. The country districts were just as determined to prevent the meeting.

Mr. Mackinnon Wood Financial Secretary to the Treasury, speaking at Acton, described the decision as a most remarkable piece of Irish humour he had ever seen.

The Liberals regard the attitude of the Ulster Council as bluff, but they consider that it is likely to stir up passions in Belfast, and to be productive of the gravest situation. They declare that any violence offered to Mr. Churchill and Mr. Redmond will simply assure the immediate passage of Home Rule.

The Unionist papers urge the abandonment of the invitation to Mr. Churchill who however is described as being inflexibly resolved to speak. The Morning Post hopes that the Council will reconsider its attitude and says it would be wiser if the Orange men guaranteed Mr. Churchill safe conduct. The Daily Telegraph hopes the Radicals will recognise that Ulster is in dead earnest. The Standard says this is the inevitable response to the insolent challenge of the Liberals.

Many Unionists deprecate interference with free speech in Belfast.

Ulster men say they will not object to Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. Redmond speaking at Belfast, but they will not allow the meeting to be held in the historic Ulster Hall, which, though it is the property of the Municipality, is situated in the heart of the Unionist quarter and possesses especial political associations.

Mr. Rose, Consul at Teng-yueh, Yunnan, lecturing on the 15th on the Frontiers of India, before the Royal Geographical Society, dilated on the change arising from the altered circumstances in China. Lord Curzon in a speech warned to regard China's growth and advance watchfully, though not jealously. He hoped no Power would be allowed to tamper with Nepal, Sikkim or Bhutan. He urged definite demarcation of the North-Eastern Frontier as the surest way to avoid quarrelling with China.

It is understood in Bombay that two battalions of the Indian Army have been ordered to proceed to China and will embark from Karachi in the Dufferin and Hardinge in a few days.

Morocco.

FRENCH and Moorish forces have been despatched to raise the siege of Sefru. Sharp fighting took place on the 15th and 16th instant with the rebellious tribesmen, who however fled in disorder, abandoning their camp and leaving many dead. The French had six wounded.

The Aga Khan in Sind.

The Sind Muhammadan Association presented an address at Khalidina Hall, Karachi, on the 15th to His Highness the Aga Khan offering him a hearty welcome to the capital of the province and congratulating him on the further marks of His Majesty's favour of which he was the recipient at the Delhi Durbar.

His Highness, in replying, said the Association had reminded him that he was a native of Karachi, and, though he lived in the Deccan, he had always felt an interest in the province which was full of his co-religionists and was indeed essentially a Muhammadan country. They had kindly referred to his humble services in the wakening of the Muhammadans of India. That work had been the outcome of the Muhammadan revival during the past few years. He felt that the Mussalmans of the province had great opportunities and it was for them to take advantage of those opportunities. The recent great changes announced at Delhi, he felt, would do a lot of good. The territorial changes in Bengal, while taking away some advantages from the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal, would also bring them many advantages. The transfer of the capital to Delhi would also do Sind a great deal of good, and it was for Sind Muhammadans to take advantage of those changes.

It was a matter for regret that, while in the Deccan and Gujarat and in Madras there were branches of the All-Indian Moslem League, no steps had been taken to form a branch in an essentially Muhammadan province like Sind. As regards the treatment of Indians in South Africa, which was a cause of much resentment, he felt it his duty to warn them that to a large extent the treatment was the result of their own fault owing to the backwardness of the majority of Indians in social and intellectual progress. Greater efforts were needed for national self-improvement and education. It was not merely sufficient to send a boy to school. That would give only a parrot-like education. Enlightenment and social progress were needed.

As regards the Moslem University scheme every leader was of opinion that it was needed, and he was in a position to inform them that the Government had agreed to grant them a charter immediately the sum required, viz., 35 lakhs, had been raised. Toward this twenty lakhs had already been secured. Thirty-five lakhs was a mere fleabite when the wealth of the Moslems of India was borne in mind and he regretted to note that Sind had done practically nothing to further the scheme. Of course he knew that some thought that primary education was more urgently required, but they did not sufficiently appreciate the merits of the University scheme, which also aimed at the establishment of colleges at various centres.

Referring to the question of the removal of the Sind Madrasah from its crowded surroundings to more open country, he was in sympathy with the project and saw in it potentialities for the foundation of a Sind Moslem College affiliated to the University which would carry education through the length and breadth of the province. Ill education would no longer be the prerogative of the few but every zemindar would apply to his work and cultivation the latest scientific knowledge. But, with the exception of His Highness the Mir of Khairpur, the fame of whose munificent generosity had spread all over India, even to the remotest parts of Bengal, Sind had done nothing to further the University scheme; and he enjoined a house-to-house collection scheme and the commencement of a plan of a month's salary subscription. While impressing on them the duties of self-reliance and self-sacrifice, he asked forgiveness for making the occasion one for offering advice, but he could not be doing his duty to the city of his birth unless he did so.

In the course of his reply His Highness also referred to the need for national unity between the Hindus and Muhammadans of India.

The Partition.

On the 13th instant, the Anjuman of Mymensingh resorted to a meeting in view of the progress the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal have made since the creation of a separate province. The announcement of the Partition stifles their legitimate aspirations. They unshaken in their loyalty they submit to His Imperial Majesty's wishes and hope that His Majesty's Government will spare them from the wrong done to them by misguiding their leaders.

TETE À TETE

It was with extreme regret that we heard of the sad and sudden death of the Hon. Sir John Jenkins, the Home Member of H.E. the Viceroy's Executive Council. He had had a distinguished career in Bombay and he was a distinct acquisition to the Government of India. He could not have been called intellectually subtle, but his frank outspokenness and straightforward dealings with all were greatly appreciated, and one could trust him far more than some other administrators who have remained as narrow in their heart of hearts as ever, but have accepted the inevitable, under the changed circumstances, only so far as to resort to administrative and even social finessing. Since he left Bombay he had not been the same man physically, and what with the strain of work and the strain of the climate of Bengal, he has at last fallen between the shafts just as he was about to be unharnessed. In a bureaucracy nobody seems to be indispensable and his place will soon be taken by another. But those who came into official contact with him will remember him as a straightforward gentleman, with a rough courtesy that served him better than the smoothness of others. We heartily sympathise with Lady Jenkins in her bereavement. We only wish that British governance was a little more popular and that the sorrows of officials and their joys were shared much more largely, by the people than they are to-day. But the small number of Indians who accompanied the funeral to the cemetery is a condemnation of the caste, rather than of the individual, who, if he had not many intimate friends, had certainly few, if any, enemies.

Events were developing with ominous suddenness and the long-drawn crisis in Chinese affairs seemed to have been moving to some grave catastrophe. The revolutionary forces had been, for some months past, pitched in a life-and-death struggle against the Manchu despotism; and though the Republican cause had not secured a final and decisive victory, there was hardly any doubt left that the best and most patriotic elements in the nation were rapidly filling in with what is truly and in its most comprehensive sense a popular and progressive cause. The struggle for freedom and constitutional government has been directed with courage, intelligence and devotion; and at last the Throne has been advised to retire, and it has practically decided to do so. If no untoward incidents happen, the success of the Chinese national movement may be confidently foretold. But the "if" covers a very big proviso. A popular Eastern romance records the thrilling adventures of a traveller in a land in which there were no physicians, no graveyards and none to bury the dead. On inquiry he was told that the community did not allow the weak and the diseased to live and multiply, that the moment a person began to show signs of disease or failing health he was put to death and—devoured. Some small method of treatment seems to have been devised by Europe in regard to the weaker races of the earth. The fate of Morocco, Tripoli and Persia furnished a tale, if not a moral, that could hardly be improved upon even by the ancient chronicler of romance and impossible adventure. Will the same fate overtake China? Will even this great Empire in the convulsions of a new birth fall a helpless prey to the omnivorous Powers of Europe before its desire for a strong, free and healthy development comes to fruition? European intervention has at last come, though a solemn declaration was made by all the Powers only a short time ago that no such thing would be allowed to happen. Foreign warships are patrolling the Chinese coasts; troops have been landed at various places by the Powers, some of which have no "interest" to safeguard unless it be the prospective residence of a missionary who is yet to be ordained for service in the Far East. The Peking railway has been occupied, which, according to the Times, is "authorised by the protocol of 1903 and justified by the uncertainties of the situation."

This excessive regard on the part of that journal for the sanctity of an obsolete "protocol" is quite of a piece with its latest interpretation of the Anglo-Russian Convention which, of course, was "justified by the uncertainties of the situation." But even the Times will have something new to learn from its masterful protégé, the Muscovite, who is setting the standard in international dealings with his old peculiar methods. This licensed bully of Europe has once again appeared in his old familiar rôle and has begun to play the dictator of the East. After despoiling Persia he has now turned to China, and has ordered her to clear out of Mongolia which, under an independent "dispositary of the Lamaite church," will be generously assisted by him "in the maintenance of order." We have no desire to treat the entire Russian people as a race apart, devoid of the commonest attributes of decency, and we have nothing but sympathy for the Russian masses which are groaning under intolerable misery and despair. But the Russian Government as it exists to-day is the greatest danger to the peace of Asia and of the world. It stands for ruthless tyranny at home and most brutal aggression abroad. It has even put forth its immense military strength to crush the weak with the wanton gusto of the coward. Its unbridled lust for brute dominance over everything and everywhere constitutes the vilest chapter of guilt and scandal in modern history. The Eastern races from Turkey to China, whose life has just begun to throb with the pulsations of new hope and desire, are threatened by this monster with imminent danger of absolute extinction. If their hopes and ideals endure, and if their hearts have been touched with unquenchable fire, they may yet know how to make good their claim to live; and who knows but that they may be driven to unite against their common enemy and save themselves and the fruits of peace and civilisation some day by hunting this foul octopus out of existence? When that day comes, we may presume the Amir of Kabul will not be entirely guided by the friendly advice of the Pioneer which is ready with a lullaby to put the enfant terrible of the North-West to sleep, and, failing that, to administer the traditional pill of opium. But times are critical in the East everywhere, and it is not only China but Turkey, Persia, Morocco, and Egypt also that should profit by the advice of the Nation which wrote some time ago.—

The Chinese crisis has reached the stage at which the stronger Naval Powers think it necessary to deny that they intend to interfere. Nothing could well be worse, unless it were a guarantee of the integrity and independence of the Chinese Empire. The intimation, if the Chinese are wise, will be promptly obeyed, and the two parties to the civil war will come to terms without undue delay. So far, there has apparently been nothing worse than a little "friendly pressure" exerted to hasten the negotiations. The delegates of North and South, meeting at Shanghai, have received a call from the Consuls-General of France, the United States, Russia, Germany, and Great Britain. One account declares that they urged the merits of constitutional monarchy, and advised a settlement in this sense. The Frenchman and the American, we suppose, explained the beauty of royalty, while the Russian expounded the meaning of a Constitution. We are left in ignorance of the Chinese reply, but it was no doubt polite, and may have been a little tactical. The real conclusion, if the Chinese can read it, is that civil war is a luxury which only the rich and the strong may permit themselves in the world we inhabit to-day. What may be done with impunity on the Seine or the Mississippi, must not rashly be attempted on the Yangtze. Pretext or excuse for intervention, the Chinese have given none. But when five Powers happen, each of them, to regard some group of provinces as "a legitimate sphere of aspiration," the only safe rule for their inhabitants is to avoid all abnormal happenings within them.

WE HEARTILY congratulate H.H. the Maharaja of Bikanir on the success of the meeting held at the Town Hall last Wednesday in aid of the Hindu University. His Highness made an ideal speech, using as his text the illuminating phrases of His Majesty's speech in reply to the address of the Calcutta University. The Maharaja's remarks on religious teaching and Hindu-Muhammadan amity will find an echo throughout Moslem India also, and we are confident that words will give place to deeds which are more eloquent when men like the Maharaja of Bikanir stand security for the Hindu University as the Aga Khan has made himself responsible for the tone of the Moslem University. It is very gratifying to know that subscriptions amounting to 43 lakhs had been promised before the meeting and that the Maharaja of Durbhanga was able to announce in the course of his speech that they had reached the splendid figure of half a crore. The Maharaja of Bikanir's own donation of a lakh and an annual subscription of Rs. 12,000 is worthy of imitation by more Muhammadan Princes than have yet been so liberal. The Maharani of Hutwa's one lakh and promise of one or two more when her son attains majority, the Mahant of Tunkeshwar's one lakh, and Babu Hari Har Prasad Sabe's gift of property of the value of half a lakh are some of the important contributions announced at the meeting. As for the Moslem University, the promoters do not appeal any longer for fresh promises, except from the officials and noblemen of Hyderabad. They only ask for the payment of what has already been solemnly promised. The realizations up to 31st December, 1911, amounted to Rs. 18,35,410-9-1. This does not include the sum of Rs. 35,000 paid into the Bank of Bengal by five wealthy merchants of Calcutta.

with the queer and somewhat ungenerous proviso that if the University Act is not passed before the end of March the money would be withdrawn by the donors. The annual grants of some Ruling Chiefs and H.H. the Nizam's donation of 5 lakhs bring up the total to very nearly 30 lakhs. We believe guarantees for the rest will be given by some of the promoters themselves if by the end of January the sum is not raised to 35 lakhs, which is the figure accepted by the Government as adequate for a start. But it is a shame that those who have worked so selflessly and hard throughout the last year should have to begin the new year with another and still larger sacrifice because Burma has not paid over two lakhs out of its promises, and Eastern Bengal still owes nearly half a lakh; because even the generous in Western Bengal are vacillating and doubtful, and the Living Heart of the Punjab throbs no more with the old generosity, which gave it an unusual promptness in payment, but responds only to the demands of a demonstrative loyalty or narrow and cheap communal zeal. The United Provinces, including Rampur, are hardly any better, for if the Punjab has paid only Rs. 1,64,832 out of Rs. 3,69,072, the U.P.'s payment is Rs. 5,87,607 out of a promise of Rs. 9,77,300. The result is that 13 lakhs of rupees out of a total of more than 31 lakhs promised are still unpaid, and it is not one on which any community can be complimented. The Hindu community has been a little slow in promising, and although this may have been due to the unfamiliarity of the idea, we are inclined to think that it gives promise of rapid payment. If this forecast comes out true, the Mussalmans will have the proud distinction of being the most generous community—in promises. As many of the defaulter's subscriptions come under our general category of "Wanted Known," we think it will be sheer cruelty to animals to keep such donors' names needlessly secret. They will suffer little by an occasional airing, and our columns are as ready for the ventilation of generosity as for the ventilation of grievances.

WE ARE NOT inordinately in love with lawyers, and often sigh for the good old days when injustice could be done in the land without the help of the lawyer. But to deplore the cause which have brought the lawyer class into such prominence and made it multiply and spread over the face of the earth in India is one thing, and to interfere with the freedom of the subject's choice of a profession is another. We could point out, if there was no law about Contempt of Court, a dozen Honourable Judges of the High Courts and the Chief Courts whom we long to get at and to dissolve into thin air. But we confess our murderous propensities have been kept remarkably under control, and let the Honourable Judges thank the Lord for having given us so much reason and self-control. But we cannot be equally grateful to the Creator for the lack of reason and self-control in the Honourable Judges of the Punjab Chief Court who have ordered the "constructive murder" of lawyers in that Province. We have seen the law examinations in India getting stiffer and stiffer each year till the easiest course for the would-be lawyer had come to be the negotiation of a loan of 10 or 15 thousand rupees and the booking of a passage to London town, where the eating of a number of rather tasteless dinners was the hardest part of the process of qualifying for a Call to the Bar. But the Benchers of the Inns of Court, moved more by the spread of silly and sometimes seditious ideas among the law students than by a desire to raise the standard of their knowledge, resolved to admit none but Graduates as students if they happened to come from India, though a much easier examination continued to satisfy the requirements of the case for all others. Although a Call to the Bar is still necessary for the aspirant to some of the highest legal and judicial posts in India, as the Hon. Sir Ashutosh Mukerjee is reported to have stated to the Secretary of State, during his recent visit to the Law College here, as one of the reasons for an exodus of law students to England, there is no doubt that since the restriction of admission to the Inns of Court to Graduates only the chief reason of a journey to England has almost disappeared. Not satisfied even with this, the Honourable Judges of the Punjab High Court are anxious to stop, partially at least, even the remaining outlet for the escape of juristic aspirations. "I have the honour to inform you," writes the Registrar of the Punjab University to the Principal of the Law College, "that the Honourable the Judges of the Chief Court have decided that in future the admission of graduates to be pleaders of the second grade shall be regulated according to the numerical requirements of the Province. The members to be admitted each year will be announced three years ahead. For the year 1916 only thirty men, who pass the highest in Bachelor of Laws examination, will be admitted to pleadership." Another circular addressed as above says that the Judges of the Chief Court have decided that they will admit no person as Mukhtars after the 1st December, 1913. Although this drastic action is unworthy of a class of people who are generally credited with a judicious temper and training, we must say it is quite in consonance with the autocracy of the Bahadur North. What Calcutta and Bombay and Madras, which have such a plethora of lawyers, will not dream of doing, the Punjab and the United Provinces would immediately resolve upon and carry out. As must be generally known, the first Province to take such action was the newly created N.W. Frontier Province, where, if the absurd excuse of the apologists for the Judges is true, lawyers must be thick as blackberries, and for all we know steps may be in contemplation to prevent the birth of too many Advocates-General in Afghan families. What shocks us so much is the nonchalant way in which a journal of such distinction as the Times of India has dealt with the question. It writes:—

The Punjab Chief Court, faced with a constant increase in the ranks of local lawyers, has taken the bull by the horns and declared that for the future only a limited number of pleaders shall be admitted each year, according to requirements. Three years' notice will be given of the number to be admitted, and a beginning has been made by fixing the figure for 1914 at 42. There will no doubt be a great outcry against the new rules by the clam from which budding lawyers spring, but the circumstantial evidence against them is strong. The introduction of British methods of dispensing justice between man and man in substitution for the traditional methods of the country has led to an appalling amount of useless litigation, and nowhere has the Indian's propensity in this direction run to such lengths as in the Punjab. The latest official returns show that the number of civil suits instituted in the course of a year gradually rose till, in 1909, it reached 310,894, 1910 showing a slight decrease to 190,337. The reports upon the criminal courts show that the facilities their procedure offers for obstructing the course of justice are actually increasing the spread of serious crime among people whom the increasing prosperity of the province furnished with funds for litigation. In these circumstances a surplus of penurious, competing lawyers can only tend to a serious aggravation of the evil.

Our esteemed contemporary talks of "circumstantial evidence" as if it still believes that men lie but circumstances don't. Whatever the basis of its belief, it has certainly failed to find the real culprit. On its own showing, it is "the introduction of British methods of dispensing justice between man and man in substitution for the traditional methods of the country" that has led to "an appalling amount of useless litigation." The obvious remedy would, in that case, appear to be a reversion to "the traditional methods of the country" and not a reduction of lawyers. So long as the demand is there it is stupid in the extreme to expect an improvement in the conditions by restricting the supply. All that it would do would be to enhance the fees of lawyers, or, if this law is not—as we fear it cannot be—applied to Barristers as well, to increase the rush to England. But a simple reversion to the "traditions" of the country is impossible. Although life may still be a simple affair for the ryot, it has become highly complex for "the microscopic minority" of the educated on whom one Member of the Government of India, and that a lawyer and an Indian, so rightly relied. As Lord Morley has said so well, we have to adjust the chronometer in more than one longitude, and although this may be, as it obviously is, no easy matter, it shows a pitiful lack of resource to think of tampering with the freedom of a man's choice of profession as the only remedy. The Honourable the Judges of the Chief Court do not pay a pie of the lawyers' fees out of their judicial pockets, nor have they a direct concern with the advocate of a litigant's cause. Who are they, then, to reduce the supply of the lawyers? They may regulate the procedure of their own Courts, which is in all conscience far too cumbrous and involved and costs the litigant a pretty penny. But we are convinced that they have no right to tamper with the laws of demand and supply beyond requiring the person representing a party to a litigation to possess certain qualifications which facilitate the course of justice. The Times of India's sneer at "penurious competing lawyers" is hardly in good taste, for if there is a plethora of penurious competitors in any profession in the world it is in Journalism. Fleet Street is paved by penny-a-line hacks almost as liberally as Hell with good intentions.

THE Indian public is thoroughly familiar with the methods and the spirit of the campaign which has been going on against the Indian settlers in South Africa with unabated virulence and no new facts or forms of racial spite and repression can surprise us. The ingenuity of the Little Africander seems, however, to be inexhaustible in its vindictiveness, and the latest news shows how a son in his efforts to reach his father in South Africa has been refused admittance and deported from the country. He left India and went to Africa three times but was never allowed to cross the frontier. "On the last occasion he produced evidence that he was seeking to join his father, but the Immigration Department persisted in its refusal, on the ground that the documents in question were unsatisfactory." He then applied to the Supreme Court after securing a temporary interdict restraining the immigration officer from deporting him. But the Court has rejected the application on the ground that the immigration officer had full authority in the matter and consequently it could not interfere with his decision. Mr. Justice Dove Wilson, the Judge-President, remarked that "he regretted that the Court was powerless to interfere because he himself thought that ordinary justice would have permitted the boy to land." Mr. Justice Broome also "commented on the case in similar strain." The only grievance of the Indians is that they are not allowed even "ordinary justice" in an integral part of the British Empire. We do not know how long this grievous wrong will continue to humiliate His Majesty's Indian subjects. If self-governing colonies expect to treat Indians on terms of equality, it is time the British Government revised its own laws in respect of colonial subjects in this country. They are certainly abusing the hospitality of the land while their governments are treating them as below.

The Comrade.

The War in Tripoli.

WE HOPE the many "friends" of Turkey have not forgotten that they had repeatedly advised the Young Turks to "cut the loss" and accept a monetary compensation for Tripoli from its Italian raiders. The feelings of the Turks at the time were well expressed by the poet when he said in the bitterness of grief:

یہ کہاں کی دوستی ہے کہ ہمیں دوست نامع
کوئی چارہ ساز ہوتا کوئی غمگسار ہوتا

The Turks, however, did not lose heart on account of the paucity of their numbers in Tripoli, their total unpreparedness, and the advice of their "friends." What the result of their stubborn resistance against enormous odds in numbers and equipment has been our readers have been able to judge for themselves from the copious extracts from the telegrams of European Press Correspondents which we have been publishing every week without withholding even those which were obviously inspired by the most bitter hostility to Turkey and to Islam. The most connected account that has yet appeared in the English Press is that of "Kepi" in Blackwood's Magazine which we have reproduced in our last issue and in this. But the enterprise of Printing House Square deserves the utmost praise, inasmuch as the Times publishes from week to week a review of the military operations in Tripoli, as seen by its far sighted Military Correspondent—from Printing House Square! The field-glasses used by this military expert must evidently be the spectacled eyes of his colleague who stays at Rome. The French namesake of the Times, the Temps of Paris, has its own ideas of journalistic enterprise, however, and keeps a War Correspondent with the Turkish forces in Tripoli itself. By the courtesy of the Times in supplementing its own copious news "from Rome" with extracts from the newsletter of the War Correspondent of the Temps, we are enabled to know some facts which are entirely at variance with the "truth stranger than fiction" which comes filtering through Rome to Printing House Square.

The Paris journal publishes accounts of fighting on the 15th December in which the Italians reinforced by 2,000 fresh arrivals attacked the Turkish camp, and of a reconnaissance in force with artillery on the 17th, which find no mention in news from Rome. The reason is, of course, obvious. In the former the Italians lost 200 killed, including 2 officers, while the Turkish casualties were only 12 killed and 30 wounded, and in the latter, after 210 shells had been wasted by the Italians on the Turkish camp, the Turks developed an attack and forced the Italians back on Tripoli. But all this was too mild a chastisement to deserve any mention in the Times. The same cannot, however, be said of the fight at Dir Toubas on the 19th December, and the Rome correspondent of the Times generously concedes that "the operations were of some importance." The French journalist is brutally frank, and dismisses the somewhat important operations in the manner of the Persian who was asked to relate the story of Jacob and Joseph and said:

(Was a prophet, had a son, lost and then found him.) The Italians who were reconnoitring to the eastward of the Turkish left lost their way in the desert, and when they found it and met the Turks, the latter "cut off a detachment and captured 200 rifles as well as other equipment and several mules."

Let us now glance at the embroidery of the Times. "The Italian operations during the past ten days," says its Military Correspondent, "have not been very fortunate." But this excellent euphemism for "disastrous" is nothing compared to the teaching of the cause of disaster. "The weather has been bad." Indeed, the Clerk of the Weather has much to answer for. His vagaries were hitherto the much needed stimulus to not over brilliant conversationalists in search of interesting topics. But his latest achievement must rank next to Garibaldi's, for although he did not make Italy, he certainly comes very near saving it. Unlike the aeroplane scout, he has proved more than a fair-weather friend to Italy. He accounts not only for the absence of accurate intelligence about Turkish movements, but also perhaps for the loss of the way, which in its turn accounts for a journey of 6 miles being accomplished in 8 hours. Colonel Fara attempted to surround the Turks, but while attempting to describe this circle his force became the centre of attraction to the Turks, who turned the tables on their assailants and began to surround their right. What did the Italian commander do, then? Why, the usual thing. Our readers must have seen times out of number some greasy and ponderous Chauba of Muttra wrestling with a light-weight Punjabee, and the last resort of the former, samin pakarti. Well, Italian tactics are an improvement on the Chauba's strategy, for they do not content themselves with "catching" the surface of the "earth," but dig themselves in on the least provocation. An admirer of theirs whose flattery is reprinted elsewhere says that the Italian soldier "digs like a navvy, and the trenches he makes in a few hours will keep him snug and safe for weeks." So, the Rome correspondent tells us that "thereupon Colonel Fara promptly concentrated his forces upon the right and intrenched the position." But the Un-speakable Turk disturbs gallant soldiers even in their graves, and this subterranean force of Colonel Fara was worn in a disgraceful manner. "For the rest of the day and during the greater part of the night," writes the Times correspondent, "the enemy . . . delivered one attack after another in a most determined fashion, coming up sometimes within 50 yards of the trenches." But such evidently was the gallant response from the graves that "each time they were beaten back by the heavy rifle and artillery fire maintained by the Italians." According to the correspondent of the Temps, who writes from the field itself, "the pursuit stopped at Ain Zara." But the Times has gone far enough and could go no further. Its Rome correspondent writes that "finally at 4 o'clock next morning they (the Turks) retired, leaving Colonel Fara and his troops in possession of the field." Beati possidentes (Blessed are those in possession), as the Pioneer's correspondent would have said.

But what of the losses? The Rome correspondent is discreetly silent. He has evidently "cut the losses." The Military Correspondent is more of an expert, though we shall not go so far as Disraeli, who said that "expert witnesses were expert liars." Silence would have been damagingly eloquent, so he mentions that "in this fruitless enterprise"—another charming euphemism—"the Italians suffered 84 casualties." The correspondent of the Temps only multiplies this number by five and adds four score to make it a good round figure of 500. A slight difference, isn't it? But what an awful dilemma for Asia and Africa? One of the two correspondents must be a liar, and, as every schoolboy must know, no European tells a lie. We must say it is rather hard on the schoolboy to be taught all this and then to believe that 500 in Paris is equal to 84 in Rome. We wonder whether a very short cable to the Times from its correspondent at Tripoli can throw any light on this subject. It bears the significant note, "Delayed by the Censor!"

The expert of the Times writes learnedly, but rather despairingly, about "the difficulties and dangers of a desert campaign." But surely the Italians did not expect to find the hinterland of Tripoli and Cyrenaica blossoming like a garden. According to the expert of the Times, "all faults bring their own punishment, and none more surely than the neglect of principles laid down by the pastmasters of war." We wonder if this great truth could not be applied to things more heinous than "faults", and to the neglect of principles laid down, not by "the past masters of war", but by all the ethical teachers of the world. We are told that "all depends upon the manner and the principles upon which the Italian command proposes to conduct the campaign, and on this subject the evidence is not yet sufficiently complete for the formation of an opinion." Well, if three months' "masterly inactivity" is not evidence enough of the manner and the principles upon which the Italian command proposes to conduct the campaign, are we to wait for the second Adowa? The only difficulty in the way of a repetition of Adowa is that the Italians will not stir out of the trenches. We are informed that 30,000 men are now available for active operations in Cyrenaica and "a forward move on this side is to be anticipated." Have we not been asked to "anticipate" a "forward move" in many directions many a time during the last three months? A fortnight has passed since this last "intelligent anticipation" of events that never happen was hazarded, and we have not heard even of those movements of six weeks ago so beautifully expressed by the Times expert as "little advances followed by little retreats."

The only news that comes from Rome is that the principal Italian sources of revenue during the last six months of 1911 show an increase of 30,625,000 lire; that according to the Tribuna, Italian resources are "capable of withstanding every adverse occurrence marvellously", that the surpluses in the year 1911-12 will total 23,700,000 lire and in the year 1912-13, 14,500,000 lire; and that "the Minister of the Treasury lays stress on the statement that the Treasury is able to meet all war expenditure from existing sources without in any way diminishing the vote for social reform." Apart from the unpleasant anticipation of "adverse occurrences," if this is not meant to reassure the Turks that they can count upon the Italian payment of a war indemnity in full, it could have been intended only to satisfy the tax-payers that their burdens would not be heavier than what the withdrawal of a hundred thousand men from Italy and the Turkish boycott of Italian goods have already made them, and to delude the anti-war party in Italy with hopes of unrestricted expenditure on social reform "in which education and public works are chiefly concerned."

So far as actual fighting consists, we heard from Rome that a fortnight ago the Italians had 21 wounded at Homs, where they were digging some more trenches, though the assailants, whose losses are not mentioned, "were repulsed after three hours' fighting." The correspondent, whose letter from Tripoli the Times has published, praises their digging but complains that the Italian soldiers "move rather slowly in the attack," and he concludes that "perhaps the policy of the leaders is justified by the small casualty lists, though that," he adds, "is a point which opens a wide field for discussion." Exactly. The casualties at Homs after a three hours' hard fighting do open "a wide field for discussion." Even according to their own statements the Italians have done nothing in the Tripolitane, and we have to receive the news about the seven Turkish gunboats destroyed and an armed yacht captured off Kufuda by Italian cruisers and destroyers with a pinch of salt of rather large dimensions. We have no wish to deny that the command of the sea lies with the Italians, and that if a few gunboats and a yacht venture out and are encountered by the Italian warships the results would be disastrous to the minor craft. The wonder is that in spite of Italian superiority the crews of the gunboats landed safely. But what they were doing before they were caught in this manner is more than we can say. South of Jeddah, they, at any rate, could not have been conveying arms and troops to Cyrenaica. We know that Italians are now anxious to obtain what relief to their feelings they can by dropping bombs on hospitals from aeroplanes and by making a target for their guns of every shelter for the wounded. Mr Allan Ostler, the Express correspondent with the Turks at Ain Zara, whose letter we publish elsewhere, makes that clear enough. "They have flatly refused to allow any medical stores to reach the Turkish army." That was evidenced only a few weeks ago by their capture of the Hospital Ship, Kaiserlich which flew a Red Crescent flag. They, of course, contend that "the search showed an entire lack of hospital appliances" and that it was suspected that it was used as a transport. But, then, the same cruiser Puglia which seized the Kaiserlich was also reported to have seized £30,000 from the steamer Mensaleh bound for Hodeidah. The Egyptian Gazette, the organ of the Occupation, now writes that "this specie had been shipped by one of the banks established in Alexandria to diverse merchants in Hodeidah and was seized by the Calabria, not the Puglia, some miles off Jeddah. The total amount was insured against all war risks. Turkish post parcels containing different kinds of Turkish monies to the extent of about £1,000 were also seized." When Italian courage is wearing itself out in such shady adventures which are magnified and ennobled in official despatches we must be pardoned for discounting liberally the "graphic description" of the fight in the Red Sea on the 14th instant.

So far we have dealt only with news from European sources. But the news service of the Egyptian and Turkish journals is not unworthy of attention. The Constantinople correspondent of the West End is magnificently sarcastic. He writes:—

The war, which balked so big a few weeks ago, has receded into a dim distance. Somewhere in the west, on the other side of the horizon, over which hang roseate clouds, where the eye of faith describes wondrous Ottoman successes, a war is going on, but that "somewhere" is a long way away. The War Office tells us little; victories announced by our agencies or by our laconic correspondents are monotonous in their regularity and results; we have heard again and again that the Italians, after an unsuccessful attack on Djebel Umm el-Kazib (Mount Mother-of-the-Lion) or some other locality undiscoverable on the map, "retreated in great disorder, leaving many wounded and killed, and fled to their entrenchments," or that "the enemy's losses, though doubtless very high, cannot be estimated with exactitude;" and as the War Office never publishes the names or the number of our killed and wounded we cannot be expected to worry much about them. Even the tale of the heroic soldier—alas! the Agency Ottomane has forgotten to give the name or even the official number of this humble hero—who, though his clothes were burned off him by an Italian machine gun perched upon a fortress, yet crawled, apparently over a distance of at least 100 yards to a point of vantage and picked off the one gunner who started the deadly engine—even this has ceased to interest us.

All this pretty piece of writing may have been well believed by us were it not for the fact that the correspondent of the Times bears out most of what is reported by Turkish agencies. "Mount Mother-of-the-Lion" is no doubt an excellent phrase, but what of the European Falstaffs whose lies, in the course but expressive language of Shakespeare, "are like the father that begets them, gross as a mountain, open, palpable"? The Cairo correspondent of this journal itself has tired us with his repetition about the lack of interest in the War in Egypt. On the 3rd December he had written for the eighth time that "probably never has a war been carried on in the immediate neighbourhood of Egypt that has created less interest here." The letters of correspondents from Smyrna and Jerusalem, which showed how absorbing was the war interest elsewhere, had given rise to inferences directly contrary to the statements of the Cairo correspondent, while Egyptian papers were full of war news and articles on the war, and enormous sums were said to have been subscribed by the Egyptians. But all this could have been gaily brushed aside by our London contemporary had we not seen a wire in the Times from its own correspondent, presumably Mr. D. H. Loch, who has recently been appointed and reached Cairo a few weeks ago. He not only confirms the statements about war sufferers' relief, stating that three further missions organized by the Red Crescent Society in Egypt consisting of a number of doctors and nurses, whose photographs have already appeared in London illustrated papers, have left Cairo, but finally acknowledging that "as is natural, the Moslems of Egypt are deeply interested in the course of the war." That being the case, we are not disposed to believe Italian and Pro-Italian Falstaffs in preference to Turkish news agencies, specially when the latter's statements are corroborated by independent witnesses, such as the correspondent of the Times, who does not write about Djebel Umm-el-Kazib from the safe asylum of Constantinople or Rome, but exposes the fictions of Djebel Abu-l-Kazzab from the field of battle.

And what is the testimony of Arabic papers? The Alamdar wrote a month ago that the Turks had wisely advised the Arabs of Tripoli to return to the fields and take advantage of the agricultural season in order to secure provisions for the extended campaign, and that this explains not only their recent inactivity but also the evacuation of Ain Zara, in the course of which Nesbat Bay kept the enemy busy for eight hours, and which was, as the telegrams of last month from Tripoli published by the European Press showed, "a retreat in good order to a position affording facilities for movement in several directions and possibilities of revictualing and obtaining reinforcements", and not a defeat in which, according to messages from Rome, "the Turks fled leaving much ammunition, grain, and other stores." In fact, the Turks were sufficiently convinced by the Italians' lack of dash and enterprise that they had nothing to fear from them, and, as the Alamdar argues, they were wise in making their plans on the basis of a clear understanding that they had to lay a protracted siege to the Italians on three sides rather than follow defensive tactics against an advancing foe. But the Stamboul paper announced that we should not have long to wait for news of a general and many-sided advance, and that Ain Zara, Benghazi, and Derna were all about to be attacked. That pledge has now been amply redeemed. Apart from the reports published by the Times of the fighting on the 15th, 17th and 19th December, we learn from Al-Lwa of Cairo and At-Taraqqi and Alamdar of Constantinople, and from Turkish official reports of a successful advance near Benghazi, Barca, Derna, and Tobruk and of a repulse of the enemy in its endeavour to cut the Turkish wires at Zanzur. The fighting appears to have been severe. In the fight at Derna on the 14th December the number of killed on the Italian side is reported to approximate to a thousand, and in the capture of the fortifications on the range of hills known as Jebel Natoorah, it seems that more than half the Italian force was cut to pieces. On all accounts the attack on Benghazi on Christmas Day was a determined effort, and while messages from Rome declare that 500 Turks were killed, the Turkish accounts state that the Italians had to take shelter in their ships.

Much booty has fallen into the hands of the Arabs and Turks, so much so that many witnesses declare that it is more than the Turks can manage to keep while they are constantly on the move. But in two instances the spoils of the victor are of extreme interest. In the attack near Tobruk on the 22nd December, the Turks secured among other things projects of Italian operations, plans, and other important documents which must prove exceedingly useful to the Turks in planning their own movements and the dispositions of their troops. The other treasure-trove is an explosive in more senses than one. The cases of Dum-Dum bullets, the use of which is forbidden by international agreement, which the Turks captured both at Derna on the 14th December and at Benghazi on Christmas Day, explode the beautiful theory of Italian gentleness. The apologist who sends a letter from Tripoli to the Times, confident of its publication by that "friend" of the Turks and of justice, mentions the "firmness and balance" of the Italians—in addition to a characteristic cheerfulness—at the sight of the mutilated bodies of the comrades said to have been discovered near El Heni, which created feelings of rage and horror in other beholders. We hope all this is true, and we have no desire to disbelieve without reason. But if the pretty picture of Italian soldiers carrying the little children of those who came "to make submission and beg for protection from Turks and desert warriors," in order "to save the mother's fatigue," and of others who had to apologise for the kepi "pulled all on one side by the clutching arm of a little Arab girl" with the tender remark, "but I have a bambino at home," is meant to be accepted as sufficient refutation of the horrors of October last, we beg leave to say that we are inclined to suspect that the apologist may not only be fond of drawing unjustifiable inferences, but also a skilful liar. Mr. Allan Ostler of the Express, has confirmed the inhumanity of the Italians, and from his own experience a month later than the atrocities of October; and the account of the shelling of Hamn Sa'ab and the murder of little children dashed against the heads of their mothers does not go to show that these cowards and bullies had any thought at all of "a bambino at home."

Signor Felice, a Socialist deputy of Italy, a correspondent to the Secolo, and formerly an enthusiastic supporter of the attack upon Tripoli, has recently thrown a light on the behaviour of his countrymen which all the apologies published by the Times cannot hide. Unfortunately for his enthusiasm, he went out himself and viewed the trial of fourteen wounded Arabs executed for a supposed part in the alleged Arab atrocities of 2nd October. "I happened to be conviction," he writes, "that there was not a single clear and positive fact which could bear out the charge." Referring to 3rd October, he continues:—

I promise to write very soon the history of that hapless day, and I will then show that the responsibility for the bloodshed lies on a much higher quarter. I demand for the conquered population the observance of international law, and not the vengeance of conquerors. If Italy went to Tripoli in the name of civilisation, she must behave there like a handmaid of justice. Should it be otherwise, should the gallows continue to speak while justice keeps silent, I for one shall not hesitate to proclaim that Italy is insulting the cause for which we have all been fighting, and that the alleged enthusiasm of the Government for civilisation is an insulting and damnable lie.

The comment of a writer in the Nation on this statement is worth quoting. He writes that it is a confession from a man upon whom reality has been forced. He adds:—

We remember that when the question of humane cruelty practised upon the Arabs of Tripoli was raised in Parliament, a pained "Hush!" went up from the Treasury Bench. We are afraid such expressions would increase the pain in the "Hush!" we spoke of. They are words of a man who cannot tune the cant of cruelty any longer, and whose dulness under the tyranny of phrases has been illuminated by vision.

If any doubt existed about this "humane cruelty", the captured cases of Dum-Dum bullets, which the Turks have wisely shown to the English and French correspondents, remove it altogether. We now understand better than we did before how "the responsibility for the bloodshed lies on a much higher quarter." But the pained "Hush!" of the Powers proves that International Law is not only of no use for the purposes of peace, but that it is an exploded myth even in times of war. Not only is might superior to right, but the methods of using brute force are no longer human, but frankly and cynically brutal. It is a case of catch-as-catch-can, and women and children, the aged and the bed-ridden, all are grist that happen to come to the mill. Civilization has described a complete circle, and it is not only lascivious dances which the belles of American and European Society must learn from negroes and niggers for whom Judge Lynch is the only Daniel come to judgment, but when Science has given to mankind a mastery over the forces of Nature, its greatest discoveries must be utilized to wage a merciless war which even savages may perhaps shun. These are awful lessons which the war in Tripoli is teaching the pupils of Europe, the continents of Asia and Africa. Let us pray to the All-Merciful that we may not prove apt scholars of such inhuman doctrines.

Gaekwar Baiting.

THE unfortunate incident at the Durbar which brought His Highness the Gaekwar's name more prominently before the public than the innumerable admirers of his enlightenment and his reforming zeal could have liked has given to the equally numerous band of those who could not tolerate his manliness the one chance of their life. It was natural enough that the latter should chuckle over the Durbar incident and the explanation of the Maharaja, but we must admit we never suspected that people who belong to a manly race themselves should have so far forgotten themselves as to indulge in language which beats anything we have yet heard in unpudence in condemning, though in disguise, one of the sterling qualities of Englishmen. The Saturday Review, a Tory weekly of great distinction, writes:—

An incident of the Durbar to be regretted was the misconduct of the Gaekwar. This graceless Feudatory has learned his ideas of ceremony and a mistaken sense of his own importance in America. The record of Baroda is not a happy one. The ruling family are strangers to the people, and the present ruler owes his position to oil. He was a humble village youth, selected as heir by adoption when his predecessor was deposed for an attempt on the life of the Resident and for general misgovernment. His loyalty has been for some years under suspicion. (He has quarrelled with the leaders of sedition, including, it seems, the notorious Krishnaswami.) His apology was not sufficient. The offence requires much more serious notice. A reduction of his salute has been suggested, and a restriction on his foreign travel. Lord Curzon had to rebuke him severely for leaving his dominions in time of famine to indulge in a European tour. He should be tried by a jury of his peers.

It is true that American ideas of ceremony are different from those that prevail in Asia and even in Europe, but we do not know how "our American cousins" would appreciate the inference that their democratic manners lack grace. While regretting the injudicious advocacy of Mr. Keir Hardie, we cannot help remarking that we have yet to discover the mould of fashion and the glass of form outside the functionaries of European Courts, who have to practice their backward steps most sedulously—for a consideration—that could show grace into the dangerous art of walking backwards. Hamlet and Mr. Keir Hardie for once agree and characterise this retrogressive movement as an imitation of the crab. But all this is neither here nor there. There were many Princesses who were gauche to a degree at the Durbar, and the Cinematographic Companies which advertise the unfortunate incident of H.H. the Gaekwar display them which would admirably suit a blackmailer threatening some awkward or nervous Ruler of a State with a display "By Special Request." It is chiefly a question of loyalty, and the subject demands dispassionate as well as serious treatment.

But does the following extract from the Globe, under the heading of "A Beggar on Horseback," tend to create the suitable atmosphere?

Some years ago the Indian Government for sufficient reasons deposed the ruling Gaekwar of Baroda and set up in his stead a village child for whom a royal pedigree was discovered or provided. Unfortunately, though the Government could make a ruling chief, it could not make a gentleman, and this son of a small cultivator has seem fit to put a gross insult upon his Suzerain before all India. He came into the presence of the Kaiser-i-Hind improperly, not to say indecorously, attired, did his homage with studied insolence, and turned his back upon the throne.

Is not the first mad impulse after reading it to take a horsewhip and lay it savagely across the editorial back? We believe our profession has as many gentlemen in its ranks as any other, but we must confess we rise from a perusal of such scurrilous writing with a deepening sense of shame.

In the first place we are told that for "sufficient reasons" the Indian Government had deposed the Maharaja's predecessor. We shall not quarrel with the expression, for in these days of Imperial autocracy "sufficient reasons" and the actions of the Indian Government are always found in company. But it will not be amiss to remind the Globe that Serjeant Ballantyne, who defended Malhar Rao Gaekwar, died with the full conviction that the Prince was innocent of the crime of an attempt on his life of which the Resident had accused him, and that a "jury of his peers" which commends itself to the Saturday Review had found him "Not Guilty." But Malhar Rao was an undesirable Ruler, and his "general misgovernment" had taken a brutally immoral form at which the Resident was perhaps rightly concerned. Let us hope that the sins of Malhar Rao are things of the past; but we are not sure if the world and its rulers are now sufficiently concerned at them to look carefully into such offences. It appears as if it is only when they metamorphose themselves into attempts on the life of a Resident, or when a would-be blackmailer is balked of an illegitimate gain of a fleabite of 15 lakhs, that Mrs. Grundy—if not the Government—preaches from the unattainable heights of offended virtue and shocked innocence.

The next remark of the Globe may perhaps cause some fluttering in political dovecotes in India, for it assumes that the practice of "discovering" or "providing" royal pedigrees for village children when a change of rulers becomes expedient is not so rare as we should like to think in connection with a Department the integrity and truth of which should be, like Caesar's wife, "above suspicion." It is indeed "unfortunate," according to the Globe, that a Government which could manufacture evidence of high birth should lack the cunning to manufacture evidence of high breeding. If the atmosphere of Asia was unsuitable, surely frequent travel in Europe should have succeeded where the efforts of Government had failed. But this is just what the Saturday Review would like to restrict, and it would be strange indeed if Lord Hardinge, after reversing one scheme of Lord Curzon, should listen to the advice of this journal and follow in the footsteps of his masterful predecessor, whose policy had never commended itself even to the most submissive Chief.

But what is the crime of the Gaekwar that the whole of Fleet Street should be turning out to supply judge, jury and hangman as well as the public prosecutor? That he was nervous and lacked grace? That he put on the purest of white raiments, just as the Nizam had appeared in plain black, instead of decking himself like a bridegroom? In spite of what the Globe and the Saturday Review have written, nobody would think for a moment that these are offences for which the second Ruling Chief of India should be punished. It is only schoolboys who play tricks with the droning pedagogue or attend school in clothes bearing too evident traces of picking blackberries that are punished in this manner. As we have said before, the only question is one of loyalty, and if the journals that abuse the Gaekwar think him to be disloyal, we must say they take far too lenient a view of the matter. To restrict foreign travel may possibly be deterrent, if we believe that the Gaekwar is conspiring with Germany for the overthrow of Great Britain or with Ulster, Lord Londonderry and Sir Edward Carson for the overthrow of Constitutional Government in Ireland. But surely disloyalty is too heinous an offence to be punished with "a reduction of his salute." Mr. Keir Hardie may be poohpoohed as a rank Socialist when he ridicules time-honoured Court ceremonial. But the Truth devotes more space to Court gossip and the movements of Society stars than even to the exposure of shame, and the Truth has recently bombarded the passion for more guns with the batteries of ridicule. After the meannesses displayed in the attacks on the Gaekwar, we cannot credit his detractors with leniency in their penal proposals. The only other conclusion that can legitimately be drawn, then, is that His Majesty and the safety of the Empire are being used merely as stalking horses behind which stand personal prejudice, spleen and the abhorrence of manliness and independence so characteristic of bullies.

If H.H. the Gaekwar has been playing a deep game, the wonder is that he did not dissemble better. A Machiavel among Princes, he should have behaved like an Uriah Heep and should always have been "umble." If he is still suspected of treachery, then the procedure of inquiry through an ordinary Resident is as unsuitable as the penalty of fewer guns. After having expressed our own views so recently on the subject of the unfortunate incident of the Durbar we would not have reverted to the subject to-day, in spite of the provocative remarks of the two journals from which we have quoted, had we not learnt with great concern much that has followed that incident. Mr. Cobb, the Baroda Resident, whose knowledge of Baroda is meagre in the extreme, and whose past record does not show much evidence of a sympathetic handling of affairs, is evidently acting on the belief that Baroda is honeycombed with sedition. We cannot conceive that this was also the opinion of Mr. C. N. Seddon, I.C.S., who has suddenly been withdrawn from the post of Minister at Baroda by the Government of Bombay in the exercise of some powers not ordinarily exercised, if not in violation of rules laid down for the deputation of Government servants to Protected States.

Mr. Seddon had been for some years an Assistant Resident at Baroda, and his straightforwardness and breadth of outlook, combined with the fame of a most sympathetic administration at Jamnagar, must have commended him to the Maharaja who obtained a loan of his services and appointed him, first as a Settlement Commissioner, then as Revenue Minister, and, finally, since the sad death of Mr. R. C. Dutt, as the Dewan of the State. But although sympathetic and tolerant, Mr. Seddon was by no means a weak man, and when he felt it his duty to differ from his colleagues or his master, he did so in no uncertain terms. It seems that Mr. Seddon could not say ditto to all the whims and fancies of Mr. Cobb, and he has had to go. But his tenure of such responsible posts in Baroda during the last eight years is a clear proof that Baroda has not been the hotbed of treason which recent action even more than the impudent accusations against its Ruler makes it out to be.

Mr. Seddon, however, has not been the only Government official employed in Baroda. Dewan Tek Chand, a Punjab Civilian, has been a Settlement Commissioner, and then a Revenue Commissioner, during more than the past three years, and Mr. B. L. Gupta, I.C.S., who had risen to be the Legal Remembrancer in Bengal, has been holding the same post at Baroda after his retirement from British service. These have been the principal officials of Baroda and the chief members of its Executive Council during the past few years when, according to the Saturday Review, the Maharaja's loyalty was under suspicion, and he was coquetting with the leaders of sedition. It must be remembered that the Gaekwar was away from Baroda for a considerable portion of the time during the last few years, and that it was the Executive Council with more than one member of the I.C.S. that carried on the work of day-to-day administration. We must, then, either condemn all these men as blind, incompetent and weak or believe that Mr. Cobb alone is jaundiced; and without more data upon which to form our judgment we must abide by the well-known law of scientific reasoning which is on the side of an economy of causes. Till the Government publishes such data we shall not accuse three Civilians of great local and other experience as incompetent in order to prove that a single Political is in the right. Designing people are apt to play on the suspicions of British officials, as has recently been witnessed in the case of those peaceful citizens of Baroda who were arrested one night by the British Police with the ready assistance of Baroda functionaries and prosecuted for having manufactured bombs and thrown them at Lord Minto at Ahmedabad. The judicial inquiry at Ahmedabad, unassisted, of course, by Mr. Cobb, resulted in a dismal fiasco, for it was the informers who had manufactured the case as well as the bombs, with a view to obtain the large reward which had been announced. We have personal knowledge of a certain incident in which a man of such strong commonsense and natural dignity as Lord Minto had been led to request the Maharaja not to entertain the services of an Indian Christian, who had been staying with his wife and family in America, as a Professor at Baroda, simply because some busybody had made a mistake of identity. This officer had duly been engaged by the Maharaja, and yet a Viceroy of India personally intervened and arranged that the contract should be broken without any compensation to the sufferer. But luckily, Mr. Bonquet, I.C.S., was then Resident, and it was possible to reconsider the matter. The Professor after some time cleared himself without any difficulty and was finally appointed in the State. Are we sure that matters are gone into equally carefully and dispassionately to-day?

It appears that one officer, a Cambridge graduate and something of an educational faddist, who had served for some 15 years in Baroda and had risen to the acting charge of a district, but who could complain with some justice of tardy promotion, has been made to retire because he had founded a sort of Gurukul at Baroda to the funds of which he contributed with praiseworthy self-sacrifice. Another officer who had spent many years in England and Germany, who was an ideal District Officer and a great favourite with Europeans as well as Gujatis and Maharattas, who had served the State loyally for a score of years and more, has been degraded, deprived of the charge of a district, and made to proceed on long leave. His crime appears to be precisely that of the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins and the Calcutta High Court, namely, a somewhat exacting obedience to the laws of the land. From what we have heard we gather that a number of people are being handed over to the British C.I.D., and that others are being deported; and as one upright and independent District Magistrate has had to pay heavily for doing his duty, we may presume that more accommodating officers, who can put the telescope to the blind eye in such cases, are in great demand.

We have some experience of Protected States and we must say that, generally speaking, so far as security of person and property is concerned, few would care to change their residence from a British District to a Protected State. The Reign of Law in England is a much lesser contrast to the supremacy of Lois Administratif on the Continent than the judicial procedure of British India, with all its faults, to the insecurity and generally inglorious uncertainty of "political" administration in such States. But Baroda was an honourable exception, because the Maharaja, who is by no means a despoiser of personal rule in other departments of the State, had practised extremely rigorous self-denial in detaching himself from the administration of Justice. In fact, no constitutional monarch in Europe could have been more detached in this matter than H.H. the Gaekwar. But it is not the same Baroda to-day that its officials and inhabitants were proud of, and all because Mr. Cobb's nerves are none of the best, and because the Maharaja put on white clothes at the Durbar, and when doing homage to His Majesty, was a little confused.

There are some who go so far as to suspect that the postponement of Princess Indiraraja's marriage has some political reason. But we are not disposed to credit such rumours. They fail to take into sufficient consideration the manly character of H.H. the Maharaja Scindhia, besides his strong commonsense, which must convince him that any vacillation in a matter of this kind would be resented by all right thinking men, and by none more strongly than by his brother Rulers and by those who are on principle opposed to a bigamous union.

Have the Government of India no duty to perform at this moment? Do they feel no inconsistency between all that is going on at Baroda now and the famous Udaipur speech of Lord Minto which laid down the only correct policy in dealing with Protected States? If Baroda is honestly suspected of sedition, it is not men like Mr. Cobb that are required for the work. An officer of the attainments and position of Sir J. R. Dunkop Smith should have been placed on special duty, though it is a judicial officer of the temper and training of Sir Lawrence Jenkins that is really needed at Baroda.

Rumour has it that the cause of all this mischief was not only the apparent discourtesy to His Majesty which the Gaekwar has had to explain, but that his views about the relationship in which he stands to the Governor-General have also not proved to the liking of Lord Hardinge. If that is so, it is not only a proper regard for personal popularity and for justice to H.H. the Gaekwar and to his State that should move His Excellency to intervene at this juncture, but also a due sense of justice to himself. It is not enough that men in high places should be just and judicious. The people whose destinies are placed in their hands should also believe them to be so, and we are confident that Lord Hardinge will not allow any lurking suspicion to remain in the minds of the people that his action or inaction is in any way tinged with personal pique. We say this as much out of regard for His Excellency as for His Highness the Gaekwar of Baroda, and have too great a confidence in the Viceroy's appreciation of honest candour to fear that our remarks would not be well received.

Anecdote.

DESCRIBING his platform experiences, Dr. Macnamara says the heaviest "fall" he ever had was at an agricultural labourers' meeting in Devonshire. While he was speaking a man insisted on asking a question. Dr. Macnamara told him to sit down and ask the question at the close of the meeting. The man persisted, and so did Dr. Macnamara, until another man called out to the interrupter—

"Sit down, you ass!"

Still another man arose and, in very emphatic terms, repeated the advice.

"I very unwisely intervened," said Dr. Macnamara, "and said—"

"There seem to be a great many asses here: let us beat one at a time."

"Then, the ass who first interrupted, pointing his finger at me, said—"

"You begin, then."

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

REUTER wires on the 11th from Teheran:—Mr. Shuster has left for Europe. He issued a statement opining that M. Mornard's Commission was unfit for Treasury administration. The commission has resigned and it is understood that M. Mornard will take over the post.

M. Mornard took summary possession of the Treasury offices on the 13th and has conveyed to American accountants a message from the Cabinet, that if they further delay transfer of offices they will not only be discharged but will be punished.

The Times of the 13th insists that M. Mornard does not fulfil the conditions necessary for his permanent appointment as Treasurer-General. The paper hopes that Russia and Great Britain will seek a more suitable nominee.

Proceeding to discuss the situation in South Persia, the Times deprecates British advance thither as giving a dangerous handle to the more adventurous elements in Russia except with a view to possible occupation of one or two points on the Gulf. Moreover, the state of the Indian finances would render a costly expedition singularly inopportune and impolitic, but the paramount consideration is that by holding our hand we should give Muhammadans a most striking proof of our determination not to take advantage of the complications in a Muhammadan country for purposes of self-aggrandisement.

Russian detachments have been distributed along the Khoi and Urumiah caravan road in order to protect travellers against attacks from Kurdish marauders.

The Kurds on the 14th attacked a Russian battalion which was marching on Khoi and Urumiah. Twenty Kurds were killed but the Russians sustained no loss.

It is reported that the Chief Mullah at Ispahan is inciting the people to a holy war. The Consul-General for Persia in Calcutta writes:—With reference the Reuter's telegram in the press to the effect that the "Chief Mullah at Ispahan is inciting people to a Holy War," the official telegrams received by the Persian Consul-General tend to show that the matter is insignificant and the situation there is easy. The Government has established peace and order and will maintain it. It is satisfactory to note that 64 men said to be concerned in the attack made on Mr Consul Smart have been arrested and will soon be tried by the Court of Justice and the perpetrators of the attack will be punished."

At a gathering convened by the Persia Committee in London at the Opera House on the 15th a letter was read from Lord Lamington in which His Lordship expresses his regret that he was unable to attend. The letter declared that whilst Germany is complacently looking on at the complications accumulating for us and whilst the Mussalman world is gazing with dismay at our subservience, our vision is obscured by the uplifting of the Anglo-Russian Convention whenever Persian independence receives a stab. To save Persia as a buffer state is worth however rash an effort, rather than to drift to many worse perils, which await us should Russia become supreme in Teheran. Sympathetic letters were also received from other prominent persons including Lord Roberts and from the Muhammadans of Madras and the All-India Moslem League of Lucknow. The spacious auditorium was crammed and a number of well-known Members of Parliament were present. A resolution expressing deep concern at the Persian situation was carried unanimously.

British, Russian and French Banks have completed financial arrangements for the preliminary studies of the Trans-Persian Railway Scheme by the Société Des Etudes and are now proceeding to draft the scheme to be followed by the Société.

Indian merchants interested in the trade of Southern Persia, writes the Sind Gazette, experience considerable difficulty in finance. Stoppage of traffic consequent upon the closing of caravan routes inland has produced congestion at the Persian Gulf ports for which no immediate relief is visible till the Indian Government establish adequate military protection both in the seaports and on the main lines of the trade to Kerman, Yazd, Ispahan and other commercial centres. Fortunately, the Shikarpuris, who are the merchants chiefly concerned, are wealthy traders of the highest repute and they will doubtless find ready assistance from Shroffs' banks, European firms and others by whose aid trade with Persia is financed. At the same time, sooner the Government of India take action the better.

The Pioneer hears that the Amir's orders regarding the defence of his north-western border districts were very distinct. Supplies are to be collected at the town of Nishapur and other important towns. All the outposts are to be strengthened and breechloaders are to be issued to the tribal levies on the Persian frontier. A security of Rs. 50 is being taken for each rifle. These are merely precautionary measures, the idea apparently being that Russians may put pressure upon Massad and Khorasan generally, as they have done upon Tabriz and Azerbaijan thus causing alarm in the Herat borderland. The Pioneer says that H. M. The Amir need have no apprehensions of trouble from Russia. The Czar's Government is concerned only with straightening out the tangle of Persian politics, and though its method may be summary, it can have no desire to raise additional complications in Central Asia.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 17th:—As the Regent has not attended the Palace for some days past, rumours are current that he has determined to resign. It is even stated that Government offered the Regency to the ex-President of the Mejliss, but that he declined.

News by the English Mail.

Teheran, December 24.

READERS of my telegrams have already been made aware that the Mejliss was likely to disappear. To-day, by a coup d'Etat, which has been so far peaceful, the outward forms of constitutional government were ended. A meeting of merchants was summoned at the Palace by Vosuk-ed-Dowleh on behalf of the Regent. The latter was present and declared that the Mejliss impeded the action of the Administration internally and externally, and must, therefore, be closed. The Regent later issued a rescript declaring the session ended. The rescript contains no mention of elections in the near future. The Mejliss gates were locked, and a guard was mounted.

The announcement was quietly received, and perfect order prevails. Yezrin and the Bakhtiari are said to support the action of the Regent, but the events of the next few days must be uncertain, as provincial disintegration is probable. The arrangement appears to be that the Regent and the present Cabinet will conduct the Administration, supported by the presence of the Russian troops at Karvin who are within telephone call of the capital.

The Cabinet has sent a reply to the ultimatum, and the Russian Legation has answered accepting the reply as satisfactory. All three demands are accepted, except that the wording of the second demand has been given a form less wounding to Persia, which undertakes before giving appointments to foreigners to have an exchange of views with the British and Russian Legations. Nothing is said concerning the withdrawal of the troops. The reply to the ultimatum says that Mr Shuster has been dismissed, but no notification has reached Mr. Shuster. The situation is complicated by the attitude of the Imperial Bank, which, I understand, holds itself bound, until the law of June 13 is repealed, or till it receives notice that a new Treasurer-General has been appointed, not to release funds without Mr. Shuster's authorization.

Telegraphic communication with Resht and Tabriz is cut, and communication with London is possible only by way of Suez. The last telegram showed that 15 Persians had been killed and one Russian officer wounded at Enzeli. At Resht there had been heavy Persian losses. The town is now quiet. Consular reports indicate that the attack was begun by the Russian Consul, who is now Governor.

The last foreign Consular telegram from Tabriz early to-day showed that desperate fighting occurred yesterday. There had been heavy Russian losses, the Consulate was under fire, the Russians were everywhere hard pressed, and reinforcements had been ordered from Erivan. The Cabinet has telegraphed to Tabriz declaring that the question has been settled, and ordering the Persians to cease fighting. The Russian Minister has sent similar instructions, but the Russian General replied that he obeys only the Viceroy of the Caucasus.

LATER.

Telegrams, which I have seen, have been received from the Acting Governor of Tabriz. They declare that it is impossible to enter into pourparlers with the Russians, who are now sweeping the streets with artillery and refuse to accept a truce.

The telegrams give details of atrocities so appalling that, in the absence of confirmation, it would be inadvisable to repeat them, except to say that the Russians are accused of massacring over 500 men, women, and children in cold blood.

The Government has been informed of Mr. Shuster's acceptance of the ultimatum, which involves his dismissal.

Changing the Guards.
Exit Afghan! Enter Cossack!!

Marital law has been proclaimed. All newspapers have been suppressed except one, entitled by a curious irony the Mejhis, which supports the Cabinet.

A meeting in the bazaar to-day was addressed by Deputies who refused to recognize the legality of the Government. It was dispersed by the police, but took refuge in a mosque, where the indictment of the Cabinet was continued.

St. Petersburg, December 24.

After a consultation between M. Sazonoff, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and M. Kokovtsoff, the Premier, the Viceroy of the Caucasus has been ordered to send the largest possible reinforcements to Tabriz. The Novoe Vremya publishes this statement from the Director of the Persian Department of the Foreign Office, who added that Russia would take justice at Tabriz, Resht, and Enzeli into her own hands and would show no mercy to the Fedais and the revolutionary dregs shedding Russian blood. The lesson which must be given would be long remembered.

In three leading articles the Novoe Vremya insists upon the extermination of the Persian bands, and declares that the hesitating voice of diplomacy must give way to the imposing voice of the cannon. "In this case," proceeds the journal, "true humanity requires cruelty. Wherever Russians are attacked Russia must take over the administration. The whole population of Tabriz must be held responsible and punished. It must pay an indemnity to the families of the Russian soldiers who are killed."

An interview with a member of the Russian Foreign Office published in the Retsh to-day foreshadows the retention of the Russian detachment at Resht.

A telegram from Julfa states that a further detachment of Russian troops, consisting of the 5th Regiment of Rifles, a mountain battery, and a sotnia of Cossacks, hastily left for Tabriz last night.—(Reuter.)

St. Petersburg, December 26.

The Director of the Persian Department at the Foreign Office in conversation to-day repeated that the Russian Government was convinced that the Persian Government was not concerned in the anti-Russian outbreaks at Tabriz and elsewhere, and that those who were really responsible were Caucasians, principally Armenians and criminals posing as political agitators. He states that from 3,000 to 4,000 Russian troops were being sent to Tabriz.

A telegram received at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs says :—

The Consul-General at Tabriz protests against the infamous calumny upon our troops, who are treating the peaceable inhabitants with humanity, notwithstanding the atrocities committed by the Fedais on our wounded and the mutilation of the killed. Any particular cases in which innocent people have perished must have occurred solely during the bombardment of the houses in the neighbourhood of our encampment, from which our detachment was subjected to a fusillade which inflicted losses on it. The commander of the detachment brought away women, children, and men from these houses and afforded them shelter in the suburb of Bagh-i-Shimal, where our encampment is situated, and from there they were taken to the town, aided by the peaceable inhabitants and escorted by our soldiers. On this occasion one of our officers, Prince Wakhwakhoff, who was in charge of this duty, was treacherously killed.

Another telegram states that by order of the Russian Consul-General at Tabriz the bodies of two Grenadiers of the Mingrelia Regiment and a Cossack, who were killed while defending the Russian hospital and the Dragoman's house, have been removed to Bagh-i-Shimal for burial. Acting upon the directions of the Consul-General 20 armed Persian Cossacks are patrolling the Christian quarters.

The Consul-General has received the Governor and the Chief Mullah, to whom he declared that the disarmament of the people would be an indispensable preliminary to any negotiations, as the presence of armed spectators could not be tolerated in the streets and on the roofs. Placards have now been posted throughout the town demanding the immediate surrender of arms to the Governor.—(Reuter.)

St. Petersburg, December 27.

The following semi-official communiqué was issued this evening :—

"After considering the situation which has arisen in consequence of the acts of foolhardy aggression committed by mobs against the Russian forces and institutions at Tabriz, Resht and Enzeli; and being of opinion that these hostile acts, which have, moreover, sometimes been followed by brutal tortures and by base outrages upon the killed, deserve the most severe punishment; and seeing that the Persian Government, while foreign to these acts, does not possess the necessary power to chastise the guilty, the Russian Government believes that it is incumbent upon it to take repressive measures in the abovementioned towns in such fashion as it may deem best."

"With this object it has directed the Russian commanders to adopt immediately, in agreement with the Russian Consuls at Tabriz and Enzeli, the most stringent measures to punish those guilty of complicity in acts of aggression and to remove once for all the causes of such acts. These measures include especially :—

(1) The arrest of all Russian and Persian subjects who have participated in the attacks upon the Russian troops and their trial by court-martial.

(2) The disarmament of the Fedais and other troublesome native elements.

(3) The destruction of places where resistance might be offered.

"Other measures may also be taken if necessary to secure the re-establishment of order and the chastisement of offenders."

A telegram received here from Tabriz states that a crowd broke into the Palace of the Governor-General and insulted his deputy Prince Amanulla Mirza. They also tore down the flags from the Anjuman building, cursing the Democrats and the Constitution. Prince Amanulla has taken refuge in the British Consulate.

LATER.

A telegram from Tabriz states that the well-known revolutionary leader Ameer Khichmet, the head of the Fedai movement in Tabriz, fled last night in the direction of Karadagh, a district of Azerbaijan.

A great crowd, after destroying the Anjuman building at Tabriz, proceeded to Basmindsh to request Shuja-ed-Dowleh to take over the administration of Azerbaijan. It is reported that Shuja-ed-Dowleh agreed to do so.

The latest reports from Tabriz announce that the telephone line to Julfa has been cut, the standards having been carried away for a stretch of three versts from Tabriz. About 200 Caucasians and Fedais, including a number of their leaders, fled during the night to Karadagh and in other directions. It is stated that they intend to cross the Russian frontier.

A Russian guard has been set at the Russian Bank. The Citadel, after being abandoned by the Fedais, was at first occupied by ten Persian Cossacks, but now a company of a Russian Rifle regiment is quartered there, and the Russian flag has been hoisted. The 5th Chasseurs, with an artillery detachment, have forced their way through to Bagh-i-Shimal, a suburb of Tabriz, to join the Russian force encamped there. They had to fight a number of skirmishes on the road. At sunset artillery and machine-gun fire could be heard in the distance.

A telegram from Baku states that 90 inhabitants of the Caucasus who were trying to reach the Persian frontier to take part in the present disturbances have been arrested and sent back to their homes.

Moslem Feeling.

The following is a copy of the telegram sent by the Madras Presidency Muslim League to the Persian Committee in London :—The Muhammadans of the Madras Presidency warmly sympathise with the meeting to protest against Russian aggression in Persia and English acquiescence in direct violation of declared policy, and hope that the English Government will lose no time in restoring confidence in the good faith of its intentions.

A general meeting of the Mussalmans of Meerut was convened at the Jama Mosque on the 15th instant. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted :—That this meeting of the Mussalmans of Meerut places on record its extreme abhorrence of Russian aggression in Persia and strongly condemns it, and most respectfully and earnestly appeals to the Imperial Government to use its best endeavours to secure the integrity and independence of Persia. That this meeting of the Mussalmans of Meerut places on record its high sense of gratitude to Lords Curzon, Lamington and Professor Browne of Cambridge for their well-directed efforts to secure just treatment to Persia. That this meeting of the Mussalmans of Meerut resolves to tender its cordial thanks to the Grand Vizier of Turkey and N. Amin Bey, Turkish Ambassador to the Court of Teheran, for exerting their great influence on behalf of Persia so as to safeguard her integrity and independence.

At a meeting of the Muhammadan community of Rangoon on the 13th in Victoria Hall the action of the Russian authorities in Persia was discussed. The following resolution was passed :—That the Mussalmans in Burma protest against the action of Russia in destroying the independence and integrity of Persia and in deliberately thwarting the legitimate efforts and aspirations of her people towards the regeneration and establishment of a civilised and constitutional government by her acts of spoliation and unrighteousness. A resolution requesting the British Government to use its influence towards maintaining the independence and integrity of Persians and to resist further encroachments of Russia on Persia and to sympathise with her in her present trouble was also passed.

Integrity and Independence.

A SOCRATIC DIALOGUE.

Now that we are on the topic of Empire-building, we are indeed lucky to have in our company Thrasymentus, just returned from Asia. You are, we know, a good deal of an expert in this business of Imperial expansion, Thrasymentus; or ought I rather to call it an art?

Yes, indeed, O Socrates, and a fine art too, and quite the largest of the fine arts in its scope and aims.

Excellent! For I see, Thrasymentus, that you are not only an expert but an enthusiast. You are evidently the very man Eubulus here and I are looking for. For in our talk of Empire-making, we have been fumbling with mere phrases and ideas, having at hand no practical experience to guide us. We both supplicate you to lighten our darkness.

I will do my best, Socrates, though, as you are aware, lecturing is not much in my line. "Deeds, not words," is my motto.

Certainly, it is deeds we too are after. But I suppose I should be right in seeking for a purpose in your deeds.

Assuredly; and a really elevated purpose, for it is nothing less than the civilisation of the world that we are after. For this is the destiny and mission of an Imperial race.

It is indeed a grand goal you set before us, Thrasymentus, and for one who sets so little store on words, you phrase it admirably. Such a task as you describe, I suppose, is not for everybody to undertake. I presume that some rare quality distinguishes those to whom Nature assigns this destiny, or Providence this mission?

Yes, indeed, the quality is rare enough, it is the power of organising things which we call efficiency. A man, or a nation, having this talent must not hide or waste it. If he is a business man, he must extend his organising power into a Trust. A people must use this quality of soul to make an empire. And, indeed, this is no chance analogy between business and politics. For the enlightened moralist will recognise that empire is nothing else than a political Trust, undertaken by the efficient nation in the wider interest of civilisation.

Pray, halt a moment here, Thrasymentus, for Eubulus and I are a little out of breath with your expansive mode of argument.

Yes, indeed, Socrates, added Eubulus, whose face had been visibly swelling with pent-up expostulation, if Thrasymentus will let us, I would like to go back a few steps in this Imperial progress.

Well, where is it that you get stuck?

It is just here. You say, Thrasymentus, that it is the destiny and mission of the efficient people to take in hand and organise the inefficient people, and that in this way the civilisation of the world is advanced.

Yes, that is what I maintain.

But how is one to know which is the efficient nation?

If that is your difficulty, it is soon solved. For it belongs to the very nature of efficiency to recognise itself. The efficient nation simply asserts itself, and by the very act of doing so, attests its efficiency.

But surely, Thrasymentus, that isn't the way in which other services of trust are regulated.

What do you mean?

Why, a servant or a clerk is not usually taken on a character he writes himself. And a money-lender wants some other security than the self-recommendation of the borrower before he makes a loan. Do you really consider the profession which a nation makes of its superior efficiency as a sufficient warrant for taking in hand the organisation of another nation?

Pardon me, Eubulus. To the practical statesman the points you raise seem nothing else than academic quibbles. The nation that is conscious of its efficiency simply sees a piece of work ahead and does it. The proof of the efficiency is the effect.

If I may interpose, said Socrates, I would suggest that in the investigation of so elusive an art we should postpone our judgment alike of motives and effects until the process or practice of the art itself is clearly seen. I would, therefore, seek to learn from Thrasymentus precisely how the efficient nation deals with the backward State which it seeks to civilise. It does not, I presume, go at it by sheer brute force, like a bull with its head down for the charge.

No, indeed, it does not, Socrates. The approved methods are those of peaceful penetration, the approach, not of an enemy, but of a benefactor.

That is excellent! But it appears to involve an initial difficulty. For if, as you show, it belongs to the efficient nation to recognise its efficiency, it would seem to belong to the backward or inefficient nation not to recognise its efficiency. Will not that be so? And will not the inefficient one be somewhat reluctant to receive the approaches of its benefactor?

Why, yes, Socrates; history shows the inefficient to be extremely obstinate in this regard, especially if they suspect the bona fides of the approach. The veriest tyro in the art of Imperialism knows this.

I suppose, then, your first work must be directed chiefly to disarm these unworthy suspicions?

Quite right. So the first steps are in no sense political. Indeed the Imperial power is careful to keep quite out of sight. It simply allows or encourages some of its citizens to enter the country it has marked down for ultimate absorption, as traders for their private profit, as explorers, or as missionaries. And when the country is a little better known, and sufficient confidence of its rulers has been won or bought, other citizens obtain permission to work mines or plantations or to lend money to the rulers of the inefficient State.

But are not these commercial and other dealings very dangerous for those who undertake them?

Why, yes, indeed; but these private dangers are the very seeds of Imperialism.

How do you make that out?

Well, you see, it works like this. In a simple, backward people, each of these intrusions makes for general disorder. The traders, who bring guns and strong drink, foment intestine feuds; new trade routes act as a demand for brigands; the miners and other foreign settlers get at loggerheads with the inhabitants; and, best of all, generous loans stimulate extravagance and make for bankruptcy.

Best of all, indeed! But how can the noble fruits of civilisation grow from such baleful seeds as these?

Ah, it is just here that we enter the arcana of our art. The disorder thus produced becomes intolerable. The property, nay, the very lives, of our valuable subjects are imperilled. These cry out to their government to save them. And so the government, which has been waiting, has then to intervene.

You mean it annexes the country?

Why, no such thing! Nothing could be further from its action or professions—at this stage. It merely intimates that compensation must be made to its injured subjects, and that better order must be kept than an inefficient government is capable of keeping. And next, as the disorder continues, it offers its disinterested advice and assistance to enable the rulers to perform their duties in a more satisfactory manner.

But does not this move arouse the very suspicions which you said just now it was so desirable to allay?

Why, yes, it does. And this is where the moral capital of an efficient Imperial race comes in so useful.

What exactly do you mean, Thrasymentus?

I mean the faith or confidence which the rulers of the backward state will naturally repose in the plighted word or declaration of a great civilised state. For the stage we have now reached is one that requires this pledge.

What pledge do you mean?

I mean a bold, uncompromising undertaking to maintain for ever the integrity and independence of the backward state. For only by this means could on open rupture of relations be avoided, and the game of peaceful penetration be continued.

I quite realise the value of such a pledge. For this I apprehend is the precise point where the political process of absorption really begins.

Yes; and that is why the pledge should be given with full formality. And if there should happen to be two Imperial Powers alike devoted to this civilising mission who will jointly pledge themselves to this sacred duty, so much the better, for the moral security is doubled.

But may they not find it inconvenient at a later stage to keep this pledge?

That indeed, O Socrates, may well happen. But in that case they will redeem it by another pledge of greater value.

But what can be of greater value than independence? Breaks in Eubulus.

Nothing, perhaps, for you with your narrow nationalism. But others would hold that a larger, truer liberty is found in forming part of a great civilised Empire.

But, said Socrates, our present business is, I take it, not to judge, but to trace the actual process of Imperial expansion. Now the stage we have reached at present is an early one. But I suppose you architects of Empire have a name for each stage.

Yes, indeed. It is all excellently graded in the language of diplomacy. The country that is being watched by a civilising power, which as yet has only inserted trade "feelers," is called "a sphere of interest." But when the disorder has gone far enough to call for pacific intervention, it passes into "a sphere of influence."

But stop a minute, Thrasymentus! put in Eubulus. Haven't you forgotten one item in your list of "spheres"?

I don't think so. But what is it, Eubulus?

Why that valuable expression "a legitimate sphere of action," quite the most illuminative of the phrases which describe so accurately the present attitude of civilising powers towards China.

And a very good phrase too, say I and a very proper attitude for the trustees of world-civilisation. What say you, Socrates?

I am still waiting, all agog, Thrasymenes, to learn the final processes in your art.

Why, to tell the truth, Socrates, after once the "sphere of influence" has been safely entered, everything runs quite smoothly, and the further processes of absorption are so nearly automatic that the most inept of Foreign Ministers can hardly fail.

But I suppose there is an orthodox method of completion?

Why, yes, and sometimes it takes a considerable time especially when, as sometimes happens, two rival benefactors begin the civilising process upon the same body.

Why what will happen then?

Well, instead of proceeding in a single step from sphere of influence to plain protectorate, the power that has gone furthest in the swelling process will declare a "veiled protectorate."

And what exactly does that come to?

It has been described as a situation where the civilising power is "in a position to give authoritative advice" to the rulers of a country still in nominal possession of its independence.

And how is this authority exercised?

Why, the method is simplicity itself. Behind the native ruler you set a rule of your own, while each native official is duplicated by an official of the civilising power. And for the rest, though you allow the native ruler to appoint his servants, you reserve a veto upon those who are appointed.

But isn't this a direct breach of the pledge of independence?

I admit it looks a little like it. But, after all, you must remember these Oriental people don't regard promises and declarations with that meticulous scrupulosity that obtains among us. Besides, the civilising power generally guards itself by some provision relating to "the force of circumstances."

This "force of circumstances," I take it, said Eubulus, is a sort of sudden twist in the stream of Destiny which carries the Imperialist nation to port.

Yes, and a very serviceable twist sometimes. But, Socrates, my tale is nearly told. For when the veil is removed from the protectorate, the absorption is practically complete. The step to an administrative province is a short and easy one. For disorders will continue to arise from time to time in the best-regulated protectorate, and these will compel the protector to tighten the grasp of his protecting arm and gather his protégé into a closer political embrace.

With what unction you describe the process of deglutination and absorption, Thrasymenes, and quite convincingly, as if Imperialism were merely a matter of specious phraseology.

Whatever can you mean, Socrates? I have described the practice as exactly as I could, concealing nothing.

Yes; but I fancy that one quite important truth was in danger of escaping our notice.

What is that?

The truth that each step in the practice of this art is a squandering of that "efficiency" which, as you have shown, is the vis motrix of the process.

I really don't understand you, Socrates.

Well, I will make my meaning plain. Each one of those slippery phrases which your art employs, carries with it by necessity a slippery action, and each of these slippery actions simply cancels so much of the faith in your good intentions which constitutes your fund of moral efficiency. The actual process which you describe is simply the killing of the liberty of a weaker by a stronger nation. All your phrases cannot hide this fact. But their smoothness costs your nation very dear all the same—dearer even than you understand.

Why, indeed, Socrates, we are well aware how heavy is the burden which this civilising mission lays upon us.

I doubt, Thrasymenes, if you have even an inkling of the real cost. I mean the back-stroke of Imperialism.

Why, what is that?

It is the destruction of liberty in that nation which destroys the liberty of another. For Nemesis works surely and accurately this way. To kill the liberty of another people is to strike a blow at the spirit of liberty at home. This surely is the inner meaning of that proverb, "What shall it profit a nation if it gain the whole world and lose its own soul?" For nothing less than this is the cost of the career of duplicity and treachery which you describe. And your vindication and approval of it is a simple measure of the moral degeneration it entails. This unctuous rectitude of the civilising mission is the last penalty but one for the nation that commits itself to an Imperial career.

The last but one, said Eubulus; pray, Socrates, what is this last?

Oh, there remains yet lower depths than that of slayer of liberty. It is the state of soul of that nation which, like Saul in the legend, holds the cloak of another tyrant that he may stone the last out of the helpless nation whose integrity and independence he has undertaken to preserve.—Nation.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 14th:—A despatch from the Italian Commander in the Red Sea gives a graphic description of the fight of 13th instant. The Commander says he was convinced that gunboats were concealed among the Farsan Islands and he determined upon a driving movement with his available warships which were likewise intended to dislodge large forces concentrated at Lohria, Midy and Kufuda. The cruisers Calabria and Puglia bombarded Lohria and Midy to divert the enemy's attention. Meanwhile, the Piemonte and two destroyers were scouring the coast from Jeddah southwards and sighted the Turkish yacht and gunboats. Action was opened at six thousand metres and developed sharply, the land batteries supporting the gunboats. It lasted three hours and ended at nightfall when the gunboats were completely out-actioned and defeated. The gunboats retired, some going ashore demoralised. The crews landed under cover of darkness carrying ammunition and flags, which were seized on the beach by an Italian landing party in the morning, when the warships resumed the bombarding gunboat completing their destruction. The Turks have abandoned Kufuda. The Italians avoided hitting mosques. The Italians sustained no losses. The ships bombarded and scattered some columns of troops and camels proceeding to Lohria.

The Rangoon Red Crescent Fund amounts to Rs. 58,000 of which sum it has been decided to remit Rs. 52,500 by bank draft or telegraph to Constantinople as directed by the Turkish Consul-General, Bombay.

The Chamber of Deputies by 125 votes to 105 has adopted the Constitutional Bill which proposes to give the Sultan unrestricted power to dissolve the Parliament. This vote is equivalent to the rejection of the Bill owing to the absence of a two-thirds majority and constitutes the defeat of the Government and victory of the Committee of Union and Progress who will now proceed to provoke dissolution.

With the consent of the Senate H. M. the Sultan has dissolved the Chamber.

Reuter wires from London on the 19th without giving his source of information that severe fighting took place at Derna on the 18th. The Turks attacked the Italians while the latter were repairing an aqueduct, having taken up their position behind the Italian walls despite searchlights and watchdogs. They had also occupied the neighbouring heights. The Italians brought up their mountain artillery and made most effective use of it. They took the Turkish fort by assault and the Turks were dislodged from the heights after four hours' fighting. After seven hours' fighting three thousand Turks and Arabs retreated, leaving over a hundred dead on the field together with arms, ammunition and grenades. A few Italians were killed.

The Italians have stopped the liner Carthage carrying mails from Marseilles to Tunis off Sardinia and have seized an aeroplane as contraband of war. It appears that the aeroplane was intended to take part in the aviation meeting at Tunis and the aviators are protesting. France has notified Italy that the reserves liberty of action with regard to the seizure of the liner Carthage. Law experts are now considering the matter.

The Italians have seized and conveyed to Cagliari the French mail boat Achouaba while on her way to Tunis.

France has demanded that Italy shall release the liner Carthage, which is still detained at Cagliari.

Purs, December 22.

The special correspondent of the Temps with the Turkish forces in Tripoli telegraphs from Azizia under date of the 20th instant that on the 15th instant the Italians, reinforced by 2,000 fresh arrivals, attacked the Turkish camp, but were repulsed with a loss of 200 killed, including two officers. The Turks lost 12 killed and 30 wounded. On the 17th instant the Italians made a reconnaissance in force with artillery and proceeded to Zansuk after firing 210 shells in the direction of the Turkish camp. In the evening the Turks developed an attack and the Italians fell back on Tripoli. On the 19th instant an Italian reconnaissance to the eastward of the Turkish left was driven in after hard fighting which lasted until the afternoon. The Italians lost their way in the desert and were harried by the Turks, who cut off a detachment and captured 200 rifles as well as other equipment and several mules. The pursuit stopped at Ain Zara. The Italians lost 500 men and the Turks had 50 killed and 40 wounded.

December 24.

According to letters from the special correspondent of the Temps with the Turkish forces in Tripoli dated Zuara the 16th and 18th instant, the Arab auxiliaries are by no means intimidated by the uninterrupted Italian naval bombardment of the coast positions. Zuara has already been bombarded eight times but without effect, and when the Italians attempted to land at Sidi Said they were driven back to their boats. The Arabs are under the command of Mehemed Mussa Bey, who is a native of Yemen and a zealous and efficient officer trained at the Harbieh, or Military School in Constantinople.

Tripoli, December 20 (delayed by censor).

A force of the enemy, 3,000 strong, attacked three battalions of Italians on Tuesday, December 19, at Bir Tobras, ten hours from Ain Zara. Reinforcements and mountain guns were summoned. Fierce fighting took place at close quarters. The official report gives the Italian casualties as six killed and 78 wounded.

Rome, December 22.

More detailed accounts of the fight at Bir Tobras, of which the first news was received in Rome last night, show that the operations were of some importance. On Tuesday morning a reconnaissance was made from Ain Zara in the direction of Djebel Gharian by two battalions of Bersaglieri, one battalion of Grenadiers, a squadron of Lodi cavalry, and a section of mountain artillery under the command of Colonel Fara. Their intention was to anticipate, if possible, any concentration of the enemy on that side and an attack upon Ain Zara. Owing to the darkness, however, the reconnoitring force missed their way and only arrived at the oasis of Bir Tobras, which lies some six miles south of Ain Zara, at 10 in the morning. The enemy were evidently forewarned of this movement and had time to prepare for an attack on the outskirts of the oasis. While Colonel Fara was attempting to effect a circling movement, his force was suddenly confronted by a large body of the enemy, hitherto concealed, who opened a hot fire upon the Italian troops, and at the same time a squadron of Turkish cavalry, supported by infantry, began to surround the Italian right. Thereupon Colonel Fara promptly concentrated his forces upon the right and intrenched the position. For the rest of the day and during the greater part of the night the enemy, calculated to be about 3,000 in number, delivered one attack after another in a most determined fashion, coming up sometimes within 50 yards of the trenches; but each time they were beaten back by the heavy rifle and artillery fire maintained by the Italians. Finally, at 4 o'clock next morning they retired, leaving Colonel Fara and his troops in possession of the field. After disposing of their dead and wounded, the Italian troops returned unmolested to Ain Zara, meeting on their way some reinforcements under General Lequio.

Rome, December 22.

Nothing new is reported from Tripoli, Homs, or Ain Zara.

A belated wireless telegram from Derna relates that an attack was made upon the garrison there on the 16th instant, while they were throwing up new works for the fortification of the place. The enemy, who were estimated at about 2,000 in number, were forced to retire after a somewhat severe exchange of firing. The Italian loss was three killed and 24 wounded.

From all accounts the Italian force under Colonel Fara would have fared badly at Bir Tobras had it not been for the promptitude with which the colonel in command recognized the danger of the situation and formed square. As it was, their square was exposed to nearly 20 hours' hot fire and to repulse five separate desperate assaults from the enemy who probably numbered more nearly 4,000 than 3,000. The troops have displayed admirable order and discipline in trying circumstances. This is not the first time Colonel Fara has distinguished himself as a capable and energetic commander in the course of the war.

Rome, December 23.

According to a telegram from Tobruk, the troops on guard over the earthworks for a new battery overlooking the roadstead were sharply attacked yesterday morning and an action lasting six hours ensued, in which an Italian battalion, two sections of Artillery, a few quick-firing guns and a mountain battery took part. The troops engaged upon the works and the warships also rendered valuable assistance. The Italians had two officers and five men killed and one officer and 15 men wounded. The enemy, who numbered about a thousand, suffered heavily.—Reuter.

Rome, December 24.

Telegrams received from Tripoli give an account of an action between the Italian and Turkish forces at Ras-el-Mahara yesterday. The Turks began the advance against the Italian position at 4.30 p.m., and by 7.30 o'clock several independent bodies of the enemy whose force amounted altogether to several thousand men supported by artillery, were facing the Italian eastern front, extended along a line from the sea to Berka. They advanced in the direction of Fojat and Redoubts Nos. 4 and 3. The Italians withheld their fire until the enemy were within 2,000 yards range, when the artillery opened upon them and checked the advance all along the line, obviously inflicting considerable loss.

The Italian warships lying off Benghazi were unable to assist the garrison owing to the high sea which was running. The Turks withdrew at sunset to the oasis. The Italians had no casualties. When darkness fell the weather improved, the sea subsided, and the warships illuminated the surrounding country with their searchlights. No trace of the enemy could be seen.

December 28.

The Stefani Agency reports a rumour from Tripoli of the death of Munir Pasha and of the Chief of the Turkish Gendarmerie at Gharian. The same message contains the statement of an Arab fugitive that the native population of Acrara near Bir Tobras have been massacred by Turks and Arabs for having raised the Italian flag on the approach of an Italian force.

The latest report from Benghazi fixes the Turkish and Arab casualties in the attack made on Christmas Day at about 500 killed and wounded.

Numerous bodies of Arabs are said to be gathering south of Ain Zara. According to some reports the enemy between Azazia and Gharian number about 10,000.

Berlin, December 22.

Referring to the telegram from your Sofia correspondent which appeared in the Times of Wednesday, a semi-official telegram from Berlin to the Cologne Gazette says:—

"The Times, message seeks to produce an impression as if Germany were supporting Turkey in an impermissible manner by providing her with war material. The story, which is added to the message, that the Turkish Ambassador expressed his special thanks to the Emperor is a pure invention. As regards the transport of munitions of war, it may be that consignments of war material which has been manufactured in private workshops have gone by way of Serbia. This would, however, in no way be in contradiction to paragraph 7 of The Hague Convention, which expressly declares the trade of neutral States in war material for belligerent Powers and also its passage through neutral territory to be permissible. Concerning the application of this provision all the Powers are at one."

Unless I am mistaken, the provision of The Hague Convention about the duties of neutrals which is here referred to is not quite as represented, but runs as follows.—"A neutral State is not bound to prevent exportation or transit for account of either belligerent of arms, munition, or in general of anything capable of use by an army or a fleet." The provision was intended to prevent loose talk about "benevolent" neutrality and to prevent belligerent Governments from complaining—as Germany complained to the British Government during the Franco-German war—whenever a neutral Government does not suppress commercial operations which its trading subjects carry on at their own risk.

Although it will occur to anybody who has read your correspondent's message that the German Foreign Office is curiously sensitive, it is justified in calling attention to the limitation of the responsibility of neutral Governments thus agreed upon. This does not, however, detract from the interest of the news published by your correspondent. When his telegram or, rather, a portion of it was published here on Wednesday night various German journals hastened after their manner to abuse the Times. The abuse, in which all the journals which mentioned the subject were unanimous, does not matter. About the probability or possibility of the facts they were less unanimous. The Vossische Zeitung, which is a leading commercial organ, said:—"Everybody knows that Turkey is buying war material in Germany." The Berliner Tageblatt, which is also a leading commercial organ, said that if the report had any foundation at all what was sent in the German trains could at most be hospital supplies bought by Turkey or supplied to her by the Red Cross Society. The Kreuz Zeitung, after half a column of personal denunciation of your well-known correspondent in the Balkans, declaimed about German neutrality and ridiculed your correspondent's reports as either mere gossip or inventions of his own. The Kreuz Zeitung is the leading organ of the military classes in this country. These views will need a good deal of harmonizing with one another and with the semi-official view of the Cologne Gazette, before the German Press can deal safely and impressively with the subject of your Sofia correspondent's despatch.

Vienna, December 28.

Amid a running fire of Press attacks upon Count Aehrenthal, the preliminary Session of the Austro-Hungarian Delegations began here this morning. To-night the Foreign Minister's statement is available, and with it a speech by his colleague, the Minister of War. The Committee of the Hungarian Delegation, to which the two Ministers made their declarations, sided unanimously with Count

Aehrenthal, but showed some coldness towards the hectoring discourse of the War Minister. Count Aehrenthal began by remarking that the Turco-Italian War imposed upon him great reserve. He recapitulated the declarations of neutrality made last October by the Austrian and the Hungarian Premiers, and expressed regret that the efforts of Austro-Hungarian diplomacy to bring about a cessation of hostilities should not have attained their object. "We know, however, that in making these efforts we are at one with all the other neutral Powers, and hope that at a given moment our endeavours will be successful." The desire of the Monarchy for a rapid conclusion of peace, continued Count Aehrenthal, was the more intense because the Balkan status quo might be endangered by the protraction of the war. They cherished a feeling of confidence that this danger would not arise. The Italian Government declared from the outset its adhesion to the Balkan status quo and had acted accordingly. Their confidence was based, further, upon the unanimous wish of all the Great Powers that the Balkan status quo should not be disturbed. The Balkan Governments had not only made correct declarations, "but I believe there is a noticeable effort to avoid the perils and horrors of a war." The Foreign Minister proceeded:—

"In spite of great difficulties, the Ottoman Government is at pains to maintain public order in the Empire. It is desirable that these efforts should continue to be effectual and that the conclusion of peace—let us sincerely hope—may preserve undiminished the power and authority of Turkey. A new guarantee for the pacific existence of Turkey alongside of the Balkan States would thus be created. The foundations of our foreign policy are, naturally, unchanged. Supported by our well-tryed alliances and by the friendly relations which we maintain with all the Powers, our chief task will be to contribute to a settlement—equally honourable for both belligerents—of a war which is by no means devoid of danger to other States."

Details reached Massowah yesterday of the capture of the Turkish hospital ship Kaiserlich by the Italian cruiser Puglia. It was found, the telegram says, that, although she was flying the Red Crescent flag, she was in no way fitted up as a hospital ship. There was no trace on board of beds or other hospital arrangements, nor could any of her officers or crew point out surgical instruments or appliances. The lower bunkers of the steamer, on the other hand, were full of coal, while the kitchen accommodation was scarcely sufficient to feed 30 persons. It was, therefore, found impossible to consider the Kaiserlich a hospital ship and she was seized on suspicion of being used as a Turkish transport on the Arabian coast.—Reuter

According to advices just received from Hodeida the Italian warships Calabria and Staffetta are now bombarding Al Gabbana, which is a place on the coast about six miles from Hodeida. The Italian warships are reported to have fired a number of shells on that place and the Turks have replied from Al Gabbana, but full details have not yet been received.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST.")

In Tripoli the Italians have received a nasty set-back. There is a very great discrepancy between the Italian and the Turkish accounts of the affair at Bis Tobras. The latter obviously exaggerates out of all knowledge the check inflicted upon the Italians, but the former as obviously minimises it. An Italian force of arms, nearly 2,000 strong, under Colonel Fara, set out from Ain Zara on December 19 to attack the Arabs at Bis Tobras, a small oasis some ten miles off. It apparently lost its way; for it took more than eight hours to cover the short distance, and when it arrived it found the enemy well prepared to resist it. After a desperate fight the Italians were repulsed, and were attacked in their turn, and, after beating back the enemy throughout the day and the following night, had to retreat the next morning to Ain Zara. At one moment it looked as if they might be surrounded and cut off, and reinforcements which were sent from Ain Zara did not reach them till they were on their way back. The affair is of no great importance in itself, but it is eloquent of the difficulties the Italians have yet to face in Tripoli and must greatly encourage the Arabs to resist the invaders. In Cyrenaica the garrisons in the coast towns continue to be subjected to harassing attacks and except for the small area round Tripoli itself the Italians are not in effective occupation of any territory not covered by the guns of their fleet. According to Italian writers, the troops now landed, estimated at between 60,000 and 70,000 men, are not more than sufficient for safeguarding the positions they already occupy on the coast. Between 10,000 and 15,000 reinforcements are ready to leave Italy, and all preparations are reported to have been made for a general advance inland. That advance, however, seems likely to be postponed for the present, and it is obvious that the Italians are now beginning to realise the difficulty of conquering the two provinces they so light-heartedly annexed. It is possible that they hope the political dissensions in Constantinople will drive Turkey to make peace and thus save them from undertaking the work of conquest at all.

Sofia, December 21.

On Sunday, 17th instant, a requiem service was celebrated for the souls of the victims of the Ishtip massacre, and later a mass meeting was held in the space before the cathedral to condemn the action of the Turkish Government. It is a significant fact that whilst but a couple of months ago it looked as though the Macedonian question were dead it is now once again very much to the fore, and to those who really understand the position it looks as if the usual means of extinction would be far from adequate. The turn of events is being watched with the most lively interest by all classes and by those most intimate with the question with more than a little alarm.

Commenting on Turco-Bulgarian relations, the semi-official journal Dnevni observes that the Porte has taken absolutely no steps to improve them, and that, on the contrary, everything is being done by Turkey to exasperate Bulgaria. In face of the frontier incidents and the butchery at Ishtip, by which Turkey seeks to involve the Bulgarian Government in difficulties, there remains nothing for this country to do but prepare her army so that the Bulgarian people do not find themselves unpleasantly surprised in the case of a war.

The war of reprisals continues in Macedonia. Last week two well-known members of the Committee of Union and Progress were assassinated near Kratovo. Information has now reached Salonika of the murder, near Kotchane, of a family of Bosnian immigrants numbering six persons. Both crimes are attributed to Bulgarian revolutionaries. The Moslem population of Kotchane are greatly excited and threaten to take vengeance on the Bulgarians.

Al-Liwa, December 18.

WE LEARN from the reports received from the Ottoman camp at Derna that a small mixed force of some Arab tribes and Turkish regulars attacked the Italian fortifications situated opposite to Benghazi. The fighting lasted for a considerable length of time, the enemy losing more than 150 killed and the Turks 3 killed and 15 wounded. The Italian killed included a considerable number of officers which has much upset them. It is difficult to estimate accurately the number of wounded, but the whole town is filled with them. It appears that some other of very high rank is also killed as the forces show signs of great grief and marks of mourning have been distributed. The commander of the Arabs in this encounter was a well known Shaikh of the Senoussis who is greatly respected by all the tribes.

4: Zaraqqi, December 18.

On the night of 13th December a small force of Arabs and Turks advanced towards Derna and sat down opposite to an important point among the Italian fortifications awaiting the arrival of dawn. In the morning when a body of Italians was passing in front of them they suddenly raised the shout of "Allah-o Akbar" and attacked the Italians, gradually pushing them back. But the unexpected shout had already unnerved the enemy and it was retreating of its own accord. When the main army got news of this, eight batches of reinforcements were sent one after another. It was a critical situation for the Turks and Arabs, but in spite of fatigue and sleeplessness, they prevented the advance of the enemy and attacked them time after time. At last the Italian force could not withstand their attack and fled in utter disorder.

It is difficult to estimate the large number of wounded, but they lost 130 killed. It should be noted that the Arabs and Turks had only rifle fire on their side while the enemy had artillery as well, and the great disparity in numbers was obvious.

On the following day a reconnaissance showed that the place of encounter was unoccupied and a party of our men went in search of the enemy. Some groups of Italians were sighted near the town and were immediately engaged. The fight that ensued was even severer than on the previous day and lasted long. Our numbers too had been increased, but the enemy's forces were four or five times our number. They wished to repulse us, while we desired to compel them to evacuate this point as well. When fighting had been prolonged the Arab force began to recite aloud the Chapter of Repentance from the Quran, and this filled our men with such new vigour and determination that when we charged the enemy this time, it broke up and fled to Barra, which is situated at half-an-hour's journey from Benghazi, and where they have extremely strong fortifications. The guns of the Italian fleet also took part in the fight.

Our losses in killed did not exceed 30, though the number of wounded reached 50. But the enemy must have lost no less than 1,000 killed, and the number of wounded cannot be estimated. The Italian forces had already been unnerved, but after this battle they have completely collapsed and the state of their nerves excites ridicule. They retire every night to the ships and exercise their military prowess and prestige on those poor wretches who have to look after the ships, it being a standing order that on hearing the shout of "Allah-o Akbar" all ships must weigh anchor. Their imagination presents awful forms of Turks and Arabs to their sight when they are ashore in the day, and they often rush back to the boats in terror of an imaginary pursuit.

Owing to the disorder of the enemy's retreat booty of all kinds fell into our hands and we have made many prisoners. Among the booty is a large stock of Dum-Dum bullets which have been universally forbidden according to International Law. This discovery is so patent a proof of their use that refutation is no longer possible; we have, therefore, shown these bullets to the English and French war correspondents, and they have been sent to Constantinople with a view to their early submission by the Porte before the Powers.

Al-Liwa, December 23.

In Zanzur the Italians attempted to cut the telegraphic wires of the Turks but retired unsuccessful, after losing 40 men and 3 officers killed and about 300 wounded.

Alamdar, December 27.

The following official statement relating to the fight at Tobruk on the 22nd December has reached here from the Ottoman Consulate —

The eastern portion of Tobruk is bounded by a chain of hills known as Djebel Natooiah. The enemy had spent all its energies in capturing this and had commenced to erect fortifications after elaborate preparations. But we were determined that this shall not be, so on the night of the 22nd December a mixed body of Turkish soldiers and Arabs advanced towards Natooiah. The Arabs were commanded by Shaikh Yasin who is the chief of the Mariam tribe.

This advance was neither a secret night attack nor military strategem. The preparations had, on the contrary, been openly made and no feint was used in the concentration and movement of troops. When the enemy became aware of our intentions, two large forces were immediately despatched to the left of the fortifications and to protect their western portion. These forces were well equipped and in addition to artillery of a large calibre had a large body of cavalry as well as infantry. Although we were attacking their fortifications only on the left, they did not wish to rely only on these preparations but wanted to call the rest of their forces as well. These were, however, at Tobruk itself.

At dawn our infantry together with the volunteers advanced on the line which the enemy had kept safe for the retreat or flight of its right. Our situation was so perilous that we ourselves cannot estimate its danger even now. Success has been due merely to that Providence which makes right prevail over injustice. In front was the Italian force, and towards the rear fourteen vessels of the enemy's fleet were pouring forth fire from their guns. The enemy met our forces, but could not resist the charge of our men who entered into the fortifications of Natooiah and captured all the guns, killing the defenders.

This was indeed an important battle in the campaign and lasted from dawn till an hour after sunset. Not a soul escaped inside the fortifications and more than half the infantry on the western side was cut down. A very small portion of the cavalry escaped and among the killed were three whose uniforms and other signs indicated very high rank. Much booty fell into our hands, including stores of grain, military equipment, guns, engineering tools and, most valuable of all documents containing projects of operations, plans, papers relating to accounts of war expenditure and sketches, which supply information of great value for our own future plan of action.

In this battle, which lasted for 13 hours, what were our own losses? We hesitate to mention them for fear that the outside world, which relies merely on material causes and means and is ignorant of the omnipotence and inscrutable ways of the Creator of the Universe, may not accept the truth of our statement. We lost only 7 killed and 20 wounded, the injuries of the latter being mostly slight. We regret to have to include among the martyrs the memorable name of Shaikh Masri who had contributed not only the men of his tribe to the attacking force, but had joined himself with his five sons, and had fought on with such fortitude and determination that all earned him the strength of his faith. Among the Turks who fought well we have to mention the name of Naif Effendi who showed unparalleled courage and dash and was the first to capture Italian guns.

On the authority of reports published by the Ottoman Government, the Patri has published in a recent issue details of three encounters between the Italians and the Turks and Arabs. It appears that the Italians had recently re-occupied Benghazi and the Turks had receded; but on Christmas Day, while the Italians were occupied in the festivities of the season, the Turks attacked them in broad daylight. For six hours cannonading continued, but thereafter the Arabs drew their swords and charged the Italians throwing their right into great confusion. At the same time Senoussi reinforcements reached the Turks, and the shouts of "Allah-o-Akbar" were raised with startling effect. The enemy numbered not less than 10,000, while the Mussulmans were hardly 2,500. The Italians were forced to retreat to their ships together with their Commander. Several thousand cases of ammunition fell into the hands of the Turks, and it was then discovered that they contained Dum-Dum bullets.

After their defeat at Benghazi, the Italians suddenly opened fire on Hasan Sa'ah. There were no men at that locality at the time, having joined the Turks at various camps. The women and children that had remained behind were shelled, and women that had been captured had to suffer the pain and misery of having their children killed by being dashed against their heads. When on the following day the Arabs discovered this, they set off in their rage in the direction of the Italians that very moment, and made such a dashing and unexpected attack that the Italians surrendered without fighting.

In the neighbourhood of Benghazi, there is a locality called Ain Barca which is inhabited by Berbers. The Italians had occupied the place by bribing the Berbers and had fortified it. The Sheikhs of the Bara'ia came to the conclusion that so long as the Cross floated on Ain Barca, Mussulmans could not hope to regain Benghazi or, at any rate, retain it. So, without asking leave from the Turkish Commander-in-Chief, Neshat Bey, they attacked the place. But the fighting was severe and the Arabs were several times retreating. Their women, however, showered reproaches upon them whenever they were returning back, and this shamed them so much that they fought on and before sunset captured Ain Barca.

The War in Tripoli.

By MARK SYKES, M. P.

The results of Italy's action in Tripoli will trouble the world for many a year to come. For no obvious purpose of either political expediency, material gain, or moral obligation, a European Power has nominally annexed a large portion of territory over which the flag of an Asiatic Power has flown for some considerable time without objection or challenge. The partial occupation of this region is being accompanied by a mixture of incompetence and foolish ruthlessness which only inexperience and panic can explain and nothing can excuse. To make the point plain I quote the Daily Telegraph of December 13, whose Milan correspondent, quoting from official Italian source, states:—"In the course of the manoeuvre a few Arabs were discovered, some of whom, found to be bearing arms, were shot immediately." I pass by all previous charges made against the Italians; this is quite sufficient; the announcement is plain and bald enough. I do not profess to be shocked. It is sufficient to say that this statement carries three conclusions: Firstly, that the Italians do not recognise natives as belligerents; secondly, that they do not know how to conduct a war of conquest or annexation; thirdly, that a state of war must prevail in the Tripolitan Hinterland for months and years to come. These conclusions may be deduced; I think, in the following way.—The statement, that these Arabs were immediately shot, is made as a matter of course, comes from an Italian source, and is expected to arouse no comment—it is merely the record of the operation of a recognised policy. That this policy is absurd must be patent to anyone acquainted with military operations, to anyone who understands the revengeful nature of the Arab character, to anyone who realises that violence is not strength. Lastly, such a policy is a sure guarantee of interminable fighting, because no Arab, armed or unarmed, will hand forth expect quarter, or believe that his voluntary surrender would be accepted, or will be under any other impression than that the war is one of extermination.

So much for Italian policy. As for the methods of carrying out that policy, the facts speak for themselves. The littoral Arabs of Tripoli are naturally unaccustomed to war or the use of arms as the Italians themselves. The Turkish garrison was 6,000 strong on the outbreak of war. This feeble force was, roughly, equally scattered between Benghazi, Derna and Tripoli town; the distance between these points forbids any concentration of these numerically contemptible and isolated groups of infantry. Italy has command of the sea, and has a compulsorily trained population to draw upon, a momentarily popular cause to prosecute, aeroplanes, tankships, quick-fires, staff officers, ammunition, and money. There was no natural difficulty or obstacle in her path, no mountain range, waterless deserts, swamp, or unexplored region stood between her forces and her enemy. Yet to-day, after over two months, her troops dare not encamp or entrench or spend the night beyond the radius of the guns of the fleet. We have had the extraordinary picture of a fully equipped army covered by naval gunfire actually besieged, actually driven back on one occasion, by a force not one-tenth of its numbers, efficiency, or prestige. Only after two months hesitation and defence has the Italian commander dared issue from his lines to realise what his aeroplanes had told him for weeks, that he had practically nothing in front of him, and when finally he did emerge, his puny, immobile antagonist was suffered to retire with his wounded and his camels and camp followers uncaptured.

Now these are the preliminary operations carried out by the Italians in order to form a base for the conquest of Tripoli, a region about as large as the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies, seared by waterless deserts, and inhabited by really savage and war-like tribes, with whom the Italians have not yet come in contact, and towards whom a constant stream of ammunition and arms has been directed ever since the war began. I do not think, therefore, that it can be denied that the question of the war in Tripoli must remain with us for some time to come. War is always bad, the state of the Tripolitan Hinterland bids fair to become a serious and standing menace to the world.

It remains, therefore, to consider the manifold problems to which this war gives rise and which must not only last so long as hostilities last but must remain to plague us long after the actual cause has subsided into insignificance. Hitherto, by various means the British Foreign Office has blinded itself, the Press, and the public to the nature of the disaster which befell the world when Italy uttered her first ultimatum. It was left apparently to cranks, Socialists and Little Englanders to protest. Italian action is condoned, explained, hidden, and decently covered in one way or another by persons of eminence and understanding, her performances condemned only by those who are supposed to be vain babblers vapouring merely from sheer perversity; yet to my mind, Italy's action is as vain, as cruel, and as wrong as it actually appears in spite of the doubtful nature of the prosecuting counsel and the respectability of those who charge themselves with its defence. But whether Italy be right or wrong in this business is a matter of small consequence compared with the situation she has produced. All that lies between Agadir and Calcutta has been jolted and jarred by this adventure. The Balkans, the Dardanelles, Armenia, Mecca, Medina, Jeddah, the Aden Hinterland, Egypt, the Sudan, Tunis, Algeria, India, Persia, even Afghanistan, are all names which represent world problems, and all have been prejudicially affected by the present war.

If we run rapidly through the catalogue we shall see the various possibilities which will influence the minds of men.

Let us first take the world of Islam and see how it is influenced by the conflict. In Egypt men are watching closely the course of operations; an Italian victory arouses an angry discontent, an Italian reverse a dangerous jubilation; in the Sudan a race of warriors are reminded once more of the joys of battle, the possibility of freedom from Christian rule. Both in Egypt and the Sudan, in hut and mosque and school, the word is being whispered of war—holy war—the Jihad. These are dangerous things for men to whisper; and the whispers will not cease because editors are put in prison or their newspapers suspended. In the land of Tunis, where by fair means and foul, by regulations and officialism, the Latin is displacing the Arab, and an old sore is reopened, a fresh pang stings a people who see themselves bound, sold, degraded, defeated and shut out from the world. In Algeria the deep, burning hatred which the suave and treacherous Arab knows so well how to conceal receives fresh fuel, and the Algerian Moslem once more registers his silent vow to await his opportunity—and to take it when it comes.

In Persia a futile and semi-despairing nation hears the news, and groaning in spirit, turns to counsels of chaos.

In India millions of our subjects whisper as in Egypt, but the whispering takes a different note. Is this done by England's will? Is this the work of England's friend? Is Islam to be crushed throughout the world? Is the Christian determined to subdue the Mussulman? The Indian Mussulman must bear the Hindu's sneers at his loyalty; he hears of Tripoli and sees the policy of the partition of Bengal undone; he looked to the Raj to protect him against his peaceful but more nimblewitted neighbours; he put unflinching faith in English friendship with Turkey, and now—his heart is filled with vague doubts and haunting fears.

In Asiatic Turkey men had sworn to observe the Constitution to grant Christians equality before the law, to admit Christians into the army, to forget the ancient hatreds and feuds. Yet a Christian Power is taking a Moslem province where practically no Christians lived before, and there are massacres, wars, seizures, open and unashamed. There are plenty of reactionaries of the worst and fiercest type in Turkey to-day and now Italy has given them a text and a popular appeal. As a consequence there are thousands of poor, harmless folk in danger, and there may be an end of one of the finest dreams, one of the fairest hopes, which this century may ever see.

Far out beyond the Khyber Pass, in Afghanistan, a fanatical and predatory people are watching and listening. Who knows what perilous words are not now being spoken in the bazaars of Cabul and Kandahar?

In Mecca and Medina each year men from every quarter of the world congregate together in the season of sacred pilgrimage. What kind of a tale will the Hajis bear home when their friends and relatives come out to meet them on their return? They will have heard of this war, will perhaps have seen people who have fought in it, will have heard of small defenceless Red Sea towns and villages being shelled, of merchants ruined and helpless trading dhows being burnt. Will they be silent, will they approve, or will they bear home, east, west, north and south, a hopeless tale of oppression and injustice that will animate their hearers with a savage unrelenting spirit of anger and indignation? These are fanatical folk and their religion is that of the sword.

So much of Islam. There is plenty more which is equally undesirable.

The Balkans, for years a hell of intimidation and persecution, of petty strife and major jealousies, ever a menace to the peace of Europe, stand now a noisy threat. Frontier incidents and outrages are signs that we are at least within measurable distance of actual conflagration. Austria will neither have Italy on the east of the Adriatic nor on the Aegean coast and a move in this direction would be deemed an act of war by the Dual Empire; but Bulgaria, Servia and Romania are ready to spring. If Italy's war goes ill in Africa, the temptation to reinstate a damaged prestige by an European diversion may prove overwhelming, and the intrigues of the lesser Balkan States may give her heart to dare Austria's anger. For this reason alone the war has multiplied the dangers and risks of a Balkan explosion a hundredfold.

But the trouble does not end here. Suppose Italy avoids the Adriatic and European coasts of Turkey, she may yet be driven to attack the Dardanelles, an action which would immediately reopen the whole question of the Black Sea, the Bosphorus and Constantinople. The strategic facts of 1812, of 1854, of 1876 are still the strategic facts of 1911. Who holds the Black Sea and the Dardanelles must eventually control the Mediterranean, must hold a predominant commercial and military position. If the Dardanelles comes to be within the theatre of the present war, no Englishman can consider the map with equanimity, for developments may arise which will threaten our Mediterranean outposts and the line of communications which they guard.

Lastly suppose this war end now, end in Italy's favour, the after-effects are not pleasant to contemplate. Islam has been shocked and outraged, Turkey has been disillusioned and humiliated. In spite of efforts to reform, in spite of real reforms achieved, she is stripped of provinces, her subjects are shot for the mere act of self-defence, and her defencelessness is made the excuse for foreign aggression. A long period of turbulence, rebellion, and strife will have been initiated in North Africa. The morality of the world will have received a serious blow, the problems of Balkan pacification, of the material development of Asia Minor, of the Baghdad Railway, of the Persian Gulf, of the settlement of Persia will be henceforth more difficult to solve, more dangerous to the peace of the world.—The Near East.

With the Men in the Trenches.

A correspondent has sent the following letter to the Times of London, from Tripoli, dated 12th December, which that journal publishes in its issue of the 22nd December:—

When I landed in Tripoli the town and the neighbourhood had not yet recovered from the effects of the recent inundation. Some roads were still impassable; the palm gardens behind the trenches were still dotted with picturesque lakes and pools, and it was easy to imagine what the condition of things had been a few days previously. But the soldiers in the trenches seemed perfectly cheerful.

During the days that followed I spent much time in the trenches and I found always the same keen spirit. I talked with men who had been leading for five or six weeks the monotonous but nervous life of the trenches—monotonous, because each day passed like another, without diversion, almost without news; nervous, because at any moment of the day or night the crackle of musketry among the palms might call them to attention, sometimes to repel a brisk attack, often more to watch for an invisible enemy, who snipped from the shelter of trees and wells. The strain must have been considerable, but the spirit of the men was always the same. Sometimes they wondered a little when the advance would begin; they were eager to get to grips with the enemy, who bothered them night and day; but they showed no traces at all of that despondency and lack of nerve which had been attributed to them by some correspondents.

After all, cheerfulness is an attribute of the Italian nation, and it is not surprising that the national characteristics should be evident among the soldiers. What has impressed me more has been the firmness and the balance displayed by the troops. I have watched them under fire, in the trenches and in the desert, and I have seen them in circumstances still more trying. I refer to the ghastly scene near El Henni, where the bodies of their mutilated comrades were found. I took special notice of the demeanour of the many soldiers present on that occasion, and I confess myself surprised at their controlled and dignified behaviour. The things seen then were enough to try the calmness of any spectator, and it would not have been a matter for wonder if the soldiery of an excitable race had lost hold of their control, and given vent to the feelings of horror and rage that possessed every beholder. Seeing what I have seen, I am less than ever inclined to believe in the stories of unbridled massacre which have been so widely circulated on such slender evidence.

During the lasting few days many Arabs have been coming in from the oasis, to make submission and beg for protection from Turks and desert warriors. Bands of men, women, and children have been coming into the town escorted by soldiers. Here is one picture, taken near El Henni, not very far from the spot where the tortured prisoners were found. A group of Arabs were coming in towards the town. The women were weary, and the soldiers carried the little children to save the mother's fatigue. One held a baby in his arms talking and smiling to it and dancing it as he would his own child. Others carried children on their shoulders, and one had his képi pulled all on one side by the clutching arm of a little Arab girl. They came to a knot of officers, and tried to stiffen to attention. The man with the baby blushed. "Scusi, Signor Colonello," he stammered "But I have a bambino at home."

I have known the Italian soldier for some years, and now for the first time I have seen him on service in conditions that are hard for a soldier, after experiences that must have tried him sorely. He is not smart, in our sense of the word. In a way, he is even slack. But his spirit is admirable, his cheerfulness unquenchable, and his keenness great. Moreover, he is a wonderful worker. He digs like a navvy, and the trenches he makes in a few hours will keep him snug and safe for weeks, if need be. If there is a fault to find with the troops, it is that they move rather slowly in the attack. But this is a question of leading, the men are not often allowed to display the dash of which I am convinced they are capable. And perhaps the policy of the leaders is justified by the small casualty lists, though, that is a point which opens a wide field for discussion.

The Fighting in Tripoli.

(BY THE "TIMES" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Italian operations during the past ten days have not been very fortunate. The weather has been bad. Aeroplanes reconnoissances have been impracticable, and a shed built to house one of the newly-arrived dirigibles has been half destroyed by a storm. The distribution of the Italian forces is practically the same to-day as a week ago, but some reinforcements have reached Benghazi, possibly native troops from Eritrea, and there are now nearly 30,000 men available for active operations in Cyrenaica and a forward move on this side is to be anticipated. The special Fifth Division is reported to be still at Naples with its transports ready, but there is nothing to show what mission will be entrusted to it. Many Italian ships have returned to their ports to refit and replenish coal and supplies. The first squadron of the First Naval Division, consisting of the Regina Elena, Vittorio Emanuele, Roma and Napoli, reached Taranto on 15th December while the ships of the Second Division—namely, the Sicilia, Re Umberto and Sardinia were back at Spezia at the same date.

The Iride and Cassiopea attempted to reconnoitre Sidi Suid near the frontier of Tunis on 17th December but the landing party was assailed by Arabs hidden among the dunes and was driven back to its boats with some loss and without accomplishing its mission. On the following day a column of all arms marched upon Zanzur, 13 miles west of Tripoli on the road near the shore. The small Turkish garrison, well served by its spies, had received warning of the attack and decamped before dawn, so that no fighting ensued and the Italian column returned to Tripoli. From Zanzur a line of telegraph runs to Gharian and consequently Zanzur has been a very convenient collecting and transmitting station for Turkish intelligence reports from Tripoli. The telegraph office and part of the line were destroyed by the Italians, but the new office on the line will serve Turkish ends almost equally well.

On 19th December a small mixed force 1,700 strong, consisting of three battalions, two mountain guns and a squadron, set out from Ain Zara under Colonel Fara to attack Bir Tobras, the re-occupation of which place by the Arabs must have been reported. Bir Tobras is a small oasis ten miles distant from Ain Zara on the track leading south-eastwards towards the Tarhuna Djebel. The column seems to have been badly guided and did not reach its objective till 10-30 A.M. when an attempt was made to surround the enemy, and the guns opened fire. But the Arabs, reported to be 3,000 strong, were found well posted in a good position and made a stout resistance, while parties of horse and foot began to outflank the Italian line. The Italian column, abandoning the initiative, concentrated and intrenched, and in this position was subjected to several attacks during the day and throughout the following night. At dawn the Arabs retired, and the Italians, forming square with their wounded in the centre, retired towards Ain Zara, meeting on their way back some reinforcements which had been sent after them, but had gone astray. In this fruitless enterprise the Italians suffered 84 casualties.

Only last week the writer ventured to remark that it was rare for a regular army to confront the difficulties and dangers of a desert campaign with impunity, and the episode of Bir Tobras will by this time have taught the same lesson to the Italians. It is also clear that valuable and indeed indispensable though aerial scouting is to an army to-day, it is still something of a fair-weather friend and does not at all diminish the need for mounted troops, an arm in which the Italian expedition is not strong. For a whole week at least the aeroplane officers have been defeated by the weather, and it was probably for this reason—namely, the absence of trustworthy information—that the Italian command sent 1,700 men to attack 3,000 in a good position.

Apart from the question of aerial scouting one must continue to entertain some scepticism concerning the success of Italian penetration into the interior, for it still appears to be true that no adequate preparations have been made for the equipment of desert columns. There are three courses open to a staff which contemplates operations in a more or less desert country like the Hinterland of Tripolitania and Cyrenaica. Any one of these courses, or a combination of the three, may be adopted, but an advance without principle and method is a real danger. A light railway may be laid down, or posts may be occupied on the chosen line of advance where supplies of water may be collected, or, lastly, camel transport may be employed. A light railway is indubitably the best means of all, but it takes time to construct, requires water in plenty at certain points and is not easily carried across a Djebel district like that which encircles the Tripoli plain on the south and south-east. The second course, namely, that of occupying and preparing posts also takes time, for tanks must be made and enough water collected not only for the permanent garrison, but for the operating column which will eventually advance step by step along the line of posts, while the posts themselves are liable to attack and must be strong.

The third course, namely, the use of camel transport, is apt to turn a staff officer's hair prematurely grey when he reckons up his wants. A camel cannot carry much over 320 lb. This means two fantases, each of which when filled with water weighs 160 lb. and has a capacity of 12 gallons. Men require not less than 2 gallons a day for all purposes, horses and mules 6 gallons a day, and camels 10 gallons every fourth day. There are only a few wells on the track from Ain Zara to Gharian, and the best of them—provided that they are not filled up by the enemy—are believed to afford water enough only for two or three battalions. At Gharian determined resistance may be encountered and the Italians may have to fight some 5,000 Turks, supported by a swarm of well-mounted and tolerably well-armed Arabs. Suppose that General Caneva decides to march on Gharian with 10,000 men, including four pack batteries and six squadrons of cavalry. Call it eight marches, including two days' fighting. Then ask a young friend at the Staff College to reckon up how many camels are required to carry water, food, ammunition, sick litters, and other paraphernalia for the force named for the operation in prospect, and see how far General Caneva is likely to be able to march with the 1,000 camels reported to be at his disposal.

The truth is that a desert is the most terrible of all theatres for the operations of a regular army. It was for this reason that Napoleon in his Commentaries (Vol. III., p. 16, Edition of 1867) placed deserts before great ranges of mountains and great rivers as the best frontiers for States, and he might also have placed them before the sea, which is in itself not an obstacle but a highway, as the frequent and successive invasions of Britain in old days proved to demonstration. When history is written it will be seen how that great soldier Lord Wolseley agreed with Napoleon's opinion and how deeply it affected his plans for the relief of Khartoum. We modern people who are so very wise, think it a fine thing to do to span the deserts which protect India by railways. So, no doubt, it is in a sense, and all the enemies of England will pat you on the back for saying it. But when armies have to be piled on armies to make up for the desert defence that we have rashly thrown away, we shall perhaps recall that all faults bring their own punishments, and none more surely than the neglect of principles laid down by the past masters of war.

All depends upon the manner and the principles upon which the Italian command proposes to conduct the campaign, and on this subject the evidence is not yet sufficiently complete for the formation of an opinion, but little advances followed by little retreats, such as have been carried out since the capture of Ain Zara, do not very much assist the Italian cause and, on the contrary, encourage the brave enemy, whose resistance to Italy must fill all Turks with pride. Italy has a great source of strength in the admirable patriotism and unity of her people at home, while the close and cordial manner in which her two fighting services have co-operated during the war merits unstinted praise. But neither force nor patriotism conquers a desert, which has to be tackled in the coldest of cold blood or may easily bring about the ruin of an army and a State. Fortunately for Italy, the Turks in this crisis of their history are all at loggerheads at home, and it is in the disunion of parties at Constantinople rather than in any other advantage that lies the best hope to Italy of a speedy issue from her African adventure.

Turkish Political Parties.

(The "Times", 28th December 1911.)

Yesterday the Turkish Chamber by the narrow majority of 107 votes to 99, accepted a motion supported by the Government for the postponement until Saturday of the debate on the proposed modification of Article 35 of the Constitution. Earlier in the day the inter-party Conference which has been endeavouring to arrange terms between the majority and the Opposition abruptly broke down. The Opposition, which now practically means the new Party of Union and Liberty formed at the end of last month, demanded guarantees from the adherents of the Committee of Union and Progress, who constitute the majority, that no attempt should be made to change Article 35 in the present session. It was the rejection of this demand which brought the Conference to an end. The attitude of both parties will be intelligible enough to readers who have followed our articles and telegrams on the internal affairs of Turkey for the last few weeks. Article 35 regulates the power of the Sovereign to bring about a dissolution of the Chamber. As it stands, it invests him with this power, but only with the assent of the Senate. Said Pasha, it is understood, desires to remove the restriction placed upon the exercise of the Sultan's prerogative by the provision which requires the consent of the Senate. It is also alleged, though with less assurance, that he wishes to have the Constitution so altered as to enable the Sovereign to suspend Parliamentary debates in time of war. The Committee of Union and Progress desire an early dissolution for reasons which will be well understood by the politicians of Continental countries. A dissolution must take place before very long, and they want their friends in the Ministry, and particularly in the Ministry of the Interior, to have the "making of the elections." If the modification were carried, Said would be able to dissolve at once. If, on the other hand, it is deferred for any considerable time the newly-formed Party of Union and Liberty may be able to "develop strength" in the American phrase, to perfect their organization, which is still weak, to shake the grip of the majority on the "machine," and to give play to the various influences which recently enabled them to wrest a seat in the capital from the followers of the Committee of Union and Progress.

The debate on Saturday promises to be of great interest and may be of great moment. Unless Said is supported by the Committee he must, of course, resign, but it is expected that this support will be given him in view of the electoral prospect, whatever doubts may be entertained of his personal devotion to constitutional principle, or of his agreement with the Committee on the prolongation of the war. Said, it is not forgotten, was in friendly relations with Abdul Hamid when Abdul "suspended" Turkey's last Constitution—a suspension which continued for some thirty years. As regards the war, he has already made it clear that he wishes to make peace with Italy, and that he believes it to be impossible for him to open negotiations while Parliament is sitting. At the Salonika Congress the leaders of the Committee took up the most uncompromising position on this subject. They decided unanimously that the cession of Tripoli in any circumstances is out of the question, and came forward as the champions of Islam in a Holy War. The war indeed enabled them to brush aside a good many professions which were beginning to prove highly inconvenient. The most dangerous kind of resistance which has threatened them has been that of the ultra-orthodox Muslims, to whom not a few of their liberal and enlightened doctrines were in the last degree suspect. By appearing as the unyielding defenders of the Faith against the Infidel, they silenced, if they did not satisfy, this group of their opponents. It will not be easy for them to draw back from this position now, even if they are anxious to do so. It seems, however, to be thought in Constantinople that the exigencies of the electoral situation will over-ride all other considerations and that Said may rely upon their support.

Even with this support he may have considerable difficulties to overcome. He must obtain a two-thirds vote of the Chamber twice over in order legally to effect the desired modifications of the Constitution. As his majority was no more than eight, a very large number of the Opposition Deputies will have to "find salvation" suddenly, if he is to attain his ends by Parliamentary action. Sudden changes of the kind have, however, been known in the Turkish Parliament on former occasions when the Committee were in real earnest to procure them and chose to exert their power. There are, moreover, as our Constantinople correspondent has pointed out, other means by which a dissolution might be procured. The Grand Vizier, so long as he has the Committee behind him, can apply to the Senate for their sanction to a dissolution; and should the Senate display reluctance to grant it, he can threaten to swamp the Upper House by advising the Sovereign to create a sufficient number of puppet Senators who will do the bidding of the Prime Minister. No fears seem to be entertained that the Committee, whose political principles are of the most advanced Liberal and democratic type, would be hurt by this arbitrary resort to the Prerogative. Indeed, it is one of the most remarkable and instructive features in the existing situation in Turkey that the most ardent advocates of Constitutional liberty and of the rights of man are fully prepared not only to strain, but to enlarge, the Prerogative in a most extravagant degree, in the confident expectation that they will be able to employ it for their own party ends. Liberals at home who feel shocked at this apparent violation of political principles on the part of the Committee of Union and Progress must in justice remember that constitutional methods are still in their infancy in Turkey, and that the public conscience has not yet learnt to value them at their true worth.

The Italians at Tripoli.

Having reduced the batteries on the 3rd, on the following day Admiral Faravelli landed a naval brigade on the west shore, in the vicinity of Gilgush. He still believed the town to be hostile, as early in the morning, when he had sent in a torpedo boat under a white flag, it had been fired upon from the Hamidieh Fort to the east of the harbour. This fort was again bombarded. As a matter of fact, as has already been made clear, the entire Turkish force except the few artillerymen had evacuated the town before the date of Faravelli's first bombardment.

THE LANDING AT TRIPOLI.

The Arabs of the oasis were not slow to profit by the evacuation, and on the evening of the 3rd and the morning of the 4th of October they poured into the town, and began to ransack the deserted public buildings. The barracks in the oasis, the gendarmerie post-houses, the arsenal, and Konak were gutted, and on the morning of the 4th the attitude of the looters became so threatening that it looked as if the bazaars and private property were about to be given over to pillage. The consular body, therefore, determined to invite the Italians to land. A white flag was hoisted over the Konak, and an invitation was sent on board the flagship to the Admiral to take over the town and save it from pillage. A further contingent of sailors was immediately landed, and Tripoli was occupied. In all, the fleet landed a naval brigade of 1,800 men, which was commanded by Captain Cagni, the associate of the Duke of Abruzzi in Arctic travel. Captain Cagni, having ascertained that the Turks had marched off into the desert by the Gharian road, established an outpost line that cut off about a third of the western end of the oasis. The main trace of this outpost line followed the fringe of the oasis where it met the desert, and included the pumping-station of Boumelliana which supplied much of the water for the town. Its left flank cut through the oasis just east of the quarter of Shara Shait, and the right flank, in open desert, was the group of earthworks already described as Gilgush (Sultaneh). It is necessary to enter into this detail here, as the position thus described, as established for less than 2,000 sailors, is practically the same trace that Italy holds to-day with two infantry divisions. It will be seen that the enclave enclosed by this outpost line was about four square miles of densely-inhabited palmgrove. The intricacies of this terram have already been described, and it will be well if the reader mark them in his mind, as it has an important bearing on the subsequent development of the occupation. The sailors had barely established their outposts before they were fired upon from the direction of the desert. At first it was thought that this was the work of marauding Arabs who had become inflamed by the pillage in the town. In reality it was the rearguard of Meshat Bey's army, or rather, of the force which he had left behind to keep contact with Tripoli and the invaders,—a touch which he has never relinquished. This rearguard became more insistent in its attacks, and the sailors were much disturbed by it, especially at night. On one occasion when the Turkish skirmishers pressed in to within 300 yards of the Boumelliana Wells, the warships anchored off the coast fired 12-inch shells into the desert for hours together, the result of which active defence was three Turks killed and one wounded by rifle-fire. The navy held Tripoli from the 4th to the 10th October. Towards the end of this period the sailors became very anxious, their information being that the enemy were preparing to advance to the attack, and they knew that they could not deny them the eastern end of the oasis if they chose to come and occupy it. On the 8th October the Admiral cabled to Rome for support so urgently, that two swift ocean-liners were immediately despatched from Naples with troops. These arrived at Tripoli early on the morning of the 11th, and the troops were at once disembarked and marched to relieve the weary sailors in the outpost line. The first troops to arrive were the devoted 11th Bersaglieri and the 40th Infantry.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE ARMY.

At day break on October 12th the Italian Armada in all its glory arrived from Naples. There were twenty-five large army transports that had been convoyed across the Mediterranean by two divisions of warships and a cloud of torpedo craft. As they steamed into the roadstead in the early light of an African morning they made a picture of suggested strength that was most impressive to the Arab onlookers, who had not yet quite recovered from the nerve-shattering effects of the bombardment. The army began to disembark at once. All this part of the Italian organisation was very thorough. The sappers were put ashore first. With them they had brought material for building piers and jetties. In a few minutes, it seemed these trestle landing stages were erected, and the army was landing in collapsible floats, towed ashore by the men-of-war's launches. The weather favoured the operations, and the army was landed in a remarkably short time. The fleet of transports was followed by a flotilla of Sicilian sailing-boats, loaded to the gunwale with forage. Having discharged their cargoes, these boats were also used to disembark the men and material.

The Italian army landed in very workmanlike shape. The rank and file, who were, from the nature of the mobilisation, picked men, were newly clad in the serviceable slate-grey uniform. They looked to be good soldiers and had all the appearance of being extraordinarily docile. The officers in the junior ranks were keen-looking fellows. They wore exceptionally well-cut breeches and tunics. In the senior ranks, perhaps, they were a little fatigued by age, and unsuited to the rough-and-tumble of an expedition into the desert. As the men were docile the discipline was good, and any professional soldier watching the landing of Caneva's army would have reported upon it as a useful and thorough-looking force of men. Peace calculations, however, only go a little way in estimating the true value of a fighting force.

General Caneva himself landed towards mid-day. His landing was accompanied by all the ceremony that is dear to the Latin's soul. Ships were dressed, and the guns of the fleet thundered the news to town and desert. Caneva himself is a small, stout man, with but little that is magnetic in his personality. He is an ex-cavalry officer, and looks less like a cavalryman than is usual in that smart service. He is from the Austrian provinces and has distinguished himself as an army commander during manoeuvres. His theory of chief-command is a mixture of the aloofness practised by the Japanese in the higher control of armies in the field, and the usual inertia that asserts itself with most Latins after they have reached a certain age. As far as his army is concerned, Caneva is a signature giving effect to army orders. A Latin soldiery requires something more in its generalissimo.

CIVIL MEASURES.

It must be immediately stated that the Italians had not the slightest idea of how the administration of an occupied territory should be carried out. The General Staff evidently believed in grandiloquent proclamations and the arrival of the army was signalled by the publication of several proclamations, some of which, if I mistake not, were plagiarisms from Prussian proclamations found in some history of the Franco-German War. The army of occupation started upon its adventure on the hypothesis that the Arabs were hostile to the Turks and friendly to Italy. Caneva spoke in his proclamations of the Turks as "our common enemy." Satisfied with this assumption, no effort was made to collect from the population ten to fifteen thousand stand of magazine rifles that it was known had been distributed to them from the hold of the Derna. No adequate measures were taken, either to police the town and its environment, or to picket the outlying villages and hamlets in the palm-groves.

A descendant of the house of Karawani was appointed as vice-governor of the town, and some Moslem as the mayor. With these measures the entire staff and army reposed a confidence in the Arab population which, though engaging enough in the simplicity that prompted it, was a culpable weakness in the stern path of war. For a time the Italian clemency prospered, and the rosiest reports were dispatched to Rome of the endearing attitude of the new Arab subjects. There was, however, to be a rude awakening.

THE OCCUPATION OF CYRENAICA.

The ease with which its troops had occupied Tripoli induced the Italian Government to proceed forthwith with the occupation of all the chief ports of the Tripolitaine coast. The procedure was much the same in each case; the fleet blundered up and fired shell into the obsolete Turkish defences, and then sailors and troops were put on shore. At Tobruk and Derna but little opposition, if any, was experienced, but at Benghazi and Khoms the local Turkish garrisons, helped by the Arabs, made strenuous resistance,—so much so that the Italian Government immediately became alarmed, and established a censorship of all news from Cyrenaica, in the hope of concealing the truth. The result of this rigid censorship was that half-truths leaked out, were embellished in the Arab gossip-chambers, and spread through the Tripolitaine as gospel information of Italian defeats. It will be seen later how this foolish repression of information helped the development of the Turkish plans. At Benghazi the small Turkish garrison had so organised the Arabs that they showed to the Italians a really stiff opposition, and the fleet had seriously to come into action to support the landing. The treacherous sea also added to the Italians' difficulties, and rose before the landing was completed, thereby placing the portion of the force already put ashore in a dangerous predicament. The overwhelming force that the Italians could bring to bear, however, was too much for any resistance, however brave and devoted, that the Turks and Arabs could bring against them. The opposition was driven back all along the coast line, but not before the Italians had suffered about 500 in casualties. In no case had the opposition been crushingly defeated, and the Arabs and Turks, though they had perforce to fall back, never lost touch with the Italians or ceased to harass them on every occasion.

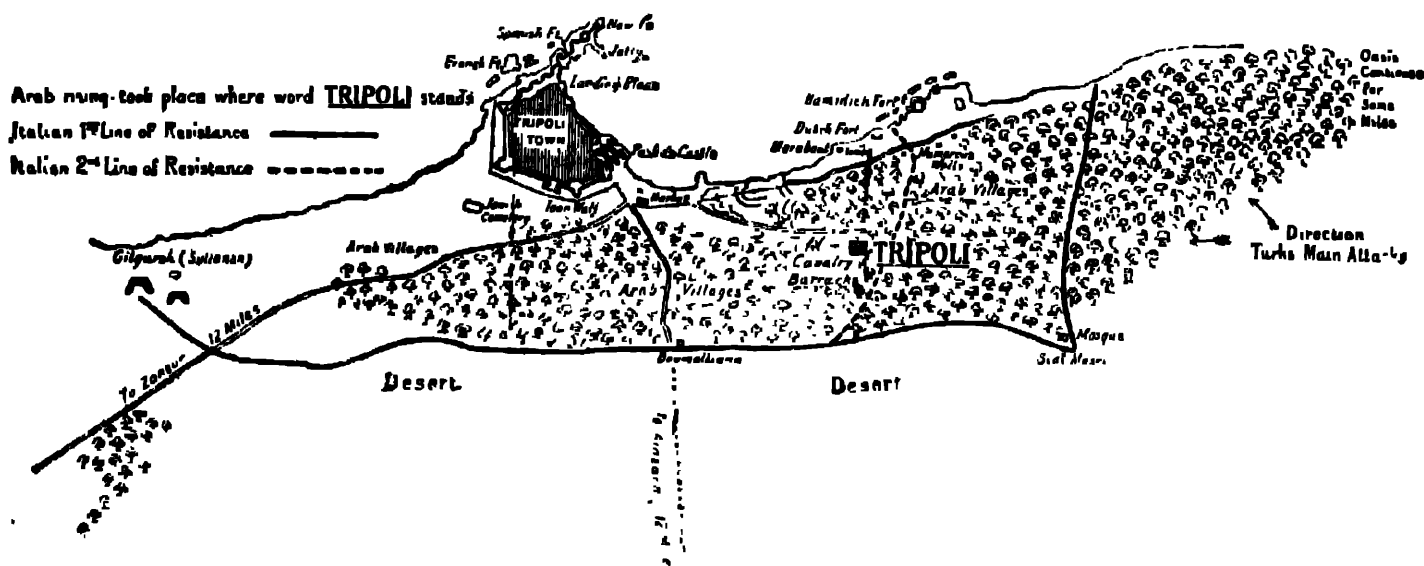

THE ITALIAN PLAN OF CAMPAIGN.

So far it will be seen that the Italian plans had failed signally in three essentials. They had hoped to have destroyed or captured

In the meantime the Turks had gained expert leaders from Europe, allies from the Bedouin and Berber tribes, and confidence from the Italian inaction and from the stories that were in circulation describing Italian defeats at Benghazi and Khoms. The Turks were in constant communication with their sympathisers in Tripoli. In fact, Turkish officers disguised as Arabs were seen constantly in the town by those who had no wish to betray their presence to the Italians. It was arranged that a great combined attack by every rifle that the Turks could bring against the position should be made on the appearance of the new moon, and that while this attack was being pressed home the Arabs in the town and oasis should rise and take the Italian positions in the rear. It was a pretty plan, and it came within an ace of being successful.

THE ARAB RISING

From October 20 it was generally apparent that the Turks intended aggression. The aeroplane scouts reported groups of Turks and Arabs in "thousands" at the oasis of Zanzur, twelve miles south-west of Tripoli; at Ainzara, about equidistant to the south, and again at the oasis of Azizia, still farther south of Ainzara. Instead of profiting by this information and advancing to destroy these Turkish forces in detail, the Italians awaited developments in their trenches. On the morning of the 23rd of October the Turks discovered that two-thirds of the Tripoli oasis was open to them. They demonstrated along the entire front of the Italian position, and pushed up a strong posse of Arabs into the eastern extremity of the home oasis. Working along this cover, these Arabs were able to approach to within a few yards of the trenches which three companies of the 11th Bersaglieri had cut across the palm-grove. When building their defences on this flank, the Italians had failed to clear a field of fire to their front. Their line of resistance just cut obliquely through the intricate cover of the palm-grove. Walls, cacti, fig-trees, and olive-groves unmasked the enemy until they were within a few feet of the Bersaglieri trenches. Discovering the Turkish squadron between Beirut and the Dardanelles, they had been positive that the Arabs would not view the occupation in hostile spirit; and they had believed that the Porte, when they perceived that the blow was struck, would have accepted what the Italians were pleased to term "the inevitable." None of these things had come to pass. The Turkish fleet had escaped, the Arabs at Benghazi had made common cause with the Turks; and the Porte had politely told Italy "to do its damndest," but that it would not relinquish its sovereign rights over Tripoli. The original plan under which the expeditionary force had been despatched simply contemplated the occupation of the seaport towns. There the troops would await the surrender of the Turkish troops, or their shipment to Turkey with the honours of war. After this Italy proposed to "buy" the inland sheikhs in the usual way, and proceed slowly with the occupation of the hinterland.

The expeditionary force at Tripoli was therefore very astonished when accurate information arrived that the Turkish force, augmented by some thousands of Arabs, was marching towards Tripoli. General Recorti-Girardi, who commanded the 1st Division, had with very slight modifications accepted the line of resistance which the navy had bequeathed to him. The various units had constructed field-works, and the field and mountain artillery had been distributed at intervals along the line. For the rest, little else had been done in the way of military precautions. Except for daily excursions by the intrepid officers of the air-service, practically no trouble was taken concerning the Turkish force in the desert. No forward positions were held to keep the Turks at arm's length and no precautions were employed to keep the unoccupied portion of the Tripoli oasis inviolate. The cavalry were never out in front of the army.

this advantage, the hot-headed Arabs could not restrain from attacking at once. What Neshat Bey intended as a reconnaissance became in the actual oasis a combat d'outrance. So fierce was the onslaught that a few of the Arabs succeeded in breaking through the Italian lines.

It had been arranged through the emissaries that the Turks had sent into the town, that when the Turkish force attacked in earnest, the Arabs of the oasis should rise behind the Italian lines and join in the discomfiture of the invaders. The Arabs of the quarter immediately behind the Bersaglieri lines, not unnaturally, when they saw among them their wild-eyed compatriots who had just broken through the lines, thought that the moment for action had arrived. They snatched their rifles from their hiding places and opened fire upon every Italian they saw. When dealing with such inflammable material as Arabs who have been hourly expecting to be let loose with arms, it does not take long for an outburst to gather way. In a few minutes a cloud of Arabs were attacking the Bersaglieri in the rear. So unprepared were the Bersaglieri for such a development, that the officers believed the attack from their rear to be a mistake on the part of friendly Arabs, and for a time they restrained their men from answering to it. Then the full significance of their awful predicament burst upon them, and they fell in their devoted men back to back. It may be said of the two flank companies of the 11th Bersaglieri, in the words of the historian, that they ceased to exist.

In the meantime the rising had spread, and the whole intervening country between the Bersaglieri front and the town was alive with armed Arabs, who shot every uniformed Italian on sight. The roads running from the town to the outposts were naturally full of men on various fatigues connected with supply, and these unsuspecting escorts were the first victims. Luckily the mounted Carabinieri had just arrived from Italy. They were occupied in the suburbs partitioning their spheres of control when the rising began. They were able to hold the ends of the streets that radiate from the town into the villages. Being a force used to sudden emergencies, they kept their heads, and prevented any considerable contingent of the armed Arabs making an entry into the bazaars, or the town Arabs from joining their friends outside.

THE PANIC

The rising was so sudden and unexpected that it was impossible completely to ring the town before some of the wilder spirits made their way into it. The Italians say that the rising was inaugurated by shots fired from a house in town where Turkish subjects awaiting expulsion were living. Be this as it may, about midday the shooting had communicated itself to the town, and there ensued an hour of frightful panic. The Christians of the Levant, especially those who dwell under the Star and Crescent, are particularly liable to panic. They live always with the fear of massacre upon them. The Christian and Jewish population of Tripoli is no exception to this rule. The cry went up of "The Arabs are in the town!" In a moment there was a wild rush for the consulates, for the boats, for any building that offered the suggestion of an asylum. The panic was augmented by the circumstance that the market square was filled with camelmen in the service of the invaders. As shots from the Moslem graveyard fell in the market square, the camelmen, feeling no doubt that they and their animals were forfeit in the eyes of Turks or Bedouin, drove their animals into the narrow alleys of the town. This added to the block and terror, to be immediately intensified by the excited action of the Italian soldiery. Men working at the wharves, hospital orderlies, and the guards from the various public buildings, knowing nothing of what had caused the panic, unslinging their rifles, rushed into the streets, and in many cases began to shoot. It was during this turmoil that many Arab knives slipped out and struck down the uniformed Italians in the open highway, thereby showing how prepared the Arabs were to be hostile, and how much the Italians had been saved by this premature unmasking of the real feelings of the Arab population. It was about an hour before the panic subsided, or rather before every one had found shelter behind locked doors, except the troops that had taken possession of the streets. In the immediate suburbs, however, desultory firing continued until well into the night.

Desperate things, however, had been happening in the oasis, where the line of the Bersaglieri had been broken. The 8ard Infantry carried on the Italian line from the right of the Bersaglieri, and owing to the demonstration made by the Turks along the entire Italian front, the reserves of this regiment had been pushed forward in readiness. As soon as it was realised what had really come to pass in the rear of the Bersaglieri, some one suggested to the Colonel commanding these reserves that he should sweep through the hamlets concerned and re-establish the left of the line. This he proceeded to do, and the few armed Arabs that were menacing the approaches to the town were driven eastwards along the oasis. The bulk of risen Arabs were engaged in the massacre of the two flank companies of the Bersaglieri, and the 8ard drove them into the unoccupied portion of the oasis across the mutilated bodies of their own unfortunate comrades.

THE REPRISALS

It is no exaggeration to say that events of October 23 shocked the Italian army of occupation from top to bottom. The rising had come as a bolt from the blue. The terrible losses of the Bersaglieri; the massacre of unfortunates caught in the cactus alleys; and the general hopelessness bred of inactivity, had an evil effect upon an army that had started the campaign with "a skeleton in its cupboard." The army looked upon its dead and apprehended disaster. All the lurid legends of Abyssinia, that it had heard from childhood, came back to it as facts in war about to be repeated. There was only one military measure that Caneva could order. He had the prospect of an immediate attack by the entire force that Neshat Bey could bring against him. He had been reminded, rudely enough, that there were seven to ten thousand Turkish rifles still in the hands of the Tripoli Arabs that might be turned against his soldiers' backs. It was, therefore, imperative that the oasis, as far as the Italians held it, should be cleared of Arabs, and that reprisals should be taken against those villages in the oasis in which the rising had occurred. No military commander would have been justified in doing less. The orders were issued, therefore, that the oasis should be immediately cleared, and that all male Arabs found with arms in their hands, or who were shown, from circumstantial or other evidence, to have been implicated in the rising, should be summarily executed. The orders were sufficiently lax and general to permit of a sharp and salutary lesson, as the Arabs had already been warned by proclamation that the possession of a rifle would be considered a capital offence. Caneva and his Staff, however, had not calculated upon what this order meant to troops that had just seen their mutilated dead, who believed that they were again about to be attacked treacherously in the rear, and who had ever over them the shadow of Adowa. The carrying out of the duty necessitated the breaking up of the troops into small detachments, which loosed the control upon the inflamed passions of the soldiery. Nor did the Staff know how or when to place a period upon the license they thus gave the troops. The result was a retribution upon the Arabs which will live in the memory of the Tripolitans for generations, and which will react for many a year upon the perpetrators themselves. It is not desirable here to go into the details of the days of bloodshed that swept through the Italian portion of the oasis. War is horrid and merciless, and its horror and mercilessness is intensified when killing is done by men actuated by terror. This much, however, should be said in favour of the Italians before this page be turned,—many foreign journalists have used the incident of these military reprisals as a means to sell their own sordid wares, a practice to the mind of the soldier far more reprehensible than fitting the punishment to the military crime of treachery.

THE REAL ATTACK.

The real attack by the Turks was made three days after the demonstration, and when the enceinte of palm-groves was practically clear of Arabs. In the early morning Turkish shrapnel began to burst above the date-palms, and certain attacking troops threatened from the desert front. The main attack, however, was reserved for the left flank. The Turkish commander had discovered the vulnerability of the Italians' left and the military value of that portion of the Tripoli oasis the Italians could not hold. Here Neshat Bey had massed the majority of his fighting men who were now augmented by a considerable number of the Tripoli Arabs. The latter naturally enough, after the rising, had preferred the cover of the oasis to the scant security behind the Italians' lines. Again was the weakness of the measures of defence on this front demonstrated. The Arabs and Turks were again able to approach under cover of the groves to within a few feet of the trenches, which had now been taken over by other companies of Bersaglieri. Twice in the same morning the attack was upon the point of overwhelming the defence. The Bersaglieri, however, fought with the greatest courage, and though the Italian field-gunners were driven from the pieces they were serving in the trenches, the Bersaglieri swept the exultant attackers back into the palm-trees with levelled bayonets. For three hours a bloody contest hung in the balance, until the arrival of the reserves at last decided the day. The price of victory, however, had been high—so high that the staff at last awoke to the danger of this oasis. Instead of bringing up a brigade and clearing the oasis with the bayonet for good and all, as they might easily have done that afternoon, they decided to contract their front on this flank and retire the line about a mile while they cabled to Italy for another infantry division. In the circumstances these were about the two worst military measures that could have been undertaken. The first had a still further depressing effect upon the troops, and gave opportunity to the Turkish commander to report sensational victories to Stamboul. The second will only swell the tale of sickness which must be the lot of this great Italian army cooped up in Tripoli.

THE PRESENT POSITION IN TRIPOLI.

Up to the moment of writing there is no information that, with the arrival of the 3rd Division at Tripoli, any serious effort has been made to clear that portion of the home oasis where the Turks ensconced themselves after the 23rd October. Beyond re-establishing the line which the 11th Bersaglieri originally held in the oasis, there is no information of the forward move. In fact, General Caneva is reported to have stated that no operations into the interior are in contemplation until the spring. This we can readily understand, since the Italian army is not supplied with a Transport to advance inland with a small force, and yet being without the means of supporting an advance with sufficient numbers to ensure the defeat of its enterprising enemy. In a sentence, Italy does not know what surprises the hinterland of Tripoli has in store for her, and she is very diffident about the best way of finding out. In short, every calculation that Italian statesmen made when they decided to engage upon this Tripoli adventure has miscarried. Italy now threatens to carry the war into the Aegean waters, and almost shamefacedly suggests that the Powers should intervene to prevent the extension of the zone of operation into Europe. This, however, is Italy's own funeral. It is only a month ago that Italy would have nothing to say to suggested mediation. Then she thought that she could compel the Ottoman Government "to give her best." She has found that the Ottoman Government, instead of "accepting the inevitable," is perfectly content that Italy should pour out her money like water, and undermine her own social structures by unrealised ambitions. Turkey will reply to the bombardment or blockade of any of her Anatolian or European ports by the expulsion of the 50,000 Italian subjects to whom she still owes her hospitality. What Turkey should really hope is that Italy will be driven to land an army either in Asia or Macedonia. For as sure as she does this she will pay Turkey a War indemnity.

recalled from Switzerland. It is reported that three Dublin regiments will reinforce those at Belfast. The moderate Unionists say they will be content to withdraw their forces if Mr. Churchill is compelled to hold the meeting under military protection but the extremists insist on resistance no matter at what cost.

Sir Edward Carson speaking at Liverpool said that Government after a long series of provocations has thrown down to Ulster loyalists a challenge which would be taken up. The Unionist Council would have been false to their position if they had adopted any other policy in the face of Government's deliberate scheme to provoke disorder or cover Ulster with contempt. Even if it cost great suffering they were determined to see the matter through.

The Belfast Corporation has agreed to let Ulster Hall to the Unionists on 7th February night prior to Mr. Churchill's speech.

It is the Unionist plan to remain in possession of Ulster Hall from 7th February to 8th February.

Unionists are elated at the manoeuvre to secure the hall. They point out that spacious rooms and kitchens of the hall will make the position of the force holding it not too uncomfortable. An audience of picked men is pledged to hold it against all comers and to barricade the entrances.

Anti-Home Rule campaign is proceeding in Lancashire and Cheshire. Sir Edward Carson, Messrs. Walter Long, F. E. Smith and Lord Willoughby de Broke, are the chief speakers.

Addressing a meeting at Manchester, Sir E. Carson announced that he was going straight to Belfast, but with no light heart. He was going on a grave mission for his fellow-countrymen.

Mr. Hobhouse, speaking at Bristol, said that in view of the language of Conservative leaders in the Lancashire campaign, Government was bound to regard threats of violence and of outbreaks seriously.

The Liberal press call on Mr. Bonar Law and Mr. Austen Chamberlain, either to denounce the policy of violence or to accept responsibility for it.

A manifesto issued by Ulster Liberals denies that Mr. Churchill's meeting is a Nationalist gathering. It is wholly Liberal and almost exclusively Protestant. They are determined to hold the meeting despite all forces of lawlessness and disorder. Should rioting ensue, the responsibility will be solely with the Unionist Councils.

Colonel Wallace, Grand Master of Orangemen, says they will stick at nothing to demonstrate that Ulster will fight or die for its liberties.

The resignation of Mr. Percival Hughes, Chief Conservative Agent, has been unexpectedly announced.

The Week.

Home Rule.

Speaking about Home Rule Sir Edward Grey said Home Rule must be passed even if the Irish themselves do not wish in order to relieve the congestion of the Imperial Parliament and unify the Empire. Referring to the agitation now going on in Belfast, Sir Edward said that the affairs of the Empire could not be sacrificed to the opinion of Ulster.

It has been arranged to run excursions for Orangemen from all parts of Ulster to Belfast on the day of Mr. Churchill's arrival. The Nationalists state that they may bring a monster contingent of ancient Hibernians from Dublin to check the Orangemen.

The Ulster Guardian, a Liberal paper, demands the arrest of Lord Londonderry, Captain Craig, and others on a charge of treason.

Meetings of Unionists and Liberals are being held in Belfast to make preparations for the demonstrations on the occasion of the meeting to be addressed by Mr. Churchill. The Lord Mayor intimates that he personally is opposed to the suggestion that the meeting be cancelled. The Police are enquiring into the situation.

The Orangemen have decided that a solid wall of a hundred thousand men shall surround Ulster Hall and easily and peacefully prevent Mr. Churchill from speaking so long as the military are not present. The Officer Commanding the district, however, has been

China.

Reuter wires from New York :—The Board of Foreign Missions has received a telegram from Shanghai declaring that two and-a-half million people are famine-stricken and that relief is urgently needed. The telegram appeals for at least a million dollars.

Commenting on the fresh difficulty in China owing to the telegram from Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen to Yuan-Shi-Kai to establish a republic, the Times describes the telegram as injudicious and insulting unless Yuan-Shi-Kai has shown bad faith towards the reformers of which there has hitherto been no evidence. The Times adds that absence of such evidence makes the conduct of the Nan-king party appear inexcusable when the reformers have the republic within their grasp. The Times fears that they have imperilled the peaceful attainment of their ends and exposed the country to the most serious dangers within and without.

Reuter wired from Shanghai :—The Republicans who need funds to pay the army demand that the China Merchants' Navigation Company pay ten million taels; otherwise the ships will be commandeered and sold. The Directors have asked for time to consult the shareholders.

The situation in China is complicated by Dr Sun Yat Sen's open distrust of Yuan Shi Kai whom he believes to be overmuch influenced by the Dowager-Empress and the younger Manchu Prince, who now seem to favour immediate hostilities in preference to abdication. Yuan Shi Kai is surrounded by powerful enemies and keeps a large bodyguard.

Mesopotamia.

Reuter understands that fresh delay has arisen in connection with Sir William Willcock's scheme of irrigation in Mesopotamia. The Turkish Government is considering the advisability of spreading the work over a longer period, undertaking at present only a third part of the scheme.

The London Mosque.

Mr Ameer Ali, in an interview with a representative of the Morning Post on the subject of a mosque in London, said it would cost a hundred thousand sterling to erect a mosque on the lines proposed. A large sum had already been subscribed. The site contemplated was in South Belgravia.

All India Moslem League.

It is now decided that the All-India Moslem League should hold its next annual session in Calcutta and that His Highness the Aga Khan should preside. The dates fixed are March 3rd and 4th March. A record attendance is expected in view of the importance of the question in connection with the administrative changes in Bengal and Behar which are to be discussed.

Bengal's Governor.

The following Press Communiqué was issued: "It is His Majesty's gracious intention, after the completion of the necessary preliminaries, to appoint Sir Thomas Gibson-Carmichael, Bart., C.C.I.E., K.C.M.G., Governor of Madras, to be Governor of the Presidency of Bengal."

Home Member.

Sir Reginald Craddock, the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces and Berar, made over charge of his office on the 25th instant and immediately proceeded to Calcutta as Home Member of the Viceroy's Council in succession to Sir John Jenkins.

Chief Commissioner of Assam.

Sir Archdale Harle has been offered and has accepted the Chief Commissionership of Assam. Nothing has been settled as to his successor as Home Secretary, but Mr. E. A. Gait is mentioned as the likely nominee.

The Announcement.

The Committee of Management of the Central National Muhammadan Association of Calcutta held a meeting on the 21st January and passed the following:—

The Committee considered the present Muhammadan situation in Bengal arising from the modification of Partition and the creation of a Governorship for Bengal. Mr. Sultan Ahmad, Barrister-at-Law, opened the discussion by proposing that a representation should at once be submitted by this Association to the Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department, and to the Private Secretary to His Excellency the Viceroy, urging the adoption of the following remedial measures for safe-guarding Muhammadan interests in Bengal by reason of the modification of Partition.

(a) That at least half of the Indian Members on the Bengal Governor's Legislative Council should always be Muhammadans, in view of the Muhammadan population in United Bengal exceeding the Hindu population by at least two millions.

(b) That Indian Members on the Bengal Governor's Executive Council should be alternately a Hindu and a Muhammadan.

(c) That on District Boards and Local Boards and Municipalities the number of Moslem and Hindu representatives should always be in proportion to the numerical strength of the Muhammadan and Hindu populations respectively.

(d) That the distribution of State Patronage for the whole Province of Bengal should be regulated by the same standard of population, and half of the appointments open to Indians allotted to the Mussalmans and half to the Hindus.

(e) That the allotment of the Provincial Grant for education in Bengal should be separately made in equal shares for Muhammadans and Hindus respectively.

(f) That the District Board and Municipal allotments for education should be divided amongst Hindus and Muhammadans according to their respective numerical strength in each District and under each Municipality.

After a good deal of discussion the proposal was unanimously carried.

TETE À TETE

THAT His Highness the Aga Khan's ancestors first came to Sindh is a matter of history, but it may not be generally known that His Highness was himself born in Sindh. That province—for in nothing else but name and an administrative connection with the Government of Bombay is it part of the Presidency of Bombay—naturally retains a corner of the Aga Khan's heart all for itself, and now that he is in India, he visited once more the place of his birth. The Sindh Muhammadan Association, led by Mir Ayub Khan Sahib, Barrister-at-law, of the royal family of Las Bela, and Khan Bahadur Shaikh Sadik Ali Sahib, Vizier of Khairpur, presented an address of welcome to His Highness and recounted his great services to India in general and to the Mussalmans in particular. The address of the Association is a document which could well be used as a model for addresses of welcome. It gave to the Aga Khan an opportunity not only of thanking his Sindh brethren for their appreciation of his services, but also of giving them excellent advice. His Highness is, however, too refined and cultured a leader to talk from a height. He concluded his speech with this apology: "Gentlemen, excuse me for offering advice to the Muhammadans of Sindh, because it is never a pleasant duty to advise. Still I felt it my duty to do so: and if I had not done so I should have felt that I was a very, very bad Sindh indeed." Although we had published a telegraphic summary of his speech in our last issue, we reproduce in this both the address of the Sindh Association and His Highness's reply, not only because the speech of His Highness deserves the consideration of Mussalmans and others all over India, but also because a vile attempt has been made by an Anglo-Indian paper to prejudice people against so brilliant, cultured and distinguished a leader of the Mussalmans of India. With reference to His Highness's deep regret that "practically the only province where the Mussalmans are in a clear majority" should have no Moslem League and, that "no effort should have been made to give the people here political education which will ultimately be a source of strength not only to the Government but lead to the making of a single nation of Hindus and Mussalmans," the Sindh Gazette pours out phials of gall, and in a note headed "The Aga Khan's Pretensions," writes that "the insidious undercurrent of thought discernible behind this expression of a pious sentiment gives colour to the impression which has been steadily growing among the more statesmanlike of the Muhammadan leaders that the Aga Khan is not entirely a true representative of Islamic opinion. The text of the adulatory address of the Sindh Muhammadan Association suggests that local Muhammadans have no suspicion as to the state of the Moslem mind elsewhere in India." The utter imbecility and fatuousness of this statement would excite ridicule or pity if "the insidious undercurrent of thought discernible behind this expression" of stupidity did not give colour to "the impression which has been steadily growing among the more statesmanlike Muhammadan leaders" that such papers as the Pioneer and its Sindh prototype are anxious to use the Mussalmans only as the catpaw of the narrowest of the bureaucrats. It is a matter of great curiosity to us to know where such journals gather their knowledge of Indian thought and feeling. Confined within the still very narrow pale of Anglo-Indian society, what chance have they to learn the inmost thoughts of our countrymen? That being the case, is it any wonder that we fail to discern the features of the Sindh Gazette's informant in that remarkably vague description, "the more statesmanlike Muhammadan leaders" and if we still grope in the dark in our effort to find the geographical situation of "elsewhere"—a locality where "the more statesmanlike" and "is supposed to be quite the reverse of the"?

BUT we must let the Sindh Gazette unfold its pretty tale a little longer. It writes: "From Cairo to Bokhara every Muhammadan city can point religious leaders who in Moslem estimation are greater and more distinguished and, we may add, more revered than he. The Aga Khan in fact seems to be presuming without sufficient authority to proclaim a lead in religious politics such as few Muhammadans of the dominant classes exhibit any readiness to follow." We must admire the bold irrelevance of this statement no less than the broad sweep "from Cairo to Bokhara." We have no doubt that there are many distinguished and revered Moslem divines in all that wide expanse of God's earth, and we may add that they included the great Kazim-i-Khorasani of Nejed, who died suddenly—a victim of some treachery most likely—just as he was setting out with 700 other divines to preach resistance to the aggressions of a "friendly power," and Saqatul-Islam of Tabriz, who was executed on the anniversary of the world's greatest tragedy by "our ally." But what has all this to do with the Aga Khan? Surely neither the Moslem League nor the Aligarh College and the Moslem University of the future can be considered such institutions as to clothe the personality of their President or champion with the sanctity of a high priest. Who ever thought that by following the Aga Khan's lead in politics or availing himself of the Aga Khan's generosity and enthusiasm in the cause of Moslem education, he necessarily became a religious disciple of the Imam-i-Hazir of the Ismailis, that the Sindh Gazette should write "Until His Highness makes a clearer avowal of his aims and advances stronger proof that those aims are in no way detrimental to the strength and integrity of Islamic hopes, he cannot properly be said without qualification to be either the leader or the exponent of any Muhammadan thought except that of the Khojahs." We doubt if any Mussalman would be so foolish as to regard this Anglo-Indian journal as the Defender of the Faith and Champion of Islamic Orthodoxy. But should one be so foolish, the perusal of the last sentence in this remarkable mixture of cunning and stupidity would at once dispel the illusion. It writes: "In particular His Highness might with advantage explain why he should come to a province more conspicuously loyal and law-abiding than any other in India, to reproach Muhammadans for their 'political' backwardness at a time when the identical slur is being cast upon them by the Indian National Congress, and why he should urge, under colour of promoting inter-racial amity, a fusion of nationalities such as every unrestful non-Muhammadan politician is for ever preaching into Muhammadan ears. Not so taught the late Sir Syed Ahmed." So, it is not orthodoxy in religion so much as orthodoxy in political "catpawism" and communal dissensions that lies near to the heart of the Sindh Gazette. The speech of the Aga Khan is the best comment on this contemptible statement, and we credit the Mussalmans with more good sense than to believe they need from us any elaborate refutation of such atrocious writing. The one virtue which the Mussalman need to develop more than another at the present moment is self-reliance. This must be the advice of all friends of the Mussalmans and the bête noire of all their misleaders. This, also, was the firm and solid bed-rock on which that lion-hearted Mussalman, Syed Ahmed Khan, laid the foundation of his great fabric. He had proved his loyalty to the Government in a manner which it is not easily possible for others to copy to-day, for we hope the tragic times of the Mutiny would never return. But he had also proved then and since then his courage in a manner that is equally difficult to imitate. We doubt not that the Aga Khan is just as loyal at heart. But if this gifted successor of Syed Ahmed Khan is half as courageous, he is a bold man indeed. We trust he is, and let the Mussalmans thank Allah that he is so, the croaking of the Sindh Gazette notwithstanding. We challenge anyone to say he is a more devoted worshipper of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan than ourselves, and we shall yield to few in the matter of a close intimacy with his policy and his work. But we must confess we shudder when we hear any Englishman in these days admire that work and praise that policy, for our sad experience makes us anticipate some extremely reactionary advice to the Mussalmans, and we fear the bones of that most progressive of men must tremble even more violently under his green grave.

IT HAS become nauseating to us to have to write week after week how much we would like to see the Hindus and the Mussalmans united. Such a desire appears to us to be too natural and normal to need a reiteration. But many of our contemporaries are not of the same mind, and their repetition of such sentiments produces some suspicion that after all the Persian epigram may be true.

حلف خوردی دروغ بگفتی
(You said it once and I believed it. You repeated it and I began to doubt. You took an oath on it and I believed it to be a lie.)

To our mind the best way of convincing people is to act, not to talk, and it is here that the "masterly inactivity" of some eloquent patriots betrays them. In a recent issue the Leader offers some remarks about the speculation which is said to be rife in Madras about the likely successor of the late Mr. Krishnaswamy Iyer, and then gives a list of five "talented and trusted men for His Excellency to choose from," not one of whom happens to be a Mussalman. That is not so very strange, considering the Moslem population of Madras, but we have been led to believe that irrespective of caste and creed, Madras has "trusted," a "talented" gentleman to represent it in the Viceroy's Council, and the omission of his name from a fairly long list is surprising. Surely it could not be said that he was not even "partially worthy of our lamented friend" Mr. Krishnaswamy Iyer, a qualification that would seem to satisfy the Leader's sense of the fitness of things. But we do not wish to dwell long on such personalities. What has led us to write at all on the subject is the remark of the Leader that Mr. Krishnaswamy's appointment and that of Mr. S. P. Sinha "were the happiest that were made, as was that of Sir K. G. Gupta to the India Council, an acknowledgment that cannot so easily be made of the other appointments either to the Executive Council in India or the Secretary of State's Council in London." Our contemporary is quite welcome to its own opinions and it has every right to air them. But after four appointments made to the Provincial Executive Councils, not one of which fell to a Mussalman, it may seem as if the names of Mussalmans have been so rigorously excluded by the Leader not only from the list of eligible candidates for Madras but also from the list of satisfactory selections elsewhere in the past with a view to bar out Moslem candidates for the posts in Madras and Behar. It is indeed a strange sign of rapprochement, and if birds can be caught with such chaff, well-meant, of course, for grain, we hope to see in the near future many Mussalmans in the Congress dove-cote.

AN NAMEH must now be under consideration for the membership of Councils in Madras and Behar, we think it right to advance the claims not of particular individuals, as some of our contemporaries have done, but of a class that eminently deserves recognition both in the interests of the people and their rulers. Although there is no statutory reservation of that nature, we believe, and it is generally hoped, that one member of every Provincial Executive Council would be an Indian. But by some curious process of reasoning, it is assumed that the Indian who may be selected for such posts must not be an official. This, we must say, is not only an erroneous but also a mischievous notion. The whole raison d'être of throwing open these appointments to Indians is that no community of His Majesty's subjects may consider itself debarred from posts of trust and responsibility, and when Lord Minto recommended an Indian for the post of the Law Member for the first time, and thereafter recommended other Indians for the Councils of the Governors of Bombay and Madras, and Lord Morley accepted his recommendations, they did so in order to vindicate the sanctity of India's Charters of Rights according to which neither caste nor colour, race nor religion, could debar any of His Majesty's subjects from the highest offices of State. The appointments of Indians made to the India Council, which is a consultative rather than an executive body, were made, to some extent at least, in order to give access to Indian views to the Secretary of State for India, and have a somewhat representative character. But although the desire to have the Indian point of view represented in the Viceroy's Executive Council was not wholly absent from the minds of Lord Minto and Lord Morley, it was certainly not the guiding consideration, which was the recognition of merit irrespective of race and religion. The result of this translation of a time-honoured theory into rather startling practice was that it served to vitalise the youth and manhood of India which had hitherto been dwarfed by a practical denial of the rights conferred on Indians by the Act of 1833 and the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, confirmed as they were by the Proclamation of His late Majesty King Edward VII. In England every young lawyer when he is called to the Bar can promise himself a seat on the Woolsack, and every budding politician can look forward to a portfolio in the British Cabinet, just as in the days of Napoleon every young soldier metaphorically carried a Field Marshal's baton in his knapsack. The appointment of Mr. S. P. Sinha to the Viceroy's Executive Council for the first time made something like this possible in India. Every hopeful young Deputy Collector as well as Barrister could dream of a reversionary interest in a Membership of the Executive Council, and those who can look ahead and take a broad view of things can well understand how this feeling tended to broaden the outlook and improve the work of officials and non-officials among our countrymen. But if it is now to be understood that it is only the non-official Indian who can look forward to posts of such responsibility and trust, the disappointment that would thereby result would be tremendous, and we shall go back to the past with its dwarfed ambitions and hopeless drudgery. That would result in a reversion to the very undesirable state of affairs out of which we had just seemed to have emerged, that is, a reward of Anglo-Indian merit in the official world side by side with a neglect of Indian merit merely on racial grounds. This, we feel sure, no patriotic Indian would desire. It may be argued that an official brings a jaundiced eye to view the vital concerns of the people. But what is in reality an accident of Anglo-Indian rule in India must not be confounded with a principle of universal application. Throughout Europe the highest posts in the administration are open to officials and in fact monopolized by them, and in England itself, which has a Parliamentary system unlike anything we have yet secured in India, all but a few posts in the Cabinet or connected therewith are the perquisites of permanent officials. Before we have secured such a system in India, to reserve all posts for the Anglo-Indian official to the exclusion of the Indian, barring a single Membership in every Executive Council, which itself shall be earmarked for a non-official Indian, is not only putting the cart before the horse, but treating the Indian official with unmitigated injustice. It must also be remembered that hitherto the best Indian talent has almost always gone in for Government service rather than for more independent careers. India is still the land of the Services rather than of Professions. Under these circumstances it is wholly indefensible to close the doors of the Executive Councils to the more talented Indian official, whether a member of the Indian Civil Service or the Provincial Service, while leaving it ajar to the generally less talented Indian who sought an entrance in the wider avenues of the English or the Indian Bar. If this is done, it may become possible for an unsuccessful Indian candidate in the Open Competition for the Indian Civil Service to be called to the Bar, to achieve some notoriety on the public platform or in the Press, and, by dint of sheer canvassing, to obtain a seat in the Legislature, and from that coign of vantage secure a place in the Executive Council, to the prejudice of the successful Indian candidate in the same examination. We do not for a moment suggest that non-official Indians should be deprived of an opportunity of securing such appointments, and in fact at present, when there are not many Indian officials sufficiently high up in the Service to compete successfully with their European brother officers, it will be necessary in many cases to recruit for these posts from the ranks of the non-officials. But other things being equal, we are strongly of opinion that preference should be given to an official whose arduous labours merit the same recognition as falls to the lot of his European comrades, and whose intimate knowledge of administrative difficulties as well as administrative experience makes him a more suitable as well as a more effective coadjutor to the latter. After all the jaundice is not the result of experience but of the social aloofness of the English. Had this not been the case nobody would have suggested such an unnatural course as is now pursued, viz., the compulsory retirement of a man of ripe experience in order to keep him away from the highest posts in the land, and to make them the monopoly of the raw, the ripe, or the rotten, as the case may be, but in all cases of one that has no previous knowledge of the country and its problems.

NO NEWS seems to be coming from Persia since we were solemnly assured that the Persian Cabinet had accepted all the three demands of Russia, including the one for indemnity to which even Mr. Edward Grey objected, that they were so satisfied with the good faith of Russia that they had not even asked for the withdrawal of Russian troops, that the Regent had declared that the Mejliss impeded the freedom of action of the Administration internally and externally; that thereafter the Mejliss was closed, its gates locked, and a guard mounted; that the announcement was quietly received and perfect order prevailed; that all papers except the Mejliss, which had opposed the Mejliss, (برعكس لهدام زكای تانور) were stopped; that Veprini, the Armenian military commander of Persian troops, and the Bakhtiari supported the statesman-like action of the Regent, that the Regent and the present Cabinet would conduct the Administration, comforted by the thought that the soldiers of Russia were at Kazvin—whence the same Regent had at one time successfully begged them to go away—and happy in the new civilization of Persia which gave her a telephone to ring up the Cossacks whenever the Mejliss or the Mullas gave the Regent and the Cabinet a more than usually awful nightmare. We did not hear thereafter of the withdrawal of Russian troops although the final acceptance of Russia's terms must either have been the acceptance of boons churlishly refused before, or the price paid for such a withdrawal. In fact, the Kazvin cantonnement and the telephone seemed to indicate the absolute necessity of these troops for the maintenance of law and order. All that we heard was the Free Press's forecast of "a provisional administration in Persia, with a Russian Governor and Chief of Police, financial control in the hands of Russia, and exclusively Russian tribunals." We have no doubt that even if the elaborate arrangements foreboded here had not been determined upon, before that date they were already determined upon with the signing of the Anglo-Russian Convention by Mr. Edward Grey. We have not yet seen news of the arrival of Persia, but we must qualify this statement a little. We learnt a week ago that the Regent had not attended the Palace for some days past; that rumour credited him with a determination to resign; that it even stated that Government—whatever there is of it—offered the Regency, as some small consolation no doubt, to the ex-President of the Mejliss; and that he declined! Can the meaning of this be mistaken? The Regent could not perhaps prevent the advance of Russia, and had hoped to buy it off with conceding almost all. But he had found at last that the audacity of blackmailers increases with each accepted demand, and he is man enough now to feel the humiliation as well as the folly of his action even if he was not man enough then to fight and die. But there is more than this. Through the boundless mercy of Allah, wisdom has at last dawned on the British Cabinet, and the more sagacious members thereof have asked Sir Edward Grey the question of questions, Quo Vadis? And with the meridian sun blazing full on its face, the Times too is roused from the dull and heavy slumbers of the conscienceless, and with a volte face that would do the Daily Mail credit, "deprecates British advance in South Persia as giving a dangerous handle to the more adventurous element in Russia." It saves its face—or perhaps the land-grabbing habit is still too strong—for it excepts "one or two points on the Gulf" with a view to "possible occupation." The clumsy subterfuges of the Times cannot disguise the fact that this return to sanity has been dictated partly by the fear of Russian advance and partly by the clear intimation which the rank and file of Liberals have given to the Liberal Whip of their change of feeling. The Daily Chronicle and the Daily News have reflected the opinion of the party, and that fetish of British politicians, a Parliamentary majority, which sometimes clouded even the penetrating vision of a Morley and threw occasional wet blankets over the moral fervour of a Gladstone, has now to be placated with a return to righteousness. A hint from the Master of Elibank to Mr Asquith, and a tug at the coat tails from Mr Asquith to Sir Edward Grey, and—Heigh presto! the thing is done. Lo and behold! the Times turns a calculating financier and reckons to the thousandth fraction of a pie the cost of an expedition to the South. In view of the state of Indian finance, "a costly expedition" is now declared, to be "singularly inopportune and impolitic." All this can go down; but when the sanctimonious Times makes a virtue of necessity and asks us to believe that "the paramount consideration is that by holding our hand we should give Muhammadans a striking proof of our determination not to take advantage of the complications in a Muhammadan country for purposes of self-aggrandisement," we are compelled to remind our tremendous contemporary that the Moslems are not such rank idiots as it thinks. A truer test of regard for the feelings of the Mussalmans would be the defence of Sir Edward Grey at Sunderland. There this solemn preacher of platitudes told his audience in the funereal tone that passes for statesmanship that he could not approve of "the maximum of interference which would mean the minimum of friendship," because such policy "would leave us without a friend in Europe." Friends in Asia may not count, but hitherto the only friends of Sir Edward Grey in Europe have proved their affection by using him as a tool in buying Germany off from Morocco, and raiding Persia, and one of them has set a seal on this beautiful pact, first, by refusing assistance to Sir Edward when he mustered enough courage to rattle the sabre against Austria more than three years ago, and, next, by buttressing her own position in Persia in the recent Russo-German Agreement following the Potsdam interviews of a year ago. Sir Edward talks of futility and expense. What could be more futile than such a one-sided friendship, and what policy more expensive than the one which extends the North-Western frontier of India by the extinction of one out of two of our buffer States? When Sir Edward talked of a request for interference in Mongolia, surely he could not have expected people anywhere in the world to accept the situation in Mongolia as a satisfactory apology for the Persian crisis. Mongolia formed no part of the Anglo-Russian Convention, and it is not a very dignified proceeding when Cabinet Ministers stand up to throw dust in the eyes of their own political supporters. Evidently his audience resented this and point blank asked him to say what steps he was taking to prevent Russia annexing Persia. Steps? Annexation? But "Russia was not annexing Persia." This reply reminds us of the story of a stolid and unemotional person who was shown the Niagara by a volatile and habitually enthusiastic guide. "Look at the huge mass of water, this awful expanse. Look at this tremendous river rushing headlong to the abyss below" etc., etc. retorted on the wound-up guide. "Well, yes," said the unmoved sightseer, "and what is there to prevent it?" "That is just what we ask Sir Edward Grey and the India Office which assures the London Moslem League that "the Government's general policy is to secure that Russian influence, which has long existed in the North, should not be extended in any direction prejudicial to India." Well, and what is there to prevent it? The Times has already assured the Mussalmans, for whom it shows a belated solicitude, that the independence of Persia and the word of Great Britain which guaranteed it, are not worth the bones of a single British Grenadier. The fact is obvious—even though Sir Edward Grey, the India Office and the Times may not know it—that the Russians too have overheard this noble utterance. Is it any wonder, then, that their calculations are based on the funk and want of humanity and common decency displayed by Sir Edward Grey and his journalistic supporters? The India Office assures us that "as soon as order is re-established the situation in Persia will revert to its normal state." This is vague enough, but surely "normal state" cannot mean the Russian occupation of the north. But, then, the question is, has order yet been re-established in Egypt since Tel-el-Kebir? A whole generation has been too short for our own Government to re-establish order there. The test of British consideration for Islam would be the voluntary evacuation of Egypt. But we shall be told that this would be a breach of faith towards those who have invested money there on the expectation of a permanent British occupation. Who made it "permanent" is more than we can say? But two can play at that game—and Russia knows it. Well, and what is there to prevent her?

WHEN in an important speech President Taft had said that he saw no reason "why matters of national honour should not be referred to Courts of Arbitration" and that "if we can negotiate and put through agreements with some other nation to abide by the adjudication of National Arbitration Courts in every issue which cannot be settled by a negotiation, no matter what it involves, whether honour, territory, or money, we should have made a long step forward by demonstrating that it is possible for two nations at least to establish between them the same system which through the process of law has existed between two individuals under a Government," it seemed that national patriotism was at last becoming legalized and humanized. On the other side of the Atlantic also Sir Edward Grey referred eulogistically to these "bold and courageous words," and all seemed to be intent on the creation of "a genial atmosphere." That Mr. Stead was jubilant goes without saying, but the Prime Minister, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Mayor all joined in precipitating the millennium. Mere Asiatics can well be excused if they too dreamed of a dawn of righteousness and legality in international dealings. But had they only considered that the first great war after Tsar Nicholas's Rescript which laid the foundation stone of the Hague was waged by the Tsar himself they should not have been so childishly credulous. The more superstitious among them would have been warned by the fact that Sir Edward Grey's eulogy of arbitration was delivered on the thirteenth, the 13th, of March. But they were no more superstitious than reflective, and the raid on Tripoli caught them just as unexpectedly as the charge of lison may catch a Club Man in Piccadilly. Poor Mr. Stead has been disconsolate, and after having sent missions all over the world, and written to every paper in Christendom, is absolutely silent. But Italy has at last taken pity on his wrinkles and grey hair and announced with much consideration for the feelings of an old man that she will refer an important question concerning the war to the Hague Tribunal. When M. Poincaré, the French Premier, jealous no doubt of the attentions paid by King Victor Emmanuel to Herr Von Kiderlen Waechter, told Italy plainly that the capture of the Carthage and the seizure of Turkish members of the Red Crescent Society from the Manouba would be dealt with like the trespass of a schoolboy in somebody else's orchard, Italy suddenly remembered her international obligations and "proposed that the cases of seizure of French vessels shall be submitted to the Hague Court of Arbitration." As France was in no mood to refer such trifling affairs to the Hague, specially when Italy herself had not considered her claims to Tripoli worthy of that august tribunal's investigation, Italy once more climbed down and "gave assurance of a speedy solution in a friendly conversation between the two Governments," and promised that only "if any differences remained, they would be settled by arbitration." "Bold and courageous words" these, as Sir Edward would say.

WE PUBLISH in our correspondence column a letter from "C. U. E." condemning with justifiable warmth the manifestly inactivity of the "leaders" of Mussalmans in the matter of collecting funds for the relief of war sufferers in Tripoli. We may also mention here that a kind friend has sent us his young nephew's letter from his school at Clifton (England) which he received a few weeks ago. That letter confirms "C. U. E."s account of Moslem feeling in a very significant manner. He writes:—"I have been thinking and praying every night and day about the ill-treated Moslems in Tripoli and almost everywhere. I every night in bed think what I could do if I was a man or if only God could show some sign or shape some idea into my head by which I could help the sufferers, I would do it though all were against it. I know it would be madness for me to say anything about being sent there to die for our religion, for although it would be a noble death yet very little use or help would come out of it..... At the present moment what is most needed is the union and determination of Mussalmans throughout the world to keep their liberty and specially their religion..... But that is where the point comes in. Ninety-nine out of hundred only think of themselves and do not care what happens to their other brothers..... But so much more I should like to say that even if a man at the present moment rose, so that he might rouse the drooping souls of Mussalmans I doubt whether anyone would take any notice of him. By anyone I mean the majority. Every Mussalman who has any thought or concern of his religion could not fail to be a still greater adherent of his religion if he passed a few years in this country. We ought to take from the Christians this one thing and that is 'Unity.' May God bring about this Unity in us which we are lacking and make us all stronger than we are." He adds a postscript to his sister in which he says:--

 کریم سے لیک چاہتا ہوں — مجھے آپ کا خط پا کر بہت خوشی
 ہوئی اور خاموش رہے، سنکر کہ آپ اور بدچارے مسلمانوں کو
 جو کہ گریبی میں ہیں کچھ خیال دیتی ہیں میں
 ہر رات سوتے سے پہلے دعا کرتا ہوں واسطے مالکنا ہوں —
 خدا کرے کہ یہ میری دعائیں خدا کی نظر میں جگہ
 پاویں اور مدد اور نیکو جگہ پہنچے۔

Here is this lad of 15, telling his uncle in the easy undress of a private letter, without the studied poses of the Press and the theatricality of public platforms, that he thinks every night in his bed what he could do if he were a man. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings" say the Christian Scriptures. We could ourselves tell what Mussalmans in India could do—if they were men. But we must not be unjust. It is a case of good men badly led, or not led at all. No doubt some of their leaders have displayed the good sense we associated with them. (We shall not call it courage, for it does not need any courage to subscribe to a fund declared to be not only legal but also humane by the highest authority in India.) But there are others—and these the most vociferous when some action or policy of the Hindus had to be condemned—that possess conceit and love of notoriety greater than the average "leading lady" of a dramatic company that loves to see her name in the largest letters in all playbills. These have been strangely silent and modest during the War, and if the habits of a lifetime proved too strong, have only used their voices and their "influence" in reporting to Deputy Commissioners against poets and journalists whose shoe latches they may not be fit to tie. Does not the letter of this young Mussalman show that even the women that love the purdah—we wish the "leaders" could love it a little—have come out almost for the first time to help a public movement. We honestly think that Moslem women are far better fitted—in spite of their lack of what passes for "education" in these days—to lead the Mussalmans than these emasculated misleaders. And what of the simple cogitations of the young lad? May we not say with Hali,

برہا پے کی دانائوں کی جگہ * کوئی لادے بچہ کی لالہ لالہ
 (In the place of the calculating wisdom of old age may some one bring us the heedless folly of childhood.) We fully agree with "C. U. E." that we should now actively appeal for funds for the war sufferers in Tripoli. Our "self-denying ordinance" held good only so long as the "misleaders" had not displayed their utter incapacity to lead public opinion. Then we had felt sure that the collections would prove "an excellent index of the extent to which the sufferings of the Mussalmans abroad are felt by their co-religionists in India." But since the "leaders" have abdicated their thrones, every well-wisher of the people has a duty to lead them aright. Let us assure these retiring monarchs that they shall never regain the seats of the mighty and we shall be able to say, as Cromwell said of his Parliament, "not a dog barked when they departed."

Verse.

Woman.

Of powers on earth that make or mar man's life
 Is chiefest woman. Conscience, honour, truth,
 Ambition, love of peace or love of strife,
 Religion, chance that comes when life is smooth,
 And turns its course awry, or fear of death,
 Are all most potent arms of destiny;
 But woman crowns them all. From her a breath,
 A tone or token, touch, or glance of eye
 O'ermasters all. O! Woman! thou art Fate
 Without Fate's blindness. Not divine art thou,
 Yet surely nearest God in form and state
 Of all His works.

And when He carved thy brow,
 Sweet friend, and lit thine eyes with light of day,
 He shed on thee His most divinest ray.

"Italy's Friendship."

WHEN the sudden and unprovoked Tripolitan raid of Italy shocked the world, the instinct of the British Nation, which admires fairplay and sympathises with the bullied weak, dictated its unanimous condemnation of such aggression to the British Press. That was, of course, before the cold calculations of the Blue Funk School of diplomacy threw a cold douche on the moral enthusiasm of the Nation and the Press. Since then indignation against Italy is being rapidly transformed into disgust and derision in the bulk of the British Nation, while the so-called Imperialists are being greatly exercised by the likely results of yet another White Power hoisting the white flag of surrender after provoking a semi-Asiatic people. This, as we have said, is a later phase, but the "Imperialism" of Mr. L. J. Maxse, the editor of the National Review, must be commended inasmuch as he alone among the British journalists wired to Italy at the time of the early outburst of moral indignation against that country that this was nothing but "half-penny hysteria" and did not reflect the views of the British Nation. It is perhaps the name of his Review alone that connects him with the Nation, for we should be sorry to know that so vulgar a writer and so rabid a Review represented the best mind of Great Britain. As a matter of fact, our readers will be glad to know that he does not, and nothing could illustrate this better than the fact that even out of the small number of Tory Die-Hards, it is Mr. Maxse alone who is still weltering in the Last Ditch. It is nothing strange, then, that in a paragraph of "Episodes of the Month" in a recent number, headed "Hysteresis and Sense," he commends to "able editors" the article of Signior Gian Della Quercia (E. Capel Cure) on "Italy's Friendship." "We ask our Italian friends to believe," says Mr. Maxse, "that their detractors have neither reflected nor affected British public opinion," and as a proof cites the denunciation of another Last Ditcher, Lord Willoughby de Broke.

Mr. Capel Cure prefaces his article with the remark that "the lust of slandering our neighbours, or the passive delight of hearing evil against them must be classified, in the psychology of pleasure, among the natural instincts of mankind." If the natural man, man created in the image of his Maker, is a slanderer by instinct, then surely should we all lose faith in mankind. But the instinct of slander is ingrained only among people of the type of the writer, whose slanders against Turkey and the Mussalmans fill the place of long and vainly expected Italian victories in Tripoli in the "psychology of pleasure." What Mr. Cure evidently condemns is the instinct of a righteousness which prefers to be right with two or three than in the wrong with a million. He flatters the British Press with "its repugnance to playing the part of vox clamantis in deserto" and "that 'God-I-thank-Thee-that-I-am-not-as-other-men-are' air which characterises the Britisher on the Continent" and expresses his contempt for "foreigners." And all this flattery is meant to win "England's 'Friendship.'" The "other men" are, of course, the Germans and Austrians, and Mr. Cure, playing upon the notorious weakness of that pale grey Liberal, the Foreign Secretary, asks, "Has England so many friends as to render superfluous the ancient sympathy of the Italian people, and even if that be so, is the moment well-chosen on her part for making jethsons of it?" This subtle hint is highly artistic, and even the unconscious condemnation of the Pharisee of European Politics may go down to-day with the British people. But when slaves were freed by Britain the part of vox clamantis in deserto was not regarded as a reproach by this island nation. The writer paints a glowing picture of Britain-worship in Italy, and in the same breath shows the hollowness of his flattery by saying that British condemnation of Italian brigandage immediately produced "a sense of uneasiness in the Italian mind as to the perfect soundness of the idol so long worshipped here . . . Cracks were suspected and looked for and the search soon ended . . . in the discovery of serious fissures."

It is highly instructive to read in this article that in many ways Italy is not yet a united nation. "The wearying clash of local interests, the petty clamour of party strife that daily sub-disintegrated disintegration, the deep hereditary antagonism between North and South," all go to show that Christian Italy is no more free from internal political warfare than Moslem Persia or Turkey and the natural inference that it was to drown all these quarrels at home that foreign aggression was thought of cannot be set aside by the grandiloquent assertion that so universal was the desire for war that all these voices of disunion were hushed. If an Asiatic were to hear a European descanting on the superior virtues of Europe as against Asia, he would learn to regard them as angels. But when he overhears them describing hostile European nations or Princes, or rival political parties, the concessions to humanity is so generous that he is tempted to regard them as little better than the army of Satan. The Moroccan affair did much to teach the latter lesson to Asia, and what little of truth, justice, and patriotism was left by European critics of each other to Europe after the Moroccan settlement has vanished in the course of the war in Tripoli. Mr. Cure does not leave even a shred of respectability to Italy in talking of "the epithets bawled from Cathedral steps by windy demagogues against the criminal scheme, born of priests and bankers, of enticing the gullied proletariat" of the South, and when he repudiates the condemnation of the war by the North by referring to it as "the protest of a decimated faction of noisy charlatans backed up by the sweepings of the Milan goal," asserting that the audience attracted by the "windy demagogues" "were there to hear abuse and to wound policeman," adding with superb sarcasm that "they were, besides, Northern Italians," the world must be excused if it is a little sceptical about the war's success in welding together "these unhomogeneous interests."

And what is his justification of the war? According to Mr. Cure the causes were "as complex as those which led to the first Crusade." This is an unfortunate reference, for Mussalmans are being persuaded everywhere to think that the aggression in Tripoli has no religious aspect. But if the causes of that aggression are similar to those which led to the first Crusade, then nothing could well be more degraded than the Tripolitan raid. Gibbon has analysed most elaborately the complex motives of that Crusade in his famous fifty-eighth chapter. Are we to believe that once more "a difference of religion is a worthy cause of hostility," that "obstinate unbelievers may be slain or subdued by the champions of the Cross," and that "Grace is the sole fountain of dominion as well as of mercy"? Are we to believe that as in the eleventh, when according to the penitentials of the Latin Church, "a modest sinner might easily incur a debt of 300 years"—each year of penance counting for the penurious in the fantastic arithmetic of the Church as 3,000 lashes—just so in the twentieth century also the successor of Urban II. hastened mobilisation by giving to the Italian Army "full receipt for all that might be due of canonical penance"?

Mr. Cure is silent on this point, but as regards the temporal motives he writes that "from the economic standpoint the movement was opportune and imperative, opportune because of the solid financial status of the country and the immense growth of riches during the last fifteen years, and imperative as an outlet to the emigration of the southern provinces." The political moment, too, was mature. The apple desired in the green by Mazzini and Cesare Balbo, the almost ripe apple coveted by Francesco Crispi, was now about to drop from the rotten branch and hands were stretching out to seize it. This reasoning reminds us of the thrifty servant who used to stint himself throughout the month and at the end of it nearly spent the month's wages in getting drunk like a lord. If the savings of the last 15 years are to be used in bombarding the Tripolitan desert at a cost of three million sterling a week, the Italian nation, if it has any sense left, would soon send that Government right about which overtaxed it or underfed it so long in order to have huge surpluses. The simile of the apple is equally unfortunate. No fruit has wrought more havoc in the world than an apple—unless it be the grape. But the gusto with which Mr. Cure sings the beauties of the apple takes the mind irresistibly back to the lines of a lover of Italy, Byron, who wrote a poem which the young idea has in these modern days tabooed for the grown-ups as likely to undermine the innocence of middle age. He describes a young lady's dream, and some apologists for the morals of Byron may discover in these lines a beautiful allegory of the Italy of the future—

And in the midst a golden apple grew
A most prodigious pippin—but it hung
Rather too high and distant; that she threw
Her glances on it, and then longing flung Stones, and whatever she could pick up to Bring down the fruit, which still perversely clung
To its own bough, and dangled yet in sight,
But always at a most provoking height.—
That on a sudden, when she least had hope,
It fell down of its own accord before
Her feet; that her first movement was to stoop
And pick it up, and bite it to the core;
That just as her young lip began to ope
Upon the golden fruit the vision bore,
A bee flew out and stung her to the heart,
And so—she woke with a great scream and start.

For that is exactly what has happened to Italy. Tripoli, like the apple of the young lady's dream, may have been "vital to her unfolding, may to her very existence." She may have felt herself "too long outraged and patronised by turns, but always despised." She may have had "accounts to settle with the Moslem," and she may have thought that "it was well that her sons should abandon the wordy skirmishing which was making them a nation of quarrelsome attorneys." Like Rob Act's courage, which was going out and needed a word or two about his honour edged in every now and then to keep it up, with a moment's hesitation "the war spirit that was throbbing in her veins would have been stifled." But how is Adowa retrieved in the ignominious retreating of Derna and Benghazi, Tripoli and Tobruk? How is that stain wiped off by "an army of 80,000 men squatting on the coast equipped with every modern war appliance, including aeroplanes and dirigibles" who "have not yet even begun to attempt the conquest of the two provinces," although "opposed by a mere handful of regular Turkish troops, strengthened by a few thousand tribesmen without any real organisation, any artillery or transport worth mentioning, and most of them armed with obsolete weapons"? It may be that the Turkish victories are "only on paper," as Mr. Cure wishes us to believe. But the burden of winning victories lies not on the Turks but on the Italians, who have to place something to their credit to balance the overdue account of Adowa. Will the fact—or fancy—that Turkish victories are mere falsehoods "made in Germany" make less inglorious the advice of the Tribuna, that no advance should take place into the interior but that "the Italians should content themselves with holding the coast towns and waiting till economic pressure drives the Arabs into submission"? And does the statement of the Turkish Ambassador that "if Tripoli is not retaken to-day it will be certainly retaken to-morrow" still appear to Mr. Cure as a "master-piece of deep humour"?

None of these questions are answered even by the rabid bark of Mr. Maxse against the "intractable Turk" which, originally heard through the Christmas number of the Italian paper, Il Giornale d'Italia, issued for the benefit of the Italian Army in Tripoli, is now reproduced in the New Year number of the National Review. Is it possible that Mr. Maxse is so wholly devoid of a sense of humour—which is almost the same thing as a sense of proportion—that he can write as he does without fear of involving himself in the same ridicule with which the Italian forces have covered themselves? "We were indeed greatly impressed," writes the editor of the National Review, "by the close and capable co-operation between preparation and policy, which contained useful lessons for other countries. Of the 'atrocity' campaign organized against Italy by so-called 'war' correspondents totally ignorant of all wars, many of whom had never been near this particular war in Tripoli (Warner, at any rate, than you, Mr. Maxse!), the less said the better. . . . We have a saying, 'accidents will happen in the best regulated families,' and men otherwise intelligent are capable at times of making idiots of themselves (Whose conduct is this meant to explain, the War Correspondents', the Italian Army's or your own, Mr. Maxse!) It is not the Italian Army, whose fame is beyond the reach of detractors, that stands to suffer from the campaign of calumnies. . . . At this season the thoughts of Englishmen naturally turn to the gallant forces who are upholding the honour of their country across the water and bearing their share of the white man's burden." With the New Year resolutions are formed even though they do not always become facts. If the thoughts of Englishmen do turn to the Italian forces, they must be hoping that these "gallant" forces would evolve more resolution than they have yet shown and would endeavour to uphold the honour of their country in a more dignified situation than the depth of a ditch.

Mr. Cure is not satisfied with the English Government's declaration of neutrality, because it was "more the affair of the rulers than of the masses." It is precisely this that makes us condemn the Foreign Secretary and still repose some confidence in the masses, although they appear effete and inert. Mr. Cure does not regard Mr. Asquith's pledges as above suspicion, because he did not withdraw certain English Navy instructors to the Turkish fleet earlier, and because even that quintessence of efficiency, the new Pharaoh of Egypt, could not cast a fine enough net along the Egyptian frontier—which during the war ought certainly to have been the Turkish frontier as well—to entrap in its meshes the intrepid Enver Bey, "the handsome warrior saint of Islam." And the last count in the charge against England is that "any statement, however infantile, is accepted provided that its tendency be anti-Italian. . . . while the official assertions of General Canova, a soldier and a gentleman, are disregarded or impugned." We have no personal acquaintance with the General and cannot say whether he is a boor or a gentleman. But if half that has been related about the blood-lust of the three days of October, and the subsequent bombardment of hospitals and shelters for the wounded, be true we shall have to revise our notion of a gentleman a great deal before we even discuss his claims to be one. Be that as it may, his claim to be a soldier is being daily disproved by the inactivity of his subterranean army lying snug and safe in the trenches. We have had a taste of the flattery which Mr. Cure is ready to shower on the British, and towards the end of his article we are treated to a feast of frankness. "The terms 'bullying' and 'piracy' applied to the taking of Tripoli, and the maudlin cant indulged in on the just fate of treacherous Arabs. . . . betoken an absence of humour and a short memory of the part of those who upheld, and with reason, (The flatterer!) the hecatomb of Dervishes at Omdurman, or certain necessary examples of war's exigencies in the Transvaal. . . . In short, the first stones had better come from 'him that is without sin,' while the garb of outraged morality in which accusations are clothed brings to mind the lines of the English poet.

'O for a forty pason-power to chant
'Thy praise, hypocrisy!'

To this impassioned harangue are attached certain pains and penalties. They are the threatened loss of "the affection of Italy gained at her birth" but which is in danger of being "heedlessly thrown away now that she is coming of age." We are seriously informed that "it is ill deriding a young man engaged on his first enterprise." We are asked to believe that "Italy is not more merely the trustee for Europe's National Gallery"—why the claims of the organ grinder are entirely ignored is more than we can say—"but a nation which after years of modest patience, has shaken off the diffidence of childhood and developed to the consciousness of her strength and her mission in the world." What does the poet say?

ستم کے توہی مرقا بل خدا وہ دن تو کرے

All this has evidently been anticipated in those quarters which were reminded of Italian acquiescence in the ruthlessness at Omdurman and the raid on South Africa with its "military exigencies." For before the article ends a reference is made to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain's message to Italy which "unquestionably represents the responsible and effective public opinion of England." Mr. Maxse goes still further, and, in two pages inset after the paper was ready, not only quotes Mr. Chamberlain's interview with a representative of the Morning Post—"than which there is no more influential paper in England"—in which the most cynical of British politicians "gratefully remembers the attitude of the chivalrous Italian nation during the South African War, when the British Government and the British Army were the objects of a similar campaign of mendacity waged by several English newspapers now attacking Italy," but also inserts an unnumbered page giving in a most prominent manner the views of Lord Roberts that "in war it is usually the severest measures that are, in the long run, the most humane," that "no soldier will put any credence in the report that women and children were deliberately killed by the Italians," and that "only those who have had experience in war in all its phases have the right to judge the expediency of reprisals, and then only when they have access to the information which was at the time in the possession of the directing staff." Who can say that these champions of political chivalry and military morality have not made an amende honorable for the "half-penny hysterics" of people who, on occasions at least, consider Christ to be a safer guide than a Chamberlain and believe that the Prince of Peace had some right to lay down certain clear rules even for judging "the expediency of reprisals" although he was no Field Marshall? We can tolerate the cant of expansion, but when journalists begin to assert that "civilization will have little to regret in the substitution of the rule of one of the wisest of Christian monarchs for a régime more blighting than that qualified by Gladstone's classic phrase as 'the negation of God,' we must say it is time that these civilized pagans ceased to take the name of God in vain.

Bengal Mussalmans and the Moslem League.

WE ARE glad to announce that at a General Meeting of the Bengal Provincial Moslem League, held on the 30th instant, it was decided to invite the All India Moslem League to hold its next annual session in Calcutta. The All-India Moslem League has accepted the invitation and preparations are already afoot to make this a record session both in point of numbers attending and the importance of the topics of discussion. His Highness the Aga Khan has promised to participate and welcomes the invitation of Bengal. As the session would take place on the 3rd and 4th of March, in the matter of dates it has not been very fortunate, for Christmas is really the ideal time for such gatherings and the Holi holidays during which it is now proposed to hold the session are too short to allow many Mussalmans from other provinces to participate in the deliberations without considerable difficulty and self-sacrifice. But Christmas fell during the Ashra-f-Moharram this year, when no such meeting could have been convened, besides coming too soon after the busy days of the Durbar. If the gathering in March is smaller than the Mussalmans desire, one more reason would be adduced against the suitability of Calcutta as the capital of India. But we hope this will not be the case, as the far-reaching changes announced at the Durbar make it desirable that political representatives of Moslem India should soon meet in large numbers to discuss them and express an opinion thereon, and that such a deliberation should take place within earshot of the Government of India.

Another and a still more important reason is that the Mussalmans of these provinces have been hard hit by the announcement. The question of the Partition from being a provincial concern had somehow come to be an All-India question, and its annulment demands the earliest consideration of the Mussalmans of all the provinces of India. Moreover, the Mussalmans of Bengal are not yet strong enough to be left exclusively to their own resources. This fact may not flatter the Mussalmans of Bengal some of the prominent men among whom love flattery better than franker friendliness. But it is all the same a fact, and the joint family system of Islamic fraternity as well as of Hindu law is opposed to the dereliction of weaker brethren in a fierce struggle for existence which is characteristic of free competition, whether of Darwinian Evolution, the Manchester School of Economics, or the National Congress of educated India. We have no desire to anticipate the conclusions of the All-India Moslem League, but we earnestly hope that the forthcoming session will at last succeed in convincing the more prominent Mussalmans of Bengal that isolation in politics, especially that of the backward portions of a community, whatever it may be in theory, is far from splendid as judged by results. Bengal has the largest Moslem population of any province in India, but it is also almost the most backward, and the contrast that it presents to the self-assertive Hindu population is startling. When this is the result of a century and a half during which Calcutta was the capital of India, we shudder to think what would happen if the same isolation continues and the same flatteringunction is applied to themselves by the prominent Mussalmans of Bengal after the transfer of the Capital to Delhi. Willynilly they are part of one and the selfsame chain, and we call upon them and the Mussalmans of the rest of India to remember that the weakness of a link is not only the weakness of that link itself but also of the entire chain.

This is such a worn-out truism that we would be ashamed to parade it anywhere—except in Moslem circles in Bengal. But in spite of the annulment of the Partition, a section of its Moslem population is still hugging the wretched isolation which has cost it so much as a treasure of incalculable value. The Burdwan Conference, that ill-omened raven's croaking which preceded the annulment of the Partition, was nothing but a symptom of the narrowness and petty jealousy to which we have referred. But although the shining lights of the Burdwan firmanent showed their inconstancy in one important respect, they have proved their steadfastness in another. Now that the Government have acted upon their advice and modified the partition exactly as they wished it at the Burdwan Conference, these good people are anxious to make their dupes forget that the misery which they mourn to-day was at least prayed for by themselves, if not actually the result of their prayers. So much for inconsistency. But they have been consistent also. They still persist in boycotting every person whom they regard as non-Bengali. Residents of Bengal who were born in Behar or Northern India, or who still have a home there in addition to a domicile in the province in which they work and earn a living, were evidently excluded from the meeting convened at Dacca last month, and although the notice of another meeting to be held at Calcutta on the 17th and 18th February generously announces that delegates elected to attend it "need not necessarily be permanent residents in the districts," not one of the conveners of the forthcoming meeting also belongs to the class of people conspicuous by their absence at the Dacca meeting. As we have said before, some of those who attended the Dacca meeting, and those far the most self-assertive, are just those who wanted the Partition to be annulled and who ought to have rejoiced at the Durbar announcement. Yet they had the hardihood to participate in a meeting held to record a protest against the annulment, and now that the Mussalmans of Bengal have to fortify themselves against a minority of the population of their province, almost stronger than a majority anywhere else in India, they bring with them the selfsame narrowness and the same spirit of isolation in laying the foundation-stone of the new fabric.

We hope the forthcoming session of the All India Moslem League would prevent this effectually, and complete the work of broadening Moslem Bengal which the last Provincial Muhammadan Educational Conference has so well begun. The League should impress the people of Bengal with its catholicity of sympathies and its breadth of view, and while leaving no stone unturned to convert the so-called leaders of Bengal themselves to its own views, it should in the last resort wean off the people from these "leaders." We are conscious that Mussalmans at this juncture must give up quarrelling among themselves, and regret more than we can tell the use of such plain speech; but we are also not unaware that too great an anxiety to respect the susceptibilities of those who never respect the susceptibilities of others should not be allowed to weaken the new foundation.

The Dacca meeting proposed that "in view of the recent administrative changes it is desirable that one strong representative association for the whole of Bengal be established, with headquarters at Calcutta and branches in all districts and sub-districts, to promote the advancement and welfare of the Muhammadans of Bengal," and at a recent meeting of the Committee of Management of the Central National Muhammadan Association it was decided to invite Eastern Bengal Muhammadans to join that Association as a body and "to take an active share in working it up in view of Eastern Bengal being now united with Bengal." We hope that the union of the two Bengalis would be followed by the union of various Moslem organizations in the two provinces. But when the process of amalgamation commences, we trust some facts will be borne in mind by the organizers. In the first place, existing organizations should be used as far as possible instead of being neglected altogether. In the next place, two and not more than two organizations should be formed, one for the advancement of education and the other for the promotion of political interests, each with more or less exclusive and certainly distinct functions. And, finally, whatever new organizations are formed, they must not be wholly independent of Imperial organizations of the Mussalmans of India such as the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference and the All-India Moslem League. We are not wholehearted admirers of these institutions, and are, in fact, among their severest critics. But our criticism is directed against them chiefly because we consider them to be the only possible organizations for the whole of Moslem India, and we are fully convinced that the energy of the architect as well as of the critic should be usefully spent in building them up and improving them, rather than frittered in destroying them and vainly endeavouring to build up other smaller constructions that, lacking a well-conceived general plan, lie scattered here and there all over the country. "Unity is strength" is a motto that has not lost its intrinsic force even in the vapid atmosphere of Bengal. While the Hindus of Bengal seek to dominate the whole of India, and wish to lead public opinion "from Calcutta to Peshawar", it would be even more disastrous in the future than it has been in the past if the Mussalmans of Bengal cut themselves off from their co-religionists elsewhere, and stand up to proclaim "Divided we stand, united we fall." If in saying all this we have offended the Mussalmans of Bengal our only apology is that we have always claimed to be their friends, never their flatterers.

H. H. The Aga Khan at Karachi.

The following is the text of the address presented to H.H. the Aga Khan by the Sind Muhammadan Association and H.H. the Aga Khan's reply:—

To His Highness Sir Aga Sultan Muhammad Shah, Aga Khan, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., etc

May it please Your Highness,—We the members of the Sind Muhammadan Association, on behalf of ourselves and the Muhammadans of this Province, respectfully offer our most sincere and hearty welcome to Your Highness on your visit to Karachi, the Capital of Sind.

We are naturally proud of our Province, because the light of Islam first penetrated Sind before it spread over other parts of India, because it is famous for its extensive trade with Persia, Afghanistan, Russia and other countries all over the world; and because it is the birthplace of Akbar, the greatest and mightiest Muhammadan Emperor that ever ruled over India. But we are none the less proud that our Province is also the birthplace of Your Highness the greatest and most distinguished Moslem leader of the day. This circumstance while affording us special joy in acknowledging Your Highness as the recognized leader of the Muhammadans of India in matters educational, social and political, makes it incumbent on us to pay Your Highness greater homage than the Mussalmans of other parts of India have done. We are rejoiced to find Your Highness—a worthy son of our soil—in our midst to-day, and are happy to see that Your Highness has, by your condescending to accept our humble address, placed us in a position to express our high appreciation of the noble and philanthropic deeds which Your Highness has hitherto performed, and is still performing with the object of spreading education among your Moslem brethren and ameliorating their condition.

Your Highness, we are rejoiced to note, has distinguished yourself as the real patron of Muhammadan Education in India. Your distinguished and successful public career as a leader of the Mussalmans, and your untiring zeal in, and disinterested devotion to, the cause of Moslem progress have not only endeared you to all right thinking and patriotic Mussalmans, but have laid them as well as their posterity under a deep debt of obligation, the memory of which will ever remain in bold letters on the pages of history. We avail ourselves of this opportunity to recall to our memory some of the rights and privileges conceded to Indians by the Government through your intercession and exertions. The foremost among these is the Reform Scheme carried out in accordance with the gracious Declaration of His Majesty the late King-Emperor, whose sudden demise plunged the whole world into deep sorrow. The expansion of Legislative Councils on a wider representative basis has given the people of India, and specially the Mussalmans, a larger opportunity than they had before of being associated with the Government in the administration of the country. Your Highness' unique success in moving Government to abolish the Quarantine Rules enforced against the pilgrims who embarked from India for the sacred City of Mecca, has earned the blessings and gratitude of the entire Moslem world.

The ill-treatment meted out to Indians in South Africa and the great hardships endured by them rightly moved Your Highness' sympathy, and the strenuous efforts consequently put forth by Your Highness to get their grievances redressed, are too widely known to need a mention here.

The onerous duties and responsibilities of managing the affairs of the All India Moslem League whose sphere is not confined to the narrow limits of political activity nor to the attainment of mere selfish ends, but which embraces catholic interests in the broadest sense of the term, have also fallen on your shoulders for the most part.

All politicians of the day are unanimous in asserting that the Hindus and the Muhammadans are ordained by God to be partners in the mightiest and most glorious Empire the world has ever seen and that the chief need for India at the present moment is to bring about a healthy national unity by establishing harmonious relations between the two communities and relegating to the background all national animosities and religious differences. The ardent desire of loyal and peace-loving patrons, we are gratified to note, resulted in a magnanimous proposal for the formation of the Hindu-Muhammadan Peace Conference, which emanated from Your Highness, was seconded by the Right Honourable Syed Amir Ali, upheld by Sir William Wedderburn, Bart, and favourably hailed by the whole nation. Nothing has afforded us greater pleasure than to know that the recognized leaders of both the communities met at Allahabad on New Year's Day of the last year and appointed a representative committee to discuss the questions laid before the Conference.

Several schemes are frequently propounded for the advancement of our community, but we assure Your Highness that few of our leaders have grasped the root-evil so rightly as Your Highness since we perceive that all your energies and exertions have mainly been concentrated on the wide diffusion of education amongst high and low, rich and poor of all Indian communities alike—education that would take into account social changes, intellectual ideas, and moral and physical aptitudes and adapt them to various circumstances and needs. This, if we rightly understand, is precisely your motive in establishing a denominational University for the Moslems.

The eager desire which has ever engrossed Your Highness' thought is the advancement of the scheme for the establishment of a Moslem University on sound financial basis—a legitimate want that was prophesied by the great Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, K.C.S.I., the founder of the M. A. O. College. The dream of our most revered Sir Syed was realized when the Moslem population of India heard with feelings of profound gratification of the announcement of Your Highness' intention of giving a lakh of rupees towards the foundation of the Moslem University to be established at Aligarh in commemoration of the visit of His Most Gracious Majesty the King-Emperor, George V, on the auspicious occasion of His Majesty's Coronation Durbar at Delhi in December last, which august event has been celebrated with due pomp and splendour.

Your Highness' numerous private charities in furtherance of the education of Moslem youths, your Annual Grants of Rs. 12,000 and Rs. 6,000 respectively to the Aligarh College and the Anjuman-i-Islam School, Bombay, and your handsome donation of Rs. 35,000 towards the establishment of the College of Science, initiated by Your Highness, to commemorate the auspicious visit to the great Moslem Institution at Aligarh of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (now His Most Gracious Majesty the King-Emperor) have acted as a stimulus to rouse the generosity of well-to-do Muhammadans all over the country. To crown all, your announcement of a princely donation of Rs. 75,000 towards the building of the proposed Mosque in London to commemorate the sacred memory of His late Majesty the King-Emperor Edward VII, the Great Peacemaker of the World, was hailed with gratitude from all corners of the Moslem world.

Your Highness has espoused the cause of national advancement without distinction of caste or creed, and has rightly earned the esteem and gratitude of the whole nation. We in turn have not forgotten the parental advice imparted by Your Highness at the last session of the League to the effect that—to quote Your Highness' own words—"Our loyalty to the Throne must be absolute and our relation with the Hindus and other Indian communities who share that loyalty must frankly be most cordial."

We take this opportunity of respectfully tendering our sincere felicitations to Your Highness on the most exalted distinctions of K.C.I.E. and G.C.I.E. bestowed on Your Highness by His Most Gracious Majesty the late King-Emperor Edward VII, on the G.C.S.I. lately bestowed on Your Highness by the present King-Emperor and on various decorations conferred on Your Highness by foreign Monarchs, all of which have been bestowed in consideration of the eminent services rendered by Your Highness in the cause of educational, social and political advancement of the Indian people in general and the Muhammadans in particular. AMEN.

In conclusion it is our most sincere and fervent prayer that the Almighty God may grant Your Highness long life to enjoy your well-earned distinctions and that Your Highness may continue to be the recipient of still higher honours that may yet be in store for you. It is likewise our earnest prayer that He may give you health and strength to extend your helping hand towards the amelioration of the condition of the Moslems and other communities of the Indian Empire in general and of the Province of Your Highness' birth place in particular, which, being in great need, also expects a share of your liberality to commemorate your connection with, and present visit to, it. AMEN.

Welcoming Your Highness again in our midst and wishing Your Highness long life and happiness, etc., etc.

After the address had been read, K. B. Sheik Sadik Ali handed over to H. H. the Aga Khan a beautiful silver casket containing the address. His Highness was then garlanded by Sheik Sadik Ali amid loud cheers.

H. H. the Aga Khan then rose amidst cheers and made the following speech:—

VAZIR SAHIB, MR. LAWRENCE, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—I must thank the Sind Muhammadan Association most sincerely for their great kindness in presenting me with this beautiful casket and doing me the honour of asking me to come here this afternoon and giving me an address on my arrival here. You have reminded me that I am a native of Karachi. And although I live in the Deccan, I assure you that not only this fact but also the fact that this province is so full of my co-religionists—that this is practically the only province where they are in the clear majority—makes me consider often their position and status here.

You have very kindly referred to my humble services in the cause of the political awakening of the Muhammadans of India and in the foundation of the All-India Moslem League and in the general work carried on during the last few years for bringing Hindus and Muhammadans together in common loyalty to a common sovereign in the same country. Well, this work is essentially due to one fact, viz., that there has been in certain parts of India a Muhammadan revival within the last few years—a revival which has not yet reached this province and which if further delayed would retard the position of Muhammadans here a great deal more.

Gentlemen, I strongly feel that the Muhammadans of Sind have great opportunities before them like Muhammadans of other parts of the country—opportunities which, if taken advantage of by them in advancing their social, moral and educational interests, will surely and gradually lay solid foundations of their amelioration and advancement and will benefit them and brighten their future. But in order that these results may be achieved the first condition is that these opportunities must be taken advantage of and must not be allowed to slip, leaving us where we are.

Gentlemen, as regards the recent changes announced at Delhi, I feel convinced—and here I am giving my personal opinion and am not speaking as President of the Moslem League—that they will do good to the country and to the Muhammadan community. I feel that they will do good to Bengal. Even to East Bengal they will do good while taking some advantages from them. The advantages must, however, be carefully and energetically safeguarded by East Bengal Muhammadans. These changes—specially the change of the capital—will benefit this province a great deal, if the people take advantage of the opportunities and make those sacrifices which have to be made in order to profit by such opportunities.

Gentlemen, if you allow me to give you an immediate piece of advice I may tell you that it is a matter of sadness and deep regret—regret which is felt throughout India, in Gujrat, Madras and elsewhere—that there is no Moslem League here in Sind, though Leagues have been formed in so many districts throughout the country. Not only is there no Moslem League here, but no effort has been made to give the people here political education, which will be ultimately a source of strength not only to Government but also ultimately lead to the making of a single nation of Hindus and Muhammadans.

You have referred to the work done by others and myself in connection with the treatment meted out to Indians in South Africa. While we have constantly fought against the unfortunate attitude of the Colonial Government and the colonists, I warn you that that attitude is in no small measure due to our own fault. For owing to want of education, social evils and economical backwardness we have placed ourselves in a position which makes it possible for others to heap such indignities upon us. If greater efforts be made for educational, social and national progress, our fellow-countrymen will undoubtedly be given better treatment.

Gentlemen, the great need of Indians, the greater need of Muhammadans and the greatest need of this province is Education; it is not enough to send boys to school, for it is not in this way that character is formed. This will give them more parrot-like learning which must necessarily be dangerous—which will do them more harm than good. Muhammadan education divorced from religion—nothing would be more fatal than that, for then you will not imbibe the spirit of sacrifice, nor the spirit of nationality, nor will you know the beauty and the higher purpose of life; while your loyalty in such circumstances cannot be of the right and real kind, for real and genuine loyalty must be based on the spirit of peace which religion alone inculcates, upon love of fellowmen which religion alone teaches.

This being the view of the vast majority of Muhammadan leaders—in fact, the view of practically all the leaders—it was held that a Moslem University was a necessity. So the work was started and up to this time twenty lakhs have already been found. I may here tell you that the Government of India has promised to give us a charter as soon as thirty-five lakhs have been collected. Now thirty-five lakhs are a mere drop in the ocean compared to the wealth of the Muhammadan community. I know the poverty of the community, but I am sure if they realised the urgent need for the University, it would be easy to collect the amount.

Gentlemen, I am sorry to find that with one exception of His Highness the Mir of Khairpur—whose generosity in contributing a lakh of rupees to the Moslem University is felt throughout India and is in fact realised more in Bombay and Madras than here in Sind—with this exception practically nothing has been done in Sind for the Moslem University. Of course the usual excuse is advanced here to justify the dereliction of duty—backwardness of education and the consequent need of educational facilities in Sind. Now I grant that the Muhammadan community here is extremely backward in education, but it is a shortsighted policy that this backwardness should stand in the way of its support to the University scheme. For if Sind renders due help in the establishment of the University and the University becomes an accomplished fact, the next step will be to have a network of Muhammadan colleges all over India on the lines of the present Aligarh College, z., Residential Colleges. This must necessarily and immediately follow the University in order that the University may draw upon the provincial residential colleges for its alumni. And once a system of such colleges is founded, Sind will be one of the first to get such a college. In regard to the establishment of such a college here, I give you the assurance that I shall help you and that you will get money for it from all parts of the country. There is already before you the scheme of Mr. Lawrence for removing the Sind Madrasah to an open-air site. Once you remove it there, why not raise it to a college? The idea will easily become a reality, if you are prepared to undergo the necessary sacrifice. When we started the idea of the Moslem University, it was proposed that every Moslem should be called upon to pay a month's income. But very few have actually done that. Nevertheless we have got twenty lakhs. Now, if the work of collection is begun in this province on those lines and conducted systematically by house-to-house visitation, I am sure you will be able to accomplish a great deal and collect a good amount for the University.

If I give you a word of advice as to what is the need of India, of Sind, of Muhammadans of India as well as of this province, I would say that great need of the time is Self-reliance. As one who has seen a great deal of the world I assure you that you have now got better opportunities than the people of many other countries for raising yourselves under the aegis of British rule and under the sovereignty of our Gracious King-Emperor. The future depends on you and you alone—on the efforts put forth by you for uplifting yourselves, your community and your country.

Gentlemen, excuse me for offering advice to the Muhammadans of Sind, because it is never a pleasant duty to advise. Still I felt it my duty to do so; and if I had not done so, I should have felt that I was a very, very bad Sindhi indeed. I must thank you heartily for your kindness. I hope the time is not far when you will have here a very great college like the Aligarh College run by the Muhammadans of Sind—when not only the Muhammadans of this province will be more educated, but every Muhammadan Zemindar will be an educated gentleman pursuing the progress of modern science in the service of his work for the good of himself and his brothers.

At the close of his speech His Highness was given an enthusiastic ovation, K. B. Sheik Sadik Ali garlanded Mr. Lawrence, the Hon'ble Mr. and Mrs. Webb and Mr. T. H. Viner. As His Highness rose to leave the hall, Mir A. A. Khan called three thanks to His Highness, which were — — — — — replied to. The assembly then dispersed.

CORRESPONDENCE

Turkish Relief Fund.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—In a recent issue of your journal you write as follows —
"The subscriptions collected for the relief of the War Sufferers in Tripoli are an excellent index of the extent to which the sufferings of the Mussalmans abroad are felt by their co-religionists in India."

This seems to me so far from actual facts that I feel compelled to traverse your statement, not indeed to minimize the feeling which has been aroused in Muslim India by Italy's shameless piracy in Tripoli (for to do so would be both hypocrisy and crime), but to emphasize, in view of the painfully small amount of subscriptions, the utter disproportion of the sums collected to the strength of Muslim feeling. But my real aim is to goad into action the self-constituted leaders of the community who are betraying the hollowness of their flimsy pretensions for leadership by their lack of active interest in the most awful crisis in the fortunes of the Muslim world. True, they have called meetings in every nook and corner of India and denounced the Italian aggression in the most approved style of the Congress, but the question is, what have they achieved. No doubt Indians as loyal subjects of a neutral Power cannot offer their personal services to the Turkish Government, but this is all the more reason why they should give some other practical shape to their sympathy.

That this has not been done is due entirely to the default of the "leaders" who have foolishly thrown away their one chance in life when they could boast a following if they had headed and organized this movement. There is no Muhammadan who knows of this iniquitous brigandage of Italy and does not wish to contribute to the Turkish Relief Fund, but for want of organization hundreds of thousands of rupees must never reach the victims of Italian bloodlust, and the heartache of millions of His Majesty's Mussalman subjects must ever remain a secret to themselves and a matter of doubt to their Rulers.

When I speak of the public eagerness to subscribe I am relating personal experience, for when we opened the fund in the place from which I write, subscriptions poured in, from a pice to a thousand rupees, (all cash, no promises) till in about three weeks a vast sum was collected and despatched. On the other hand, in a wealthier town close by, which boasts of a District Muslim League, a great meeting of protest was called by a substantial gentleman, and full-throated denunciations were hurled at the Italians—and lo! a couple of months later a subscription of Rs. 5 appeared in your esteemed journal against this worthy's name. It is useless to find fault with this gentleman, for I am sure that as a Mussalman he must be crying his eyes out in secret grief. But he probably belongs to the school of "fine old gentlemen" who cannot actively participate in any movement, however innocent, unless it emanates from the immaculate hands of a District Officer. But may one ask, where was the (District) Muslim League all this while? This is indeed a painfully instructive instance of our incapacity to help ourselves.

In your opinion, Sir, the total subscriptions up to the 5th instant could not be less than Rs. 5,00,000. I do not think half that sum could have been collected up to that date, as all the larger figures you have noted they do not exceed Rs. 1,50,000, while the smaller sums at the highest computation cannot well be over Rs. 50,000 (if that much). Now this, in my opinion, is absolutely disgraceful and reflects nothing but shame on the educated Indian Muhammadans and their organizations.

The Egyptians are raising thousands of pounds weekly, besides sending volunteers, doctors and medical stores to Tripoli, and I have reason to believe that similar efforts are being made in the rest of the Muslim world except India. After the bombast of our condemnations, are we not ashamed at the poorness of our results, not only before the Muslims abroad but before the whole of the civilized world? I must confess that the jibes of the Leader at which you were so indignant a little while ago are eminently well deserved if we do not bestir ourselves and set about making up for lost time.

An indirect, but none the less valuable, result of organized attempts to raise subscriptions will be the enlightenment which will thereby be diffused among the masses. It will create a taste for newspapers and gradually wean the public from their implicit credulity in cock-and-bull stories. Would not this alone be ample recompense for any labours bestowed on this work of charity?

I earnestly appeal to the League, the various Anjumans and organizations throughout the country, and to the Old Boys of Aligarh to throw off their indifference and to organize for the purpose of helping forward the Turkish Relief Fund, and to preach and give effect to the boycott of Italian goods. If this is done the people will be able to furnish what may truly be called an "index of their feeling", and I am confident the masses will soon equal, if not surpass, the amount which has been laboriously raised for the University.

As for the attitude of the Comrade, Sir, I do not see why it should have subjected itself to the self denying ordinance by "purposely refraining from special appeals". Your eloquent support of a pious cause cannot affect the voluntary character of the benefactions, else it is inexplicable why the University Fund should have been an exception to the rule. For my part, I hold it to be the duty of every Muslim paper to publish frequent appeals to examine the work of the various organizations and to keep up to the mark all persons in charge of the funds. May I hope that you will not consider yourself, in the future, obliged to forego "the benefits accruing to you here and hereafter"?

Anecdote.

MARK TWAIN was taken by a friend to the studio of Whistler who was putting the finishing touches to a picture. When Whistler inquired his guest's opinion of the picture, Mark Twain remarked that it did very well, but "he didn't much care for that cloud." He appeared to be on the point of rubbing the cloud with his gloved finger. In horror, Whistler exclaimed, "Don't touch it, the paint's wet!" "Oh, that's all right," replied Mark, with his characteristic drawl, "these aren't my best gloves, any how!"

LORD HALDANE's geniality is proverbial. Here is an illustration of his manner of meeting an embarrassing situation. Some time ago he was addressing a meeting, and was remarking that the Army had not been his only love, when a lady made an interruption and another rushed on to the platform and spoke to him. "These ladies," said his lordship, "really choose a most embarrassing moment in my speech. I had just observed that the Army had not been my only love. Let me therefore free myself from misconception. I was about to admit that I had flirted with the Law."

A PARIS contemporary publishes an interesting anecdote of the late King. At a house party at Hatfield, in honour of the Kaiser, the invited guests included the Prince of Wales, the Portuguese Minister, and M. Waddington, the French Ambassador, and his wife. During the evening Madame Waddington's diamond necklace became unfastened, and after vainly attempting to fasten it she called the Portuguese Minister to her assistance, but he was not more successful. Everyone was interested in the little mishap, and then the Kaiser relieved the monotony by observing, "There is Portugal trying to strangle France." The remark was greeted with laughter. The Prince of Wales rose to assist Madame Waddington and then the Kaiser, in a grave tone, added, "It is really a serious matter: England is mixed up in it."

OF LORD HOUGHTON, father of the present Earl of Crewe, the following good story is told:—He had seen the portrait of an admiral in a shop in Wardour Street, and offered £5 for it. The dealer wanted £10, but ultimately came down to £7 10s. Lord Houghton would not go beyond the £5, however, and did not get the picture. Soon afterwards, visiting a neighbour in Yorkshire, Lord Houghton caught sight of his friend the admiral hanging in the dining-room. He recognized him at once, and said, "Hallo! who's that? What have you got there? Something new?" "Yes," replied the friend; "he was a celebrated admiral who fought with Nelson—a fine portrait, too—recently bequeathed to us—an ancestor of my wife's." "Ah, was he?" said Lord Houghton. "A month ago he was within two pound ten of becoming one of mine!"

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

THE Shiraz correspondent of the Times of India describing briefly the fighting at Kazerun with the tribesmen says -- "Until the tribesmen, who have fired on the escort, can be taught a severe lesson, matters will remain in rather a critical state. Unfortunately, the nature of the country is such as to render the giving of a military lesson with the force at present in the country almost an impossibility and looks as if before long considerable reinforcements must be sent. At least, one infantry brigade would be required with a brigade of mountain artillery and some odd troops, such as pioneers, etc., for making the road fit for the use of large forces. It is not known as yet how many of the tribesmen are up but if all those in the neighbourhood of Kazerun rise, it will give even a division a very difficult job. The cause of the discontent is undoubtedly the feeling that the British have come to interfere with the very lucrative trade of highway robbery which has been the monopoly of these tribes. It may seem curious that the telegraph line from here to Kazerun and Bushire has not been cut. This is probably because it is being used by the enemy, as one of the three wires of the line is sold off to the Persian Telegraph Department who have a separate telegraph office here and also separate offices at Kazerun and at Bushire. As it is more than likely that there are Kashgais and others here in sympathy with the rising in the Kazerun valley and on the passes above it the line is very useful to them. It is certainly most useful to our troops, for, by attaching field telephones to the line, they are able to communicate with either Shiraz or Kazerun from any stage.

As it is quite probable that the Persians will have construed the results of these two engagements as victories for themselves, the boycott has practically ended though up to a few days ago there was still a difficulty about Hamals, for these men remembered the fate of the boy who carried a melon to the camp and had his face blackened and his body beaten for the offence.

On Sunday on the news of Tabriz having been bombarded by the Russians reaching here, an indignation meeting was called at which the Mullahs presided. It was said by many that the Chief Mullah started the boycott with the idea of being bribed to stop it, an end that he did not achieve.

There is no further news of interest from Southern Persia and the roads about Shiraz are reported quiet.

The Persian Consul-General in Calcutta has received official information from Teheran to the effect that the Persian Government has established peace and order in the southern parts and the Governor for Fars and Swedish officers are being sent with instructions to take stringent measures to maintain peace and the increased security of roads.

Replying to representations of the London Moslem League, the India Office states that the Government has reason to believe the negotiations between Russia and Persia, which it has done its utmost to facilitate, are on the point of reaching a satisfactory conclusion, in which case, so soon as order is re-established, the situation in Persia will revert to its normal state. The Government continues that it is unable to intervene in particular disputes concerning only Russia and Persia, for the Government's general policy is to secure that Russian influence, which has long existed in the north, should not be extended in any directions prejudicial to India.

Sir Edward Grey speaking at Sunderland, replied to attacks of a section of the Liberal press on his foreign policy which he said was not his but the Cabinet's. These critics, he said, really advocated the maxim of interference which would mean the minimum of friendship because their policy would leave us without a friend in Europe. It was the duty of any Government, Liberal or Conservative, said Sir Edward to resist a policy which was most futile and expensive that could be adopted. Sir Edward continued that the latest selection of his critics for our interference was Mongolia and said "If we are going to interfere actively in Central Asian questions far beyond the Indian frontier, we shall incur not only a present heavy naval expenditure but a vast increase in military expenditure." Replying to the question as to what steps Great Britain was taking to prevent Russia from annexing Persia, he said that Russia was not annexing Persia. If you are going to say that it is the responsibility and duty of Great Britain to guarantee the independence of the whole of the countries like Persia you will impose on Great Britain burdens greater than it can bear and an expenditure far greater than at present."

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

St. Petersburg, December 29.

ACCORDING to the latest advices the situation at Tabriz no longer justifies the slightest anxiety. Nearly 1,000 Russian troops are concentrated in the city. The Russian Consul reports that quiet is restored and that no more troops are necessary.

It has now become known that the uprising of Fedais nearly resulted in the wholesale massacre of the Russian force, which then numbered about 150. Before the end almost the whole of the ammunition was expended. Had the Fedais continued the fight a day longer the Russians would have been overpowered. Many here are asking who was responsible for the grave blunder of depleting the Tabriz detachment on the eve of an outbreak which had been openly prepared. It was this blunder which caused indirectly the loss of Russian lives, although it does not absolve the Fedais and their counsellors from responsibility for the dastardly attack.

Since the untoward consequences are traceable to Russian blundering, it may be questioned whether St. Petersburg was wise in deciding upon a punitive policy involving the abrogation of the sovereign rights of Persia. The Russian Government, of course, does not dream of annexing Persian territory or of countenancing the restoration of the ex-Shah—indeed, so long as Russian troops remain in Persia it may be safely asserted that Mohamed Ali will not resume the Throne—but the highly complex, responsible and dangerous task of meting out retribution to the Tabriz revolutionaries is likely to provoke further unjust accusations against Russia.

The story of the massacre of hundreds of women and children by the Russian troops is an absurd lie invented in Teheran. The rumour originating here of differences between M. Kokovtsoff and M. Sazonoff regarding Russia's policy in Persia has just as little foundation.

Among the callers at the Foreign Office to-day were Sir George Buchanan, the British Ambassador, and M. Louis, the French Ambassador, who has just returned from Paris. Both had prolonged conferences with M. Sazonoff.

Teheran, December 29.

Foreign Consular telegrams from Tabriz, while admitting that women and children were probably killed in the bombardment and that civilian townsfolk were killed in the street fighting, deny the charge of general Russian inhumanity but state that full details are still unknown. All fighting has, however, ceased; and disarmament is proceeding with Persian co-operation. The Deputy-Governor is in hast at the British Consulate.

The Teheran elections are notified for Wednesday. It is said that the early withdrawal of the Kazvin force is contemplated.

Tabriz, December 29.

The disturbances here began with a street collision between a Russian patrol and Persian Fedais on the night of the 10th. Their outbreak was a complete surprise to all, including the Russians, whose position was for some time precarious. Finally, however, after the arrival of reinforcements and the bombardment of the citadel and positions of the city, the Russians drove the Fedais out of the citadel and their occupation of the city is now complete. There were no casualties among the foreign residents. The Russian losses are believed to have been between one and two hundred. The mortality among the native non-combatants was not large, and the reports of atrocities by the troops on both sides are unfounded.—Reuter.

Teheran, December 29.

It is stated at the British Legation here that the British Acting Vice-Consul at Shiraz informed the local authorities of his intention before sending out the Sowars to meet Mr. Smart. Mr. Smart has not yet reached Kazerun.

It is believed that the Russian Government does not intend to demand an indemnity from the Persian Government for the disorders at Tabriz, but that it will impose certain conditions on Tabriz itself.—Reuter.

Reuter's Correspondent learns that the 14 American officials serving under Mr. Shuster consider their contracts violated by Persia's acceptance of the first two clauses of the Russian ultimatum subjecting their appointments to the approval of Great Britain and Russia, and that they do not contemplate remaining under any other conditions than an American.

Reuter's Agency understands that the Persian Government has expressed to Great Britain its regret for the attack on Mr. Smart and has declared that every possible step will be taken to prevent a recurrence of disorders. The British Government received yesterday of the receipt by the Acting Consul at Shiraz of a letter from Mr. Smart stating that the latter was still at Mahomet Ali Kashguli's house wounded in the thigh, but that he was proceeding at once to Kazerun.

St. Petersburg, January 2.

The Russian troops at Kazvin are being withdrawn to Resht. This movement is ostensibly prompted by a desire to strengthen the forces on the Caspian littoral, but in reality denotes the final abandonment of the idea of a possible march to Teheran and as such must be welcomed in the best interests of all the Powers immediately concerned. Some criticism in the Russian Press is presumably explicable by its indignation at the recent outrages upon Russian troops, the authors of which have been executed.

Teheran, January 2

It is reported that the Russians executed the Sikat-ul-Islam, the greatest ecclesiastic in Azerbaijan yesterday at Tabriz, with seven others, the day being the 10th of Moharrum, the Shi'ite mourning. Two regiments are being withdrawn from Kazvin to Resht in small detachments.

January 3.

The news is now definitely confirmed that on the 10th day of Moharrum the Russians hanged the Sikat-ul-Islam and two other clerics and the principal members of the Anjuman in the public square at Tabriz. The Government made every effort to suppress news in Teheran and the public did not suspect anything until to-day, but to-night the news seems to be spreading, though it is not yet public property. Whatever justification the Russians may have had on grounds of policy for the execution of so universally revered an ecclesiastic on the most sacred day of the Persian Holy Week, their action shows a lack of appreciation of the position of the Europeans scattered throughout Persia.

Moslem Feeling.

The Committee of Management of the Central National Muham-madan Association of Calcutta held a meeting on the 21st January and passed the following Resolution —

That as loyal subjects of the King, and deeply interested in the peaceful and contented development of the Indian peoples under the aegis of the British Crown, the Committee feel their duty to invite the attention of the British Nation to the ferment the Russian advance into Persia has already caused in India, to its injurious effect on the feelings of the Mussalman people; and they respectfully and earnestly join in the appeal that England should use her best endeavours to save Persia struggling for regeneration from a course of treatment which, if persisted in, must inevitably lead to her dissolution, a consummation neither desired by Great Britain nor conducive to the interests of the British Empire.

Transport in Southern Persia.

The following information is from the report of H.M. Vice-Consul at Bushire (Mr. H. G. Chick) on the trade of that district in the year ended 21st March, 1911, which will shortly be issued —

The chief importance of Bushire is as a forwarding town for the province of Fars, and as a terminus for exports from the country, before the troubles attendant on the change of constitution it was the most important commercial seaport of Persia. In 1907-8, partly owing, perhaps, to constitutional disturbances in the provinces bordering the northern frontier, the trade of the port of Bushire was flowing in steadily towards the high-water mark of its normal expansion. In the present state of the development of the country, from 1908 onwards the prosperity of the port, the hinterland, and the whole province of Fars has shown a steady decline, by reason that the focus of Persian anarchy has changed to the southern provinces, and embraces a large portion of the region which formed a market for British goods imported via the Persian Gulf.

The two main factors of moment to commerce are: (1) Security of the great caravan route, (2) security in the province of Fars.

Reference was made in the report for 1909-10 to the arbitrary change in the route followed which had been effected to suit the pleasure of the Ilkhan of the Kashgai tribe, who was being paid several hundred pounds each month by muleteers and merchants in order that they might make safe of merchandise passing safely through his tribal country.

The year under report opened with a mountainous route via Borazjan, Dabki and Jureh being followed. Owing to complications in the political situation at Shiraz, the Kashgai chieftain withdrew his guards from the Jureh route in May 1910; the post was twice attacked in following the telegraph road. The latter road became too dangerous for caravan traffic beyond Kazerun, and no parcels for up-country were accepted by the post. At the beginning of June the southern route via Firuzabad was adopted, and the Persian Government held responsible by the British Government for its security and the compensation for goods robbed along it.

In July 1910, the expedition of the Governor of Bushire against the chief of Tangistan made the road unsafe for caravans in the immediate proximity of Bushire. By October 1910, several caravan robberies had occurred on the Firuzabad route, and out of a caravan of 400 mules leaving Bushire on 20th October, 200 mules and their loads were carried off, including a great quantity of British-owned goods. Meanwhile the road between Shiraz and Isfahan had become even more dangerous owing to constant robberies, and caravans ceased to circulate except at intervals. The tribesmen on their autumn migration down country were particularly severe on the British telegraph lines destroying and robbing freely.

There was no immediate improvement after the issue of the British Note to Persia on 14th October, 1910. In November there was a movement by merchants resulting in caravans returning to the Kazerun route, for the Firuzabad route becomes impassable after the rains. The first caravan to pass, consisting of 383 mules, was robbed, 184 loads and 260 mules being carried off. Between October and December merchants forwarded only at great risk. In December letters were talking twenty days to and from Shiraz instead of six days. On 30th December the Persian Government stated officially that they were holding the Ilkhan of the Kashgus responsible for the security of the Kazerun route. No robberies occurred on the Bushire road after 5th December, when extraordinarily severe cold and snow made the road impassable for caravans over the passes till the end of February 1911. Meanwhile the new Governor-General, charged with putting Fars in order, had arrived early in January 1911, and his progress was marked with a certain amount of disturbance along the road. In March 1911, hostilities in the neighbourhood of Bushire prevented caravans from passing for some time. The Shiraz-Isfahan road remained practically closed to caravan traffic up till the end of the year, and, despite the arrival of Persian soldiery, three or four large caravans were attacked and looted in February.

The amount of the claims put forward by British commercial houses and traders and entered against the Persian Government for looted goods or denial of justice now totals about £4,950 as regards claims filed at Bushire, and about £9,000 as regards claims filed at Shiraz.

The state of the province of Fars prevented any supplies of goods which reached Shiraz from being distributed in the outlying districts, and in consequence the bazaars, both in Bushire and Shiraz, remained in a condition of spasmodic congestion. Pedlars, village dealers, and petty merchants could not circulate freely. The important sub-districts of Lar, Fasa, Kazerun and Behbahan were the scenes of considerable fighting and plundering. The Governor-General of Fars was twice changed in the period, after failures to deal successfully with the political situation; and increased loss of control and centralising power in the province reacted most unfavourably on trade.

On the other hand, the route to Mohamminerah and then via Ahwaz to Isfahan has not made good the decrease in forwardings via Bushire, and owing to congestion, insufficient supply of transport and the partial closure during the severe winter weather, a heavy accumulation of stocks at Ahwaz occurred by March 1911, and goods were experiencing excessive delay in reaching their destination. Whereas in a particularly bad year like 1900-10, 4,187 bales arrived at Isfahan over the Ahwaz road, in 1910-11 only 152 more bales reached Isfahan; in the last four months very few indeed.

A continuation of unfavourable conditions on the two main trade routes to Isfahan — which is one of the most important commercial centre of the Persia — had a particularly bad effect on business in cotton piece goods from Manchester.

In connection with the insecurity and frequent impassableness on these southern trade routes, and the consequently reduced import of British goods during the past three years, it may be noted that in the year ended March 1910, there was an increased import, as compared with the preceding year, of 1,318 tons of Russian piece goods into all Persia, as against a decrease of 1,874 tons of British goods.

No steps were taken by the Persian authorities to remedy the levy of blackmail, which is such a heavy charge, and reacts so unfavourably on trade passing over the road to Shiraz. These exactions have risen, according to the muleteers' statements, as follows.

				Per Mule
				Krans.
In June 1907	3'70
" January 1910	11'15
" June 1910	10'80
" October 1910	13'60
" February 1911	11'90

Thus on every ton of goods over a distance of only 180 miles these sums amounted in 1910-11 to the equivalent of from £1 7s. 5d. to £1 14s. 7d.

Lord Lamington's Speech.

LORD LAMINGTON delivered a lecture under the auspices of the Outlook Tower Committee in Drumsheugh Hall, Edinburgh, on "The Present Crisis in Persia." Professor Geddes presided over a large attendance.

Lord Lamington, who was received with applause, said he was there under the auspices of a society of a non-party character which took a philosophic view of things, and he considered that it was an advantage to secure the attention of people of that class who could take a cool review of the existing situation in Persia. He did not wish it for a moment to be supposed that he had any particular enmity against Russia. On the contrary, he wished Russia in the management of her wonderful Empire all success. All countries, he supposed, had ambitious policies of aggrandisement, and it was necessary, therefore, for those other countries affected by such policies to watch themselves. Above all he wished to have every possible relation of good will with the great country of Russia, but his view was that the policy which he wished to outline in the course of his remarks would secure that their relations with Russia should remain peaceful. Though he was a Unionist, he was not going to attack the Government at the present time. He believed the Government was strongly animated by a desire to secure a united and independent Persia; but what he would ask was—Had they taken those measures which were necessary to ensure that result? Going on to inquire what was the interest of this country in Persia, Lord Lamington pointed out that for generations they had policed the Persian Gulf, they had charted its waters, and made its navigation safe. They had settled disputes on shore, they had made expeditions and put down disorder, they used to keep a regiment at Baghdad, they had exercised all the duties and responsibility of sovereignty, but they had never acquired any territory or demanded any payment for their actions (Applause.) Now why did this country do all this? It was because they recognised that the fortunes of Persia were propped up with those of India. This had been formulated by Lord Curzon, who had said that Persia was the outlying glacis of the defences of India. There was also the consideration of their Indian trade with Persia and the Gulf, as also the fact that they were directly connected with Persia by that small but highly educated and commercially-minded group in India the Parsis.

Before 1907 there was no doubt that Russia was paramount in Northern Persia. At that time Persia was governed, or mis-governed, by the ex-Shah, who was practically a tool in the hands of Russia. Well after the Japanese War Russia was in an enfeebled state. This country had just emerged from the South African War, and about that time began what might be termed the German scare. Hence it was that they proposed an agreement with Russia in reference to Persia. That agreement took final shape as the Anglo-Russian Agreement. The first article of it stated that the object of the Convention was to secure the independence and integrity of Persia. The Government had assumed in debate that those who criticised their policy attacked the Convention. That was not so. Personally he highly approved of the Convention. What they complained of was that the maintenance of the integrity and independence of Persia had not been adhered to. There had been a party in Persia endeavouring to obtain some form of constitutional government from that corrupt ruler who was now ex-Shah. That culminated soon after the Convention was signed in a rebellion. The Shah was driven from the country and a Provisional Government was set up. That movement was looked upon as a god-send by those who wished to see the Convention carried out, as it was hoped that a new and improved Government might put Persia in a position to secure independence. But the two outside Powers gave no help. Some people did think that this country did not give that support to the national Government of Persia that might have been expected from it. (Applause.) Russia, of course, wanted a weak Persia. This country wanted a strong Persia. But in their policy of doing nothing that might offend Russia they had certainly excused almost every step that Russia had taken. He quite admitted that Persia might have failed in the attempt to establish constitutional government, but that was not to be wondered at in a country that for centuries had been under the worst form of government in the world, and which had such physical difficulties between the two parts of the country to surmount, with none of the resources of civilisation to enable them to do so.

He did not hesitate to say that Russia had viewed with the greatest dislike the movement on the part of Persia to put her house in order. He had a mine of information to prove his contention that it had not been the desire of Russia to see Persia entirely independent, and, perhaps unintentionally, he did not think the resources of diplomacy had been exhausted by the British Government in their endeavour to combat this attitude of Russia. Surely, without the slightest hostile feeling to Russia, they must look at her past history in other parts of the world. Look at her in the East, in Mongolia, in Central Asia. Had the policy there not been all along like what she was now taking to assert her supremacy in Northern Persia? It had been the Russian policy in the past to try to get a footing in Northern Persia and to follow that up by seeking a position in the Persian Gulf. It had been the policy of this country to prevent that on the part of Russia, and it had been his view that the Convention did give them the means of securing an independent Persia, of setting up a buffer state between Russia and themselves, and of restoring the ancient kingdom of Persia to be an integral force in the world's politics. But he was not so hopeful of that as he was when the Convention was signed. Russia had threatened Persia from obtaining a necessary loan with which to carry on the Government. Russian troops had steadily advanced into the country, and he thought there could not be a doubt that Russian officials had connived at the return of the ex-Shah of Persia to cause dispeace in the country.

Speaking of the Shuster incident, Lord Lamington said that no one denied Mr. Shuster's first-class ability or his honesty. Presumably he relied on the Convention's meaning what it said, and as the paid servant of Persia he with his fourteen American companions were getting the finances into order. He was accused of lack of tact, which was a poor charge on which to base the invasion of a country. In regard to the Stokes affair, possibly Mr. Shuster might have given way, but he wanted the best officer he could get, and Captain Stokes had been three years in Teheran. Our Government had allowed Captain Stokes to resign his commission in the army in order to take up work in Persia, so evidently in the first instance they saw no harm in his appointment. But the details of this and the other many incidents were immaterial construed in the light that the Russian's predominant position was not to be modified by the declaration establishing Persian independence. This made the position extraordinarily complex, and it was impossible to see what was to be the outcome of events. He much doubted whether Tabriz would in the future ever be under any authority except that of Russia. All that could be done was to secure the withdrawal of Russian troops from Kazvin whence they threatened Teheran. This should be done in compliance with our undertaking that on Persia accepting the terms of the ultimatum Russia would remove her force, this must be done, as thereby alone could the partition of Persia be guarded against. That would be a calamity that must be seen by everyone. Where would the boundary be drawn, and how should they defend it, and at what expense? He believed there was a strong party in Russia in the Duma opposed to the policy of territorial aggrandisement, and it would be in the interests of Russia as well as ourselves to keep Persia as a buffer state, unless she was really making a bid to come down to the Persian Gulf. Any such action was condemned in the strongest terms by Lord Lansdowne in 1903.

Sir Thomas Holdich recently showed in a lecture in London that from time immemorial there had been great irruptions into India for the purpose of loot and of aggrandisement in some way or other, and that India had in the whole history of the world always been an aim and object of people by which they might secure wealth. These irruptions had generally taken place through Northern India, through the great passes and over the vast mountain system, but, as Sir Thomas Holdich pointed out, nowadays very likely any inroad into India would lie through Persia. Therefore it behoved us in the interests of India, for the sake of our prestige in India, to see that nothing was done calculated to weaken our position on the frontier. Therefore he would say frankly that it was in the interests of India that they should endeavour to secure the independence of Persia, and that they should do so in the interests of those who had so gallantly during the last three or four years against such adverse odds maintained some form of government. He did not wish to see their gallant efforts altogether frustrated. It had taken many centuries to evolve our constitutional system. It took Japan forty to fifty years to evolve hers. Surely it was rather hard, when under such difficulties and with such lack of experience the Persian people had managed to carry on a form of constitutional government and had carried out great reforms, to add insult to injury by accusing the Persian Government of having brought misfortune on their heads by foolishness, as some of the leading organs of the press had said. His opinion was that we should admire those who had honestly tried to carry on some constitutional government. We ought to show them that we of Britain, the home of freedom, were their friends and viewed with sympathy their desire to establish freedom in their homes and country. He hoped that public attention would be awakened before it was too late and would be able to strengthen the Government in what he knew to be their honest desire—to see the letter and the spirit of the Anglo-Russian Convention carried out.

Mr. John Cowan moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting urges upon His Majesty's Government the necessity of Persia withdrawing her troops from Persia in compliance with her undertakings and in order that effect may be given to the Anglo-Russian Convention, which was intended to secure the independence and integrity of Persia."

Lord Lamington, in reply, said that he believed that it was necessary for the securing of good feeling between Britain and Russia that Persia should be set up as a free country.

Press Opinion.

The "Times."

From to-day's telegrams we are justified in saying that the Russo-Persian crisis is on the eve of settlement. The Persian Government, we are told, have definitely accepted the terms of the Russian ultimatum, and it is even stated, though not quite so definitely, that Mr. Shuster has already been dismissed. This was the first and most essential of the demands, and on it the Russian Government showed themselves inflexible. On the other two points, the right of Russia and Great Britain to veto the appointment of foreigners of whom they disapprove, and the payment of an indemnity, it was understood that some concessions, of form in one case and of substance in the other, might be made to Persian susceptibilities and Persian interests, and on them a compromise acceptable to both parties has apparently been reached. The Persian Government are warmly to be congratulated on their decision to yield and on the determination with which they have overcome the resistance of the Mejliss, the vast majority of whose members seemed resolved to defeat every attempt at an amicable settlement. If the Mejliss had had their way it is hard to see how Persia could have escaped humiliation and disasters far more serious than any involved in the acceptance of the ultimatum. In face of the excitement prevailing in Teheran and other centres it needed no little courage on the part of the Government to follow the unpopular if sensible course they are now reported to have adopted. We trust that their action will be appreciated in St Petersburg, and that the Russian Government will show their appreciation by doing everything possible to make the settlement as little unpalatable as may be to Persians among proper; and that the policy of both the Russian and the British Governments will be so guided as to consolidate the Anglo-Russian understanding and to promote the interests of Persia along the lines recently laid down by Sir Edward Grey, whose arguments were warmly endorsed by the Nouvelles Premys. After all, neither of the two Powers is entirely free from responsibility for the unsatisfactory developments of the last few months in Persia. The main blame must be ascribed to the incapacity, and worse, of the Persian governing Classes, and to the tactlessness of Mr. Shuster, whose remarkable qualities as a financier and an administrator were not matched by any corresponding grasp of political conditions. But there have been faults and mistakes on the other side. The Stokes affair reflected no credit on either the British or the Russian Foreign Office, and the negligence with which the Russians permitted the return of the ex Shah, and the passive attitude of our own Government until a short time ago, undoubtedly helped to bring about the crisis.

December 27

The long telegram from our Teheran correspondent which appeared yesterday on the latest developments in Persia is not very reassuring. The Government have indeed got rid of the Mejliss for the present, and the disappearance of that utterly childish and impracticable Assembly removes an obstacle to many indispensable measures. On the other hand, it may serve as a pretext for the continuance and the spread of disorders in the provinces, which already threaten this ancient Monarchy with dissolution from within. The explanation which Vosuk-ed-Dowleh gave to an assembly of merchants of the course taken by the Regent is unanswerable. It is, that the Mejliss impeded both the external and the internal action of the Government, and it impeded that action, we may add, to a degree which made either a reasonable foreign policy or a decent administration of home affairs impossible. Therefore, the Regent argued, it must be closed, and he has closed it. The step is unconstitutional, of course, but we believe it to have been justified in the best interests of Persia. The explanation was promptly followed by action. The session was closed by a Rescript, which contains, it is noted, no reference to fresh elections at an early date. The doors of the Parliament House were locked and a guard was set over the building. Martial law has been proclaimed in Teheran, and all the newspapers, except one, have been suppressed. This step followed naturally on the dismissal of the Mejliss; for, from the beginning of the revolution, the tone of most of these journals has been reckless and violent in the extreme. On Sunday some of the Deputies attempted to hold a meeting of protest in the bazaar, and when they were dispersed by the police they retired to a mosque, within whose sacred precincts they appear to have been suffered to continue their oratory un molested. If, as is supposed, Yezim and the Bakhtiari favour the action of the Regent, more than oratory will be needed to disturb him. Apparently he means to endeavour to carry on the Government with the help of the present Cabinet.

As we anticipated on Saturday that body has sent a reply to the latest Russian ultimatum which the Government of St Petersburg have accepted as satisfactory. Persia, of course, has had to assent to all three of the Russian demands, but that which relates to the future appointments of foreigners to posts under the Persian Government has undergone some slight modification in form. Persia now agrees not to make any such appointments without first exchanging views with the British and Russian Legations. It is not yet positively stated that Mr. Shuster has sent in his resignation; but, as the Persian Government have been informed that he accepts the ultimatum, he manifestly recognizes that he can no longer hold office with advantage to the country. The difficulties threatened by the attitude of the Imperial Bank, which refuses, it is said, to disburse the funds in its keeping without his authority until his successor has been named or the law has been altered, will, doubtless, be got over.

They illustrate the wisdom and the urgency of Sir Edward Grey's suggestion to the Russian Government that such a successor, acceptable to both England and Russia, should be appointed without delay. The choice of some competent foreigner, who will discharge with equal zeal and ability, but with more tact and discretion, the responsible duties which he undertook to perform, is plainly the first step in that constructive policy for Persia which Sir Edward has declared that we are bound to take in hand as soon as the present crisis is over. In the sketch of that policy which he drew in the House shortly before Parliament rose, he insisted, as we have often insisted in these columns, that the foundation of all progress in Persia must be financial, and a sound financial policy is out of the question until Mr. Shuster's post is adequately filled. Without order there can be no revenue and no trade, and without money there can be no police and no Gendarmerie to keep order. It is because he realizes this fundamental fact in the position that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs advocates the co-operation of England and Russia in bringing about a loan to Persia, and that he deprecates the exaction by Russia of a Persian indemnity.

The latest news, it must be acknowledged, does not encourage the expectation that the prosecution of a constructive policy is well within sight. Though Persia has acceded to the ultimatum, the end of the crisis appears to be remote. Since Thursday last Russian troops have been in conflict with Persians at Tabriz, Enzeli, and Resht. Accounts differ, as is usual in such cases, about the origin of these affrays, but however they began, their continuance must hamper and retard the practical adoption of the policy which Sir Edward Grey has commended to Parliament. The statement from Teheran that the fighting in Tabriz has been desperate and that the Russian losses there have been heavy receives some support from the St. Petersburg message published on Monday, which asserts that the Viceroy of the Caucasus has been ordered to send all available reinforcements to Tabriz. It is, of course, inevitable that, where Russian troops have been attacked on Persian soil, Russia should show that attacks of the kind are not to be made with impunity. It is natural, too, that Russian newspapers should speak of such attacks with indignation. We should, however, be sorry to suppose that the language attributed in a Reuter message on Monday to a high official in the Russian Foreign Office, or that employed by the Nouvelles Premys in regard to the collisions at Tabriz and the other Persian towns could be taken to express the views of the Russian Government. It cannot but have a bad effect on influential sections of British opinion, and it cannot prepare the way for the future policy in Persia which Sir Edward Grey has described as the policy of this country, and which we believe to be also the policy of the Russian Government.

The "Near East."

THE sudden return of the ex-Shah with his devoted follower, Alishad ed Dowleh, was alleged to have strengthened Russia's policy of non intervention, and, in fact, caused little material change. The attitude of Mr. Shuster and the appointment of Captain Stokes were the primary factors in the ensuing complications. That Mr. Shuster is not only convinced that he is acting in the best interests of the country, but that he has also done excellent service, we have every reason to believe. The whole-hearted support he has received from the Mejliss is sufficient proof of this, but he cannot be complimented on the way he has played his cards. So much has been said of the mutual sympathy between Russia and England that one might well have thought that an easy way out of such temporary embarrassments might well have been found, unless, of course, some sinister intrigue is at work behind the scenes. And if such be the case, his letter to The Times put the game into his enemy's hand. But the consequences of the negotiations may be of far greater importance than the affaire itself. We have by no means fathomed their full extent. One thing is very certain, and that is our co-operation with Russia has resulted in the defeat of the very aim which we have pursued so long—the maintenance of Persia as a buffer State. We cannot but suspect that the loud advertisement in Russian newspapers of Russia's non-intervention policy was part and parcel of a well-devised scheme. There was no need to trouble about an ex-Shah; the more disturbance, the better; an aggressive move, of course, on the plea of protection of interests, would only come at the right moment. A great many words have been wasted on our loyalty to the Anglo-Russian Agreement, a phrase which seems to give such general satisfaction to the St. Petersburg Press that one is almost led to construe "loyalty" as meaning "connivance." If, however, the Foreign Office has winked at such callous tampering with Persian influence, there must have been strong reasons for such a course of action. Was it perchance due to apprehension of any friction with Russia in the present complex state of European politics? Were this the case, the real value of the Triple Entente can be gauged at once. But for the moment conjecture is unseasonable. The glass into which we are gazing is dark. It will be clearer when Russia presents the bill for her expenses in sending up troops. That will be the moment for appraising the real worth of our diplomatic tactics.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

REUTER wires from Rome:—Four hundred Turks and Arabs attacked the block-house at Benghazi on the 18th instant but were repulsed, losing 29 killed.

Another fierce all-day battle was fought at Tripoli on the 19th instant. The Turks attacked the Italians, who were erecting two forts at Gargaress. The Italians repulsed the Turks, but were themselves compelled to withdraw at nightfall, as their defences had not been completed. The Italian casualties numbered fifty, while those on the Turkish side are reported to have been heavy.

Italian warships later bombarded Zoara. The bombardment of Zoara was due to the garrison having opened fire on Italian patrol boats. Many buildings were destroyed as a result of the bombardment, and the Turkish trenches demolished.

Reuter wires from Rome.—Italians re-occupied Gargaress. They found no traces of the enemy within a radius of five miles. This is regarded as confirming the seriousness of their losses. The enemy admit having had over 150 killed alone.

Reuter wires from Rome:—The Italian Government has ordered the release of the French steamer Carthage on receiving satisfactory assurances from France.

The Manouba mail steamer, seized by Italians, was released on her landing twenty-nine Turks, who, the Government was informed, were officers taking money to Tripoli from Marselles.

The Captain of the Manouba says the seizure of the vessels was due to his refusal to surrender the Turks, who he declares, are Red Crescent male nurses.

The German steamer Schleswig, accompanying the French mail steamer Manouba, was searched at the time of the seizure of the latter vessel, but was released.

A committee of French shipowners has requested M. Poincaré to make a strong protest against what they describe as the continued violation of treaties, citing the case of the Manouba as an example and to expedite the establishment of International Prize Courts.

Reuter wires from Paris:—French papers are full of very strong comments on the Italian seizures of French steamers. They demand that firm measures be taken to prevent a recurrence of such incidents. Some attribute Italy's action to the influence of a third party exercised in connection with the visit of Herr von Kiderlen-Wachter, who arrived in Rome this morning. They also declare that the release of the vessels will not close the matter, as the Government will insist on compensation.

The Matin states that France claimed the liberation of the Manouba's Turkish passengers, but Italy refused.

A telegram to the Daily Chronicle from Paris states that France intends making a naval demonstration off the Italian coast in the event of Italy's reply to the captured Turks being unsatisfactory. The paper adds that orders have been sent to Toulon to hold a squadron in readiness. Whether this is true or otherwise the situation seems grave and is complicated by the mystery of a telegram in cypher to the Consul at Cagliari telling him to surrender the Turks while the French Government asserts that no such telegram was sent. The French papers hint that the telegram was tampered with and talk of the famous Ems despatch preceding the Franco-German war. The Italians maintain that their action was justified. They declare that the prisoners carried no surgical appliances and were not doctors.

Not a word has been received confirming the statement in the Daily Chronicle.

While the French papers on the 22nd instant continue to insist upon the liberation of the Turks who were removed from the French mail boat Manouba on the ground that the national honour is involved, they assure Italy that France will afterwards loyally investigate the identity of the Turks. They express the conviction that friendship between France and Italy is strong enough to ensure a prompt settlement of what is simply a misunderstanding.

Reuter wires from Paris:—There was an unprecedented scene of enthusiasm in the Chamber of Deputies on the 22nd instant, even the Socialists applauding, as the result of a statement by M. Poincaré, the Premier, that neither in international nor in civil law could France surrender the Turks seized on board the French steamer Manouba. Only after Italy had given up the Turks could the necessary investigation be permitted. M. Poincaré said he had taken steps to this end and was confident that Italy would recognise the necessity of settling such incidents in conformity with justice and preventing any recurrence. Italy's reply, he continued, gave assurance of a speedy solution in a friendly conversation between the two Governments. If any difference remained, they would be settled by arbitration. M. Poincaré explained that the French Charge d'Affaires at Rome was responsible for the surrender of the Turks to Italy. Regarding the steamer Carthage he pointed out that Italy had committed an error to the detriment of French interests. The Premier concluded his speech by the declaration that the incidents were powerless to disturb the relations between France and Italy, which were based on common memories, affinity of race, and mutual interests.

Reuter wires from Paris:—Italy has proposed that the cases of seizure of French vessels shall be submitted to the Hague Court of Arbitration.

The French papers of all shades of opinion applaud M. Poincaré for his firmness combined with conciliatoriness. They state that Government informed Italy that provided the Turks were brought back to a French port, the identity would be investigated and the testimony of Italians taken. All other points of dispute would be submitted to the Hague. The papers add that France will insist upon compliance, forcing, if necessary as far as a diplomatic rupture.

There is every prospect of an amicable settlement of the Franco-Italian dispute regarding the Manouba incident. Reuter wires from Paris on the 24th.—M. Legrand, French Charge d'Affaires at Rome, has demanded that Marquis Di San Giuliano, Minister for Foreign Affairs, release the Turks who were removed from the Manouba. Marquis di San Giuliano has delayed reply until to-day and will in the meantime confer with the Premier. Reuter wires from Perim on the 24th.—The Italians have stopped the Austrian Lloyd liner Bregenz.

Reuter wires from Hodeidah on 16th January.—An Italian gunboat has overhauled the British ship Africa going from Hodeidah to Aden, near Perim, and removed twelve Turkish officers, including Rya Bey, the famous Yemen veteran.

Owing to the activity of Italian warships in the Red Sea and the Mediterranean and the consequent prohibitive insurances, the banks find it impossible to ship gold from Asia Minor to Europe and Egypt, where it could be profitably employed.

Italy has notified the Powers that she has established an effective blockade of the Ottoman Coast in the Red Sea, between latitudes 15 degrees 11 minutes and 14 degrees 30 minutes (in the neighbourhood of Hodeidah and opposite Massowa) and further that vessels attempting to evade the blockade will be dealt with in conformity with international law and treaties.

Reuter wires from Constantinople.—It is reported that the Italians have cut the cable between Suakim and Hodeidah.

The Aden correspondent of the Times of India in his letter, dated 15th January, says.—The Italian warships still appear to be very active cruising in the Red Sea and searching all suspected ships in Hodeidah and other Turkish ports in the Red Sea and country craft going from Djibutti and other places to the Turkish ports.

According to advices received last evening from Hodeidah the Italian cruisers Arethusa and Piemonte went to Abbas, a place on the coast which lies some distance from Al Gabbana and bombarded it, destroying some buildings and huts. From Ibn Abbas, the warships proceeded to the Turkish port of Lohia which is about one day from Hodeidah and opened fire on it but no serious losses are reported. The Italian cruisers are now reported to be bombarding Meedi and Salif which are some twelve hours' distance from Hodeidah. In view of the operations of Italian warships and destroyers, the dhows trade between Aden and Turkish ports in the Red Sea is now practically at a standstill. Some of the Aden merchants and traders who are interested in this trade have submitted a petition to the Political Resident protesting against the operations of Italian warships in searching and seizing their dhows. The Aden Chamber of Commerce is taking the matter up and will probably make representations to the Resident on the subject.

Cawasjee's steamer Africa was stopped yesterday by Italian warships at a point some hours' distance from Perim while on her way to Aden and twelve Turks who were on board the steamer were seized. The Turks were coming to Aden from Hodeidah and are now reported to have been taken to Massowa. One of them was released on showing that he was a trader and arrived here to-day with a Turkish doctor.

Reuter wires from Constantinople:—A telegram from Jaffa states that an Italian warship on the 19th instant bombarded Khan-Yunas (Syria, close to the Egyptian frontier).

The Moslem League has collected mainly from India a sum of £2,400 sterling for the Red Crescent Fund. Two doctors, a dresser, a dispenser and two male nurses are being sent to Tripoli almost immediately, with equipment as a small field hospital for the relief of the sick and wounded Ottoman combatants.

Reuter wires from Vienna.—Count von Androsch, the Austrian Premier, is reported to be originally ill.

The Press has recently made violent attacks on the Count in connection with his over-friendly attitude towards Italy, and there have been rumours of his resignation.

Reuter wires from Rome:—Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter, German Minister for Foreign Affairs, visited Marquis di San Giuliano, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Signor Giolitti, the Premier. The King on entering the banquet in the evening conferred a high decoration on Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter. Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter has left Rome.

News by the English Mail.

Rome, December 29.

THERE has been a sharp engagement outside Derna. On the morning of the 26th a force under the command of General Delbruno advanced up the Derna river with the object of protecting the engineers who were repairing the aqueduct which supplies the town with water. The column came into contact with a large force of the enemy, who attempted a turning movement against the Italian right. General Capello delivered a counter-attack, and succeeded in driving back the Turks and Arabs. The Italian force then retired to its intrenchments, having lost three killed and 77 wounded.—Reuter.

The Ottoman Embassy has received the following official information on the fighting at Tobruk on the 23rd instant:—

"The Commander of the Turkish forces at Tobruk has informed the War Ministry in Constantinople that on December 22 he made a successful attack upon the fortified positions of the enemy. The battle lasted the whole day and night. In spite of the heavy fire of the warships and the forts' batteries, a Turkish detachment obliged the enemy's garrison to retreat and took possession of the fort. Arms, ammunition, machine-guns, stores and one mitrailleuse fell to the Ottoman troops. In their forward movement a Turkish corps succeeded in cutting the retreat of the enemy, who dispersed in the direction of the coast, incurring the loss of three officers and half of their effective, while the total losses on the Turkish side were seven killed and a small number wounded. The valiant Sheikh Merri, who together with his five sons fought at the head of his tribe is amongst the dead. Nedjib Bey, a Turkish lieutenant, was the first to enter the fort. He destroyed the mitrailleuses of the enemy and carried one across to the Turkish camp."

[*An Italian semi-official statement contradicts the Turkish version of this engagement, and says that the Turks were repulsed with heavy loss.]

Constantinople, December 30.

Pursuing their obstructionist tactics, the Opposition and a group of the independents, by abstaining from attendance at the Chamber, prevented a quorum from being obtained. The proceedings were, therefore, of an informal character. Nevertheless the Grand Vizier, who was accompanied by the entire Cabinet, explained, in a long statement, the proposed modification of the Constitution, which, he said, was necessary for the establishment of a strong Government able to carry out the reforms required by the country. Continuing he quoted a letter to the Temps, which stated that if Italy was able to prosecute her African venture successfully, it was because of Turkey's internal quarrels. Mahmud Shevket Pasha, Minister of War, declared in an emphatic manner that no Cabinet to which he belonged would think of striking a blow at the Constitution. Besides, the glorious Ottoman Army was there, the guardian of their liberties. (Applause.) The Grand Vizier and the Ministers then withdrew to deliberate on the situation, and after an absence of an hour the Grand Vizier announced to the Chamber his decision to resign, as he felt that the Government did not possess a sufficient majority. He added that the responsibility for the situation thus created devolved upon the Opposition. Mahmud Shevket Pasha denied the report that an officer of the Adrianople garrison threatened him with death, and added that the report was spread for the purpose of sowing dissension in the Army.—Reuter.

Constantinople, January 3.

The Cabinet has been formed without Talaat Bey, who has declined office for the present. Memduh Bey, Minister of Justice, will act as Minister of the Interior. Emrullah Effendi takes the place of Abdurrahman Sherif as Minister of Education, Siqipian Effendi becomes Minister of Public Works, and Anstadi Pasha Minister of Mines and Forests. There are no other changes.

Cairo January 3.

In order to preclude the possibility of an eventual demand for an indemnity on the part of Italy the Egyptian Government is continuing to take the most stringent measures for the prevention of the smuggling into Tripoli of arms and ammunition destined for the Turkish forces. With this object the coastguards have been reinforced by a detachment of infantry sent a fortnight ago to Sollum and by police. Posts have been established all along the coast from Sollum to Alexandria, and the western land frontier of Egypt is being carefully watched. The latter task is carried out by swift camel patrols and trackers. In the belief that the Turks might attempt to send contraband of war and small parties of soldiers by way of the Suez Canal, posts have been established along this line as well, and a camel corps detachment and some infantry have been despatched to Ismailia. In all between 500 and 600 men, consisting of coastguards, police, Bedouin trackers, and the troops mentioned, are being employed.

Rome, December 29.

The declarations of Count Aehrenthal before the delegations in Vienna, following as they do the equally friendly manifestations made towards Italy by Count Andrássy, give great satisfaction in Italy, where there is for the present moment no desire to see any weakening of the Triple Alliance. Both the Rome Ministerial newspapers, however, the Popolo Romano and the Tribuna, while noting the tribute paid by Count Aehrenthal to the good faith of Italy and the sincerity of her attention not to extend the sphere of war, seem disposed to resent a little the supposition that any possible disturbances in the Balkans could be attributable to the struggle in Tripoli. If Balkan complications do ensue the fault will not lie with the Italians, but with the policy of the Committee of Union and Progress, who not only made war inevitable, as far as the Italians were concerned, but have also done nothing since but excite hatred of Turkish rule among all the non-Turkish populations of the Empire. Further, although Italy fully shares Count Aehrenthal's wish that peace may speedily be concluded with honour for both belligerents, the Tribuna thinks it right that he should remember that for Italy there can be only one honourable condition of peace, namely, entire and full sovereignty in Tripoli and Cyrenaica such as was formulated in the Royal Decree of November 5.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, December 31.

THE failure of the inter-party negotiations and the resignation of the Cabinet which followed it yesterday came as a surprise. This turn of events appears to be due in part to desertions from the Committee, and in part to a certain misunderstanding between the Grand Vizier and the Committee leaders. As I pointed out in my message of 26th December and as proved by certain passages of his speech addressed to Ottoman public opinion yesterday, Said Pasha from the first resented the readiness of the Committee leaders to discuss alterations in the present Cabinet or the formation of a new Cabinet with representatives of the Opposition. He therefore availed himself of the first good pretext offered to resign office. The lesson was not thrown away upon the Committee party, which decided, at a meeting held last night, to press for his re-appointment to the Grand Vizierate and to render him unswerving obedience and support for the remainder of the Session. This decision, if adhered to, may prove the salvation of the blac which for a variety of reasons is most unwilling to dispense with the present Grand Vizier. But it is now doubtful whether the Committee possesses more than a bare majority, if that, in the Chamber. The Union and Liberty Party with their Greek allies muster nearly 100 votes. The attitude of the eight or nine Armenian Tashtakist Deputies is doubtful. The failure of their committee to secure the election of their nominee to the Patriarchate has shown them that their recent policy is not altogether favourably viewed by the strong Conservative element among the Armenians and the recent abstention of their Deputies from voting may be a prelude to a change of attitude towards the Committee of Union and Progress, which hitherto as a general rule they have supported. Seven of ten Albanian Deputies belonging to the Committee including Bedri Bey, father of Mazhar Bey, Vali of Kosovo during the insurrection in 1910, seceded last night and the balance of Parliamentary power seems for the moment to be held by some 25 Independents, mostly Committee insurgents who are supporting the temporary suspension of Parliamentary debates and opposed to any further modification of Article 35. The Committee will doubtless make every endeavour to regain their support, but personal questions are likely to make reunion difficult. A great responsibility now rests on the Sultan, who, I believe, has been advised by the Committee to reappoint Said Pasha as Grand Vizier, with Nessib Effendi, Grand Cadi of Egypt, as Sheikh-ul-Islam. The alternatives are an Opposition Ministry—the composition of which has taxed the imagination of even the local political prophets—and a Cabinet d'Affaires. His Majesty is known to favour the temporary prorogation of Parliament. Reports concerning his attitude towards a dissolution of the Chamber vary. In any case it is well known that he shares the anxiety of every patriotic Ottoman in regard to the present crisis.

(FROM THE "DAILY MAIL" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, December 31.

AT last definite developments have taken place in the Turkish political crisis. Said Pasha yesterday resigned his position as Grand Vizier, because, owing to Opposition obstruction, he was unable to pass the amendment to the Constitution enabling the Sultan to dissolve the Chamber without the approval of the Senate.

To-day the Sultan re-entrusted Said Pasha with the formation of a new Cabinet. The Opposition sent a deputation to the Sultan to-day. I happened to be in the Palace when they came. They assured the Sultan that the country was in a deperate condition, and stated that they did not want to interfere with the Imperial Prerogative, but they urged him not to appoint Said Pasha as Grand Vizier again. The Sultan snubbed the deputation with fatherly dignity with the remark that the appointment of the Grand Vizier was his affair.

News from Turkish Sources.

Al-Liwa, December 28.

Our Aden correspondent writes that news received this side from various sources states that the Ottoman Government is endeavouring in a determined fashion to increase its influence and prestige in the Red Sea and is on the lookout for important strategic points. The Vali of Yemen had asked the Porte to forward some artillery and ammunition to Shaikh Said immediately. Two regiments of infantry and some batteries have been sent.

Mocha news states that a considerable quantity of war materials has been collected there from Taz and other places and more than a thousand troops have been concentrated. Arab tribes are also assembling there in thousands. All Italian goods have been rigorously boycotted. In Mocha and Hodeidah everything suspected to be of Italian manufacture is immediately cast away. There is no limit to the enthusiasm and the excitement of the people. All old jealousies have vanished and the one thought of all, whether denizen of the town or dweller of the desert, is to safeguard the Ottoman Caliphate.

CONSIDERABLE light is thrown on the state of affairs in Tripoli by a letter of Osmani Fikri of Tripoli which he has written after his leaving Tripoli to Al-Liwa and which is published by that journal in its issue of the 7th January. He writes that the Italians rush into mosques and jeer at the prayers. Once a Muezzin was killed by them as he was intoning the call to the Zuhr prayers. Women are forced to go about with uncovered faces on pain of death.

While all this will pain the Mussalmans—except such perhaps as are opposed to the purdah of Moslem ladies—the following would pain the pro-Italians who sing paeons of praise of Italian courage. Osmani Fikri says he is an eye witness of the fact that Italian soldiers are ordered to attack the Turks but refuse to do so and one such soldier was sent to prison in his presence.

Italy has established a court composed, beside of Italians, of Haji Qasim Mirza, formerly an official of the Ottoman Government, Ibrahim Kabir formerly Mufti of the city and Amin Farqani. The Italian authorities send for the Sheikhs and compel their sons to enlist in their army and whosoever refuses to do so is brought before this Court and sentenced to death.

Some of the prominent Mussalmans of Tripoli who have sold themselves to the Italians include Mustafa bin Qadarah, the Deputy for Homs in the Turkish Chamber, two former Revenue Officials under the Ottomans, a Municipal Commissioner, a merchant and a poet. Mahmud Shafec, the brother of Qarmanli, who was also a high Turkish official is among them, and Sheikh Abdur Rahman, who was the Qazi, has been re-appointed as such by the Italians. These and other less prominent men display Italian medals on their breasts and endeavour to induce Mussalmans to submit to Italy.

Moslem Feeling.

The Committee of Management of the Central National Muhammadan Association of Calcutta held a meeting on the 21st January and passed the following Resolution:—

That in view of the profound feeling of indignation at the Italian invasion of Tripoli, in violation of the Law of Nations, which, as the most recent reports coming from the East attest, is not confined to Mussalmans, and of the certainty that a continuance of the conflict will aggravate the bitterness on both sides, and that any extension of hostilities, as has been threatened by Italy, will add to the growing unrest, the Committee of the Central National Muhammadan Association feel it their loyal duty to appeal to their fellow-subjects all over the British Empire to urge upon the Italian Nation to desist, out of regard for their own traditional love of liberty, from the prosecution of the war to subjugate a people, whom they had avowedly gone to liberate from the Turkish yoke, and who have now shown by their determined opposition their repugnance to submit to a rule wholly alien to them by race and religion; and that in any case the Italian Army, in remembrance of their own struggles, should not treat as "rebels" the inhabitants of the invaded country fighting for freedom, or be permitted to destroy their date and olive plantations which supply their chief sustenance.

Al-Liwa states that till the 10th December 78,879 guineas had been collected by the Red Crescent Society of Cairo. Collections in the neighbouring districts are not included in this amount. The Alexandria Fund, for which the 24th instalment is being collected, is also excluded. An earlier issue states that "during the last week single Provincial Branch of the Red Crescent Society has collected 8,413 guineas."

Al-Liwa states that in appreciation of the affection and sincerity of regard towards Prince Zia-ud-Din shown by H.H. the Khedive during the former's visit to Egypt, H.I.M. the Sultan sent to the Khedive a special firman expressive of his great satisfaction together with a valuable portrait of himself. The portrait is an object of art, the Sultan's name being inset in the Kufi characters in diamonds. The whole frame is formed out of precious stones skilfully pieced together and has the Turkish Crown in diamonds and rubies at the top.

At Taragqi, the Arabic journal published in Constantinople, states in its issue of 18th December that the Red Crescent Society's party from Egypt with medical stores and necessary equipment and a body of medical men had reached the seat of war. One of the earliest discoverers of the Dum-Dum bullets used by the Italians was a member of this party, and thus the rumours carried from the seat of war and denied from Rome have been fully confirmed. Sixty members of this Society from Egypt are at present working on the field. It is difficult to praise their enthusiasm and love adequately.

Al-Liwa publishes in its issue of the 19th December the telegraphic communications that have passed between Abdul Aziz Saoud, the Amir of Najd, H.I.M. the Sultan, the Grand Vizier, the Minister of the Interior, and the War Minister, showing the readiness of the Chief of Najd to serve the Caliphate with men and money and the Sultan's appreciation of his offer, together with the War Minister's promise of acceptance should necessity arise.

Bombardment of the Hospitals.

Mr. Alan Ostler, the Special Correspondent of the Express, who is with the Turk and Arab force at Ain Zara writes from that place under date of 25th November.

Hitherto the truth about Tripoli has been sedulously kept by the Italian censors from reaching Europe; and I believe that since the news of that hideous massacre of women and children leaked out nothing has been known.

But though that massacre—I could add a score of almost incredible details to those already made known—though that massacre is Italy's most revolting crime against civilisation, it is by no means the only one.

The Italians have bombarded our hospitals here, although the white flag flies from the roofs. This is not done in ignorance. Bombs have been deliberately dropped on them from aeroplanes; and the Italian gunners, having watched the hurried transference of sick and wounded from one hospital to another, have intentionally made a target of the new shelter.

They have flatly refused to allow any medical stores to reach the Turkish army. Our doctors have not enough drugs or surgical instruments, and bandages have to be improvised from strips of clothing. Our sick and wounded—among them an English officer, who has lain in bed for six weeks with dysentery—are suffering for want of proper attention. The Italians know it, and have refused the application made to them for permission to pass medical stores through to the Turks.

The Bay of Sollum.

THE western boundary of Egypt was authoritatively shown in a map sent by the Sultan to the famous Khedive, Mehmet Ali, in 1841. This map was accidentally burnt and the Turks refuse to produce their copy of it which would settle a dispute that subsequently arose as to where that boundary actually lies. Disputary negotiations on the point have been in progress between the Egyptian and Turkish Governments since 1904. Britain has always contended that Sollum was within Egyptian territory. The Turks said Ras-el-Kanais was the border.

When the Tripoli war broke out, Italy proclaimed a blockade of the coast as far as Ras-el-Kanais. The Egyptian Government objected and Italy acknowledged a "geographical error" and fixed the limit of her operations at the westward of Sollum Bay. The Turks have now ceded the disputed territory to Egypt until the termination of the war.

The importance of Sollum Bay to Egypt is this:—To reach to the west of it has a good harbour which, if Tripoli eventually falls to Italy, could be made a powerful naval base, from which the Powers of the Triple Alliance could threaten the Eastern Mediterranean. The Bay of Sollum provides a much finer harbour than Tobruk, and its possession by Egypt deprives the latter of its strategic value. —Times, 7 Jan.

Very erroneous descriptions of the Bay of Sollum, which has recently been occupied by the Egyptian Government, have appeared in some of the Home papers. It has been called "an excellent port" and "a potential naval base," while one journal wrote of it as "the finest harbour in these parts." All this is nonsense. Sollum is not a port at all but an anchorage, offering shelter only from westerly winds in seven or eight fathoms. Its value lies in the fact that it is the nearest point on the Mediterranean to the Siwah oasis, and is the sea end of the most direct route along a string of oases to the Soudan. Sollum has also been described as close to Tobruk, which is also misleading, as there is a good hundred miles of coast between them. Tobruk is a more important anchorage and would be of great value in any struggle for naval supremacy in the eastern basin of the Mediterranean. In 1801 the French Admiral, Gauthaume, saved his squadron by putting into Tobruk, of which the British officers, according to Rear-Admiral Smyth, who surveyed the coast in the early part of the last century, were "utterly ignorant." Tobruk, however, as we have pointed out, is a long way from the Egyptian frontier.—Statesman.

A puzzling arrangement has been reached between Turkey and Egypt in regard to the extreme eastern strip of the Tripoli Coast, some two hundred miles long. It is important chiefly because of the good, deep-water roadstead at Sollum. Egypt has always contended that this territory was part of the Vilayet of Egypt granted to Mehemet Ali and his descendants. The dispute has never been settled, nor even seriously pressed, and the map accompanying the firman of 1841, if it ever was drawn, has been lost. Turkey now makes over this region to Egypt to be occupied temporarily during the war, subject to final settlement at its close. No authoritative explanation is forthcoming. There is apparently some anger in Italy, but only among the less well-informed.

Italy had already partly allowed the claim of Egypt by withdrawing this bit of coast-line from the blockade. Turkey, presumably, is glad to diminish the eventual gain of Italy. Italy, on the other hand, may well have consented from the first to pay blackmail in return for a free hand to carry out her brigandage. France, by a parallel movement, has occupied the disputed oasis of Djanet, which the Turks had so long defended against her. It is generally assumed that Egypt and Great Britain are in this contest on identical terms, and that we are interested in Sollum as a possible naval base. Malta one would have thought sufficient! It may be useful to remember that the Khedive is very largely interested in a light railway scheme to serve this whole region between Cyrenaica and Alexandria.—Nation.

A great deal of ink has been wasted in the newspapers over the despatch to Sollum of a small Egyptian force to reinforce the coastguards who are there engaged in preventing the smuggling of arms into Cyrenaica. A portion of the German Press has made a gallant effort to represent it as a move against Italy and as an attempt to extend the borders of Egypt at the expense of the territory annexed but not yet conquered by the Italians. In this they have failed, as they were bound to fail Italy, by excluding Sollum and the coast to the east of Sollum from the area of the naval blockade established at the beginning of the war, recognised that it was Egyptian territory and not included in the provinces to which she laid claim. As the Egyptian force was sent to Sollum by arrangement with the Porte, which withdrew the small Turkish guard originally stationed there, attempts to excite feeling in Turkey have been equally fruitless. The territory in question has always been claimed as Egyptian by the Egyptian Government, and though at times the Porte has tried to maintain that the frontier was much further to the east at Ras el Kanais, it has never seriously resisted the Egyptian claims. The duty of preventing the contraband trade in arms has made it necessary to establish a frontier post there as at other places. The necessity has been recognised both by the Italians and the Turks, and the attempts of third parties to make mischief out of it may be safely disregarded.—Near East.

Paris, December 22.

The Times this evening discusses the comments which the Egyptian occupation of Sollum have excited in Germany, Italy and elsewhere. The special reasons which have rendered this action more than ever necessary in view of the campaign in Tripoli are recognised, and the British explanations are accepted here as they appear to have been accepted in Italy. It is acknowledged that the occupation does not constitute a new departure, and that, far from being directed against Italy, it is calculated to limit, if not altogether to suppress, the Turkish contraband arms traffic in Cyrenaica. In French opinion the incident, out of which mischief-makers have endeavoured to make capital, has served to proclaim afresh the friendship between England and Italy.

According to the same journal the situation of the oasis of Djanet in French territory is so indisputable that its occupation by French troops can scarcely be made the subject of an exchange of views with Italy.

The Salonica Congress of 1911.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT LATELY IN SALONIKA.)

THE decisions of the annual Congress of the Committee of Union and Progress, held at Salonika in 1910, were published in The Times on October 3. Although the Congress of 1911, which sat at Salonika from September 30 to October 10, occupied itself with the consideration of numerous questions, some details of which are already known, the subjects to which the Assembly must have devoted most of its attention seem to have little connexion with the decisions already published. An account of the intimate discussions of the latest Assembly of the Committee, which reached me from a trustworthy source, is therefore of peculiar interest. The importance of the document is increased because, whilst the ideas of the Committee are shown to have been modified in some respects, the determination of the leaders of this still important organization to maintain the specially privileged position occupied by the Turks in Turkey is as apparent as ever. Moreover, most of the decisions by which the Congress seems to have desired to make a demonstration of its change of policy—a change brought about by recent events—are counterbalanced by others in a way which proves that concessions granted in one direction are to be rendered valueless by regulations made in another.

The Congress decided that religious associations must not interfere in politics. But the Moslem population must be convinced that the Constitution is not in contravention of the Sacred Law; while more intelligent and sympathetic methods must be employed for spreading the use of the Turkish language among the non-Moslem elements of the population. Small Governmental offices would have to be filled by Christians who knew the Turkish language, but such posts as that of Vali or Mutessarif must always be occupied by Turks. At the same time, a Christian might be nominated as Vali of one province in order to prove that the Government is not anti-Christian. For the present the disarmament of Christians must be discontinued, because its prolongation causes too much disturbance. The authorities must, however, carefully ascertain where the Christians are in possession of arms and where they are not. The Moslem population must be armed, and Turkish bands should be secretly employed for the pursuit of Christian bands and for the extermination of people who are in communication with revolutionaries. For the present the settlement of Muhadjirs in Turkey by the Government should be discontinued, but if immigrants wish to instal themselves in Turkey they should be shown districts in which they can live. The attitude of the party headed by Sadik Bey has given the Congress cause for anxiety since it has been encouraging the Ottoman Christians, while its policy is to be on good terms with the Balkan States.

It was decided that the attitude of the Committee towards the Albanian question should be changed. In future Albanians ought to be allowed to use their language in the schools and to have books in the Albanian (Latin) characters. Whilst, too, the Koran and other religious books must always be printed with the Arabic characters, the Albanians could have a transliteration of their religious books printed in a parallel column with the Arabic version. Numbers of Khojas must, however, be sent to Albania with the object of opening schools, popularizing the Arabic letters, and spreading a knowledge of Turkish history amongst the Albanians. The separation of the Rumanians and of the Orthodox Albanians in Epirus and in Thessaly from the Greek Church should be favoured, and a hatred of the Greeks and of the Greek Church should be fostered among the Albanians. Prayers must be allowed to be said and sermons to be preached in Albanian in the Orthodox churches.

Although the Sublime Porte had promised to grant to all Albanians the same concessions as those promised to the Malissori, the Committee considered that the Government ought not to act hastily in this matter. In principle all Albanians should be allowed to carry arms; but only those who have themselves purchased arms should be in practice allowed to carry them, and only when it is considered necessary for the defence of the country.

A Congress of delegates, summoned from all the Moslem countries of the world, ought to meet annually in Constantinople, to discuss questions of interest to the Moslem world. Branches of the Committee should be formed in all Moslem countries, especially in Russia and in Persia. The Muhammadans of Russia ought to be persuaded to make revolutionary propaganda among Russian soldiers. As many Tartars as possible should be induced to become members of the seven branches of the Committee which already exist in Russia. Efforts should be made to bring about an understanding between Persia and Turkey, with the ultimate object of effecting a political and economical union between the two countries. The Turks in Bulgaria and in Bosnia and Herzegovina, who should be advised not to emigrate, should be organized in such a way that they would be in touch with the Committee of Union and Progress. Large numbers of Turkish boys from Bulgaria ought to be educated in Turkey and subsequently sent back as masters to the Bulgarian schools. Schools must be opened with the object of pushing the Turkish language among the Pomaks (Moslem Bulgarians) in the hope of making them forget the Bulgarian language. Turkish teachers should be also sent to Bosnia and Herzegovina and attempts made to persuade the Turks in these provinces not to favour the Servian aspirations and to learn German rather than Servian in the Schools.

The Congress unanimously decided that, although the loss would not be material but only moral, Tripoli could not in any circumstances be ceded to Italy—if Italy does not abandon it, the war must be continued indefinitely. Great sacrifices must be made to increase the efficiency of the Army and to create a Fleet. For this latter purpose the taxes throughout the Empire ought to be doubled for four years. This increased rate of taxation would produce every year £T 5,000,000. In four years, therefore, a sum of £T 20,000,000 would be available for the creation of the Fleet. War with Greece was still possible, because the Hellenic Government had not renounced its aspirations in Crete and in Epirus, and might utilize the present occasion to press her claims, Turkey must therefore be prepared for war. One section of the delegates considered that, had Turkey declared war against Greece two years ago, the rebellions in Albania and in the Yemen would not have taken place. Under these circumstances good relations should be cultivated with the Bulgarians, who might be granted some concessions in certain districts. Many delegates thought that Servia and Montenegro had come to some agreement about the future status of the Sanjak of Novi Bazar and of Albania. For this reason an understanding between Austria and Turkey ought to be favoured. In spite of this, owing to the outbreak of the present war, a section of the Committee thought that it would be better for Turkey to establish good relations with the Powers of the Triple Entente. Nevertheless it would not be opportune to break with Germany.

The Congress condemned the policy of Hakkı Pasha, and wished to hand the ex-Grand Vizier over to be tried, because the delegates felt that by being on good terms with the Triple Alliance the Turkish Government had indirectly furthered the annexation of Tripoli by Italy. At the same time many delegates felt uncertain whether England would guarantee the present status quo in European Turkey and in Asia Minor if the Ottoman Government decided definitely to ally itself with the Powers of the Triple Entente.

Hadji Adil Bey, the President of the Committee, stated in his speech that the Committee had founded two normal schools, besides opening numerous primary schools and creating literary and scientific institutions. Much had been done to effect the improvement of the educational system provided for Turkish girls. The Committee had supplied money for the publication of many scientific, agricultural, and religious books. Within the Committee a succursal had been created for sending young men to Europe and for providing them with information on various subjects which they can utilize in society and in the Press. The President considered that the decisions of the Congress should facilitate the union of the various elements of the Committee, whose members should not endeavour to preserve conservatism by fanaticism because by so doing they would increase the already existing desire for decentralization in the country. He denied that the Committee has acted in opposition to the traditions of Islam or sympathized with Freemasonry.

The Congress resolved that administrative decentralization or any form of local autonomy would be against the interests of the State. The inspection of non-Moslem schools by Government inspectors must be continued. The Government should settle some of its disputes with the Patriarchate and recognize some of its at present contested rights. The number of primary schools for girls should be increased, and a certain sum should be allowed in the Budget of each vilayet for elementary education. Large numbers of Christian boys should be educated at the expense of the Government.

As I have already said, some of the decisions are framed in a slightly more liberal spirit than prevailed last year; but it is clear that the Committee has decided to pursue to the last a policy of assimilating the subject races. The Young Turks have not yet learnt that, in order successfully to accomplish the very difficult task which they have undertaken, it is necessary not only to promise equality, fraternity, and justice to their non-Moslem fellow-countrymen, but also to give to them and to Europe some proof that endeavours are really being made eventually to fulfil these promises.

Party Politics in Turkey.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople.

To take the events of the week seriatim, Said's proposals for the modification of the Constitution have received the official benison of the Salonika Committee, and have been laid before the Parliamentary Committee for the revision of the Constitution. The Committee has Ismail Hakkı Babanzade as its chairman. Nearly two-thirds of its members are deputies of the Meclis, and there can be no manner of doubt that it will pronounce in favour of the modification. Then the struggle will begin. Said can hardly hope to obtain a two-thirds majority in the Chamber, still less in the Senate. The Upper House will have to be packed by the creation of puppet Senators, and short of a coup d'état one does not see how Parliament can be dissolved or prorogued without a Constitutional crisis. Meantime confusion has been worse confounded by the introduction of the question of the "djournala." I have referred to this important question in previous letters. The Tanin has threatened the Opposition with their publication, and it is believed that the local leaders of the Committee were inclined to advocate this measure a few days ago. The Opposition countered by accusing Said Pasha and others of delation, and Barsi Bey, Deputy for Dibra, gave notice of a motion accusing the Grand Vizier of having helped the ex-Sultan to destroy the Midhatian Constitution, and of having sent anti-Constitutional reports to the Palace. Said did not wait for the motion to be discussed. On Wednesday he appeared before the Chamber and read his "secret report" to the ex-Sultan, which was not a "djournal" (secret denunciation) but a "laiha" (report written in answer to a question from the Sultan). The story can be summed up in a few lines. Ismail Kemal Bey had written a memorial to Sultan Abdul Hamid urging the restoration of the Midhatian Constitution. The autocrat studied this document and sent a high Court official to Said Pasha with a request for a report on the subject. Said simply replied that he did not consider that Turkey was ready for Constitutional Government. So far so good. What Said Pasha averred in 1900 many other Turks repeated till three years ago. But in continuing his defence the Grand Vizier made a grave error in reading two reports: one by a Palace official who informed the Sultan that Kiamil Pasha, asked for his opinion // Ismail Kemal's memorial, expressed the conviction that the country would not be ripe for a constitution for a century: the other written by Kiamil in the early days of his Grand Viziership in 1908, in which, while abstaining from any expression of confidence in the Constitutional panacea, he called Abdul Hamid's attention to the activity of the revolutionary forces in Turkey, and warned him that any failure to satisfy the demands of the Young Turks might have dangerous consequences, given the temper of the people. This was all harmless enough; what annoyed the House was Said's obvious attempt to save himself by pointing out that his former scepticism as to the chances of Constitutional Government in Turkey had been no greater than that of his rival.

It was at this moment that Mahmud Shevket Pasha did his best to place the discussion on a more dignified footing. He warned the Chamber in impressive language against the dangers of disunion. Neither Moslem nor Christian could gain anything from a policy of personalities and recriminations. Intestine strife would open the door to the enemy. The Christian would find that neither his language nor his schools would be respected by the invader; while the Moslem would see himself reduced to the status of a mere client. Morocco and Persia were object lessons to all who could read the signs of the times. As for the "djournala," those which had been made use of "for purposes of blackmail" had been stolen before the appointment of a special Commission to examine these documents, and during the confusion which followed the occupation of Constantinople by his troops. "I am not," continued the Minister, "in favour of the publication of these documents. If this is done it will be almost impossible for us to find any honest men to carry on the work of Government." He added that he had refused to expel officers guilty of delation in the past from the Army. He believed in giving them a chance of "starting fresh" and proving their worth under happier conditions.

The Chamber did not indulge in much applause of the War Minister's speech, but many of his shafts went home, and for the last three days we have heard less of the "djournal" question than at any time in the last three weeks. His appeal on behalf of union has been taken seriously by the Albanian Nationalist deputies and by a group of Independents, who have urged the two parties to come to at least a temporary arrangement with regard to the Constitutional question. The Union and Liberty group and its rival have appointed delegates, who are now discussing the situation with the object of arriving at a compromise. So many efforts on behalf of internal peace have failed during the last two years that one cannot but feel somewhat sceptical as to the outcome of this inter-party conference, yet it is to be hoped that at the last moment the leaders on each side will recognise that further strife will inevitably provoke a crisis. A repetition of the events of 1910 to 24th April might be the end of Turkey in Europe.

Press Opinion.

The "Tanin."

(SPECIALLY TRANSLATED FOR THE Comrade.)

For some days past, rumours of peace have been in the air. In introducing his proposals for the modification of the Constitution, the Grand Vizier had said that among other things, during the time of war, it would expedite matters if Parliament were to be dissolved and Government saved from constant intervention.

A wrong interpretation has been given to the words of the Grand Vizier which have in certain quarters been considered as conveying a meaning favourable to peace. As if the Turkish Government was ready to enter into peace pourparlers! The fact was that the Grand Vizier only mentioned it as one of the arguments in favour of his proposal in a general way. To make the matter clear the Agence Ottomane has given an emphatic denial to the rumour.

In spite of this denial some telegrams from Europe still speak of probable speedy termination of hostilities. It is not impossible that currency may have been given to the rumour by Italians who are likely to be benefited by it. The prolongation of the war is causing a serious drain to the Italian finances and the situation at home in Italy is giving rise to anxiety. The Italian Parliament has not yet been summoned. The rumour of probable peace is therefore likely to placate public opinion in Italy. On our part, it would be a great mistake, we believe, to think of peace at this juncture. We shall not be far wrong if we declare that from our point of view the war in Tripoli has almost not yet begun. For the war with a handful of Turkish regulars supplemented by thousands of Arab mujahids will not be decided on the ground covered by the guns of Italian warships. Our enemies will encounter inland an opposition based on a plan of resistance for years. It took the Italians more than two months to occupy the stretch of ground which the strong guns of their men-of-war could pound. The interior of Tripoli, that is to say, the whole of Tripoli and Fezzan, is still Ottoman to-day, and stands determined to fight to remain so for ever.

The latest telegrams show that the Italians who last ventured out a little into the open beyond Ain Zara received a terrible chastisement and had at last to retire with severe losses. Had these telegrams come from Ottoman sources, some exaggeration could perhaps be attributed to them. But we cannot doubt the truth of the reports since they emanate from the correspondent of the Temps, who has never been known to be guilty of the least exaggeration in our favour. An enemy, who has to beat a precipitate retreat after sustaining a loss of 400 or 500 killed as soon as it dares out of Ain Zara a little to the south—what fate will it meet, it may well be conceived, if it happens to penetrate say a few hundred kilometres into the interior. It would be senseless for us to talk of peace now, when all expectations of our greatest successes depend on the war being prolonged and taking place in the interior, when the events are exceeding our expectations and the longer the hostilities continue, the more buoyant we are getting. At such time surely we do not wish even to hear of peace being discussed. War! war to the knife, war to the bitter end. With all our might, with all our determination War! This alone is the creed that will save Tirabilas-ul-Gharb for us.

The event of the greatest import that has happened during the last few days in connection with the war is the annexation of Sollum—which had been under diplomatic dispute so far—by the Government of the Khedive—temporarily or permanently. What effect this will have on the trend of events it is possible at the present moment to forecast. So much cannot be denied that the situation has taken on a new complexion. It would not matter much if the question of Sollum remained where it is. But will not other questions be out of it, affecting the attitude of neutrality professed by the great powers with regard to Tripoli? As we have said, it is impossible to vouchsafe any answer to this question at present. It is it not full of meaning that the question can be put at all?

A phase full of meaning, is also the present state of the question in Crete. The Cretans have resolved in an explicit manner to elect Deputies to represent them in the Greek Chamber of Deputies at Athens. They elect their Deputies and proceed to send them. In what manner the protecting Powers have frustrated their attempts is known to our readers. The attitude of the Hellenic Government with regard to it is that if the Deputies were to arrive they would not be admitted. So long as this correct attitude is maintained we are not apprehensive of any cause of difference arising between the Ottoman and the Hellenic Governments, and we hope and pray the Government at Athens will continue in this unpartisan attitude, for otherwise a cause of tremendous difference will be created, and necessarily the tranquillity and harmony in the Balkans, already strained, will be disturbed.

The "Near East."

From the field of war there is little of importance to chronicle. After the check they suffered at Bis Tobras the Italians in Tripoli appear to be in no hurry to advance further inland, and are busy fortifying their advanced post at Ain Zara. In Cyrenaica, where the Turkish and Arab forces are commanded by Enver Bey, the invaders have made no progress at all but have been kept on the defensive in the coast towns well within the range of the protective fire of their war vessels. Although they have now an army of 50,000 men squatting on the coast equipped with very modern war appliances, including aeroplanes and dirigibles, and are well supplied by a large handful of regular Turkish troops, accompanied by a few thousand tribesmen without any real organisation, any artillery or transport worth mentioning, and most of them armed with obsolete weapons, the Italians have not yet even begun to attempt the conquest of the two provinces. In the Italian Press the military critics, who are evidently as ignorant as the rest of us of what, if any, are the plans of the Government, are busy discussing the next stage of the campaign. The Tribuna suggests that there should be no advance into the interior, and that the Italians should content themselves with holding the coast towns and waiting till economic pressure drives the Arabs into submission. On the other hand, a writer in the Corriere della Sera hints that there will be a general advance within the next few weeks, carried out by a combination of railway construction, camel transport, and the pushing forward of advance posts to become bases for further advances. The Tribuna wisely refrains from discussing the effect upon public opinion in Italy of the inglorious course it proposes, or the demoralisation that would scarcely fail to set in among an army of 80,000 men when they found that their chiefs did not dare to lead them against an enemy immeasurably inferior to them in numbers and equipment. We are doubtful, too, of the efficacy of the economic pressure on which the Tribuna relies to make good the military miscalculation of the Italian Government. For some years past the trade of the Tripoli Hinterland has been deserting the northern routes in favour of those to Nigeria and the West Coast, and the economic effect of sitting still in the coast towns would more probably be to ruin the trade of Tripoli and other places than to drive the Arabs into submission. But it must not be forgotten that the Italian garrisons would like the Spaniards in Morocco to be constantly exposed to attacks. The more courageous course recommended in the Corriere della Sera would mean the beginning of a real war, and almost certainly, as Field-Marshal von der Goltz thinks, a long and obstinate one.

Proceedings in the Austrian and Hungarian Delegations have been of more than usual interest, following as they have done on the open quarrel on matters of foreign policy between the Foreign Minister and the late Chief of the Staff, Baron Conrad von Hotzendorf, who was evidently very strongly backed. On the whole Count Aehrenthal, who has been accused of excessive friendliness towards Italy and of insufficient cordiality towards Germany, may be satisfied with the attitude of the Delegates. The Hungarians gave him their whole-hearted support, and though the Austrians were not so uncritical they ended by granting the Government a four months' vote on account. One result has been to check the Press campaign against Count Aehrenthal and against Italy. The debates have, however, not given complete satisfaction in Italy, where, from the beginning of the war, every reference to it has been resented that has recognised any point of view but the Italian. Count Aehrenthal avowed his confidence in the good faith of the Italians and the sincerity of their intention not to extend the theatre of operations. But he seemed to fear that their action might lead to trouble in the Balkans, and regretted that he had been unable to find a suitable basis for peace. This has been quite sufficient to arouse Italian susceptibilities, and the Italian newspapers abound in native protestations. Italy, they exclaim, is quite willing to make peace—on condition that she receives, in full sovereignty, the two provinces she has "annexed," but has, so far, as we have already pointed out, failed even to begin to conquer. If the Turks will not surrender them they must be regarded as the real disturbers of the peace and held responsible for all the consequences that may ensue. If Count Aehrenthal really wished for peace he would bring pressure on the Porte to force it to consent to the dismemberment of the Empire. The fable of the lamb and the wolf never had a better illustration in international politics.

We doubt very much whether these childish outbursts reflect at all accurately the feelings of the responsible statesmen in Italy. They must by this time have realised that the adventure into which they plunged their country is far more serious and more dangerous than they bargained for. We have no doubt that they would gladly make peace if they could see a way of making it compatible with Italian prestige. The Porte, we imagine, is in the same disposition, and it is certainly confronted with the same difficulty. Among the European Powers there is an ardent wish to see peace restored before the spring, and renewed attempts at mediation may be expected in the near future. The Turks, who, both in the Austro-Bulgarian coup of 1908 and in the present case, have been shamefully treated by Europe, cannot fairly be expected to be guided by any consideration save that of their own interests. None the less, they would, we are convinced, do well to make considerable concessions to conclude peace. The honours of the war have been almost consistently on their side; but the isolated handful of men in Tripoli can scarcely hope to prolong their resistance indefinitely. The campaign of outrage and provocation conducted by the Bulgarian internal organisation in Macedonia is only one sign that the enemies of Turkey are preparing to raise the Macedonian question on the earliest possible occasion. The Balkan Governments, correct as their attitude has hitherto been, would regard the raising of that question while Turkey was at war with a European Power as a heaven-sent opportunity. The attitude of Austria-Hungary is ambiguous, and in Sofia the development of the internal situation is being followed with a keen and certainly not friendly interest.

take place in Belfast and reaffirms his intention to hold it there. Mr. Redmond, in a newspaper article, ridicules "the insolent bluff of Orangemen and the noisy minority of Protestants in Ulster," and says that Englishmen will be fools if they allow themselves to be diverted by stupid, hollow and unpatriotic bellowings, from the great policy of binding Ireland to the Empire. Lord Londonderry, replying to the letter of Mr. Churchill with reference to the Belfast meeting, says the main objection of the Ulster Unionist Council is removed if the meeting is held outside those districts which passionately resent Mr. Churchill's action. The strongly deprecated any attempt to interfere with Council would the meeting, but in view of the intense feeling that has been aroused it cannot accept any responsibility with reference to the visit. Mr. Winston Churchill replying to Lord Londonderry's letter of the 26th January disclaims any idea of offending the Protestants of Ireland whose interests, he says, are the deep concern of every Government and must be respected by all who strive to reconcile Ireland and the Empire. Mr. Churchill is confident that unless a riot is organised, nothing untoward will happen. Mr. Churchill emphasizes that he has nothing to do with the selection of Ulster Hall for the holding of a meeting, the Hall being taken by the Belfast Liberals after other proposals had failed. Mr. Churchill declares he is not connected with any arrangements for the meeting but merely consented to fulfil an old promise to address Ulster Liberal. Therefore the Unionist Council is seeking to fasten a quarrel on him on grounds of offence when no offence was intended. As regards the maintenance of public order, Mr. Churchill invited no assurance from Lord Londonderry but said he relied on law and the sense of justice of the citizens of Belfast.

It is officially announced that the demonstrations at which Mr. Churchill will speak will be held on the afternoon of 8th February on the football ground of the Belfast Celtic Club which is in the centre of the Nationalist quarter.

The Duke of Abercorn has written to the Ulster Unionist Council saying he is in full accord with the Council's decision regarding Mr. Winston Churchill and hoping the Council's efforts will not be relaxed till after 8th February. His Grace adds that the trick attempted to be played on the Unionists has signally failed.

The Liberals having been refused six balls for the holding of the meeting on 8th February have chosen the football ground. A marquee will be erected which will accommodate five thousand persons. There will be a procession of thirty thousand, headed by four hundred torchbearers and fifteen bands. The choice of the locality is regarded as easing the situation but the authorities in Belfast have requisitioned troops in case of any emergency.

It is stated that the Belfast Unionists have arranged to hold a meeting simultaneously with Mr. Churchill's on the agricultural show ground on 8th February.

After the meeting at Belfast Mr. Churchill will proceed the same evening to Scotland to carry out various naval inspections.

Mr. Bonar Law.

Mr. Bonar Law speaking at Albert Hall said there were signs that the country had had enough of the Government. It had been a long lane but the turning was visible. Failure and incompetence, he went on, had marked every step of the Government's

The Week.

Date of Fife.

The Duke of Fife died at Assuan in Egypt at 6 o'clock on the evening of the 29th ultimo from pleurisy and congestion of the lungs, the result of a chill.

Home Rule.

The Unionists have decided to hold a concert in the Ulster Hall on 7th February.

The Secretary of the Belfast Liberals had a prolonged conference with Mr. Churchill and other prominent Liberals at Downing Street on the 24th January. No statement as to the proceedings has been issued. The Master of Elibank will accompany Mr. Churchill to speak at Belfast. Mr. Redmond, Lord Purie and Mr. Devlin will also attend the meeting.

In connection with his visit to Belfast Mr. Churchill has notified the Harbour Board of his intention to inspect the harbour on 8th February. The Board has decided to inform Mr. Churchill that the date is not convenient. Mr. Churchill has written to Lord Londonderry declaring that it is his duty to keep his promise to the Ulster Liberals and to assert right of free speech at public meeting, but as the main objections of Lord Londonderry and his friends are directed against the holding of a meeting in the Ulster Hall, Mr. Churchill offers to hold a meeting elsewhere. Mr. Churchill's letter to Lord Londonderry refers to the very direct personal responsibility which will fall on Lord Londonderry if there is any serious rioting in Belfast on 8th February. Mr. Churchill says it has become of importance to public opinion that the meeting should progress. National expenditure in six years had increased by forty millions yearly. A political spoils system had been created rivaling that of the United States. The Government had hitherto been busy preparing the machinery of destruction which would be brought into operation this year. The Unionists of England and Scotland, he said, meant to support the loyal Ulstermen to the end because their claims were just. If the Union leaders showed hesitation on the subject of Tariff Reform, continued Mr. Law, they would shatter the party. Unionist Free Traders must choose between Tariff Reform and "Lloyd Georgeism."

Mr. Bonar Law's speech is regarded as the strongest and most fighting Conservative speech for years. He affirmed that the idea that the members of the Government were unusually competent was a delusion. Only in electioneering and in the small trickery of politics were they competent. The Government was playing Faust to Mr. Redmond's Mephistopheles. He dwelt on Mr. Haldane's failure, emphasizing that the weapons of the Army were utterly inferior to those of other nations. This was a handicap that no courage could overcome. Mr. Bonar Law refused to join in what he described as the senseless attack on Sir Edward Grey. We had drifted to the verge of war because the speeches of Cabinet Ministers had caused foreigners to believe that Britain would never assert her rights by force. France had gained all the ill-will. Mr. Lloyd George's speech at the Mansion House, perhaps, saved us from war, but it had created an amount of ill-will in Germany which it would take years, perhaps generations, to live down.

China.

News from China is still vague and unsatisfactory. It is reported that the English Consul refuses to recognise or treat with the General in command. Whatever disturbances there are, they however do not materially diminish trade between the two countries. Large caravans arrive and depart every day or so. Importation of salt has been forbidden but there is brisk trade in articles of exchange.

Reuter wires from Tokio on the 25th January.—A Chinese Republican Envoy has arrived here to secure Japan's recognition of the Republic. A motion on the subject was introduced in the Diet and evoked much difference of opinion. The debate was adjourned. It is semi-officially stated that Japan is at present not prepared to recognise the Republic. Messrs. Okura and Co. have contracted with the Chinese insurgents to negotiate a loan.

Reuter wires from Tokio on the 27th.—Foreign Minister, in reply to an interpellation to-day, denied that the Government had pressed the maintenance of the monarchy upon China. The observations he continued, which the Japanese Minister in Peking had made to Yuan-Shi-Kai were merely an expression of his personal views. An animated debate followed which led to a lively passage of arms between the Minister and the Progressive party. The discussion was so stormy that it was decided to continue the sitting with closed doors.

Reuter wires from Shanghai on the 27th January.—The Peace negotiations show an unexpected improvement.

Sun-Yat-Sen has telegraphed to Yuan-Shi-Kai in the most friendly terms, clearing up the recent misunderstandings. An Edict is expected to be issued before the 29th when the armistice ends. Sharp fighting is in progress at Suchoufoo, the headquarters of General Chang-hsun.

Reuter wires from Berlin on the 27th January.—The authorities at Kiauchau have been instructed to retain 500 men with officers from the garrison of Tientsin and Tientsin, who should be relieved at the end of February. This measure is due to the unsettled situation in China, which it is stated may necessitate further measures of protection for German subjects. This will obviate the despatch of reinforcements from Germany.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 29th January.—Wutingfang has telegraphed demanding the immediate abdication of the Throne, failing which hostilities will be resumed to-day. Yuan-Shi-Kai is gradually increasing his followers in Peking. They now number seven thousand and are sufficient to overawe the Manchu irreconcilables.

The Imperialist troops are reported to have been defeated by the Revolutionaries in a battle near the Tientsin-Pukow Railway, both sides losing heavily.

The ex-Regent and Prince Nehing had an audience of the Dowager-Empress on the 30th January. It is understood that abdication has been decided upon in accordance with the conditions of the Republicans. The Imperial personages and nobles will be allowed to retain their titles and reside in Peking or elsewhere as they please. The Imperial family will receive three million taels annually.

Reuter wires from Peking.—Many soldiers have been killed by bomb explosions in Imperial troop trains between Shaoan and Hienan.

Reuter wires from Tokio on the 31st January.—The Nippon Yusen and Chimo-Japanese Steamship Companies are negotiating for the purchase of the Imperial Chinese Merchant Marine Company, also the Hanyang Works and various mines in China.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 28th January.—Yuan-Shi-Kai has communicated to the Throne a memorial from the Imperial Generals demanding a constitution and republic on the ground of misconduct of the younger Manchu princes and suggesting that Yuan-Shi-Kai be appointed High Commissioner in Peking for the purpose of forming a new Government. The Throne is deeply impressed by the memorial and it is believed that it is again considering the question of abdication.

Revolutionary troops have been defeated in an affair near the outposts of the Tientsin-Pukow railway.

Hindu University.

The Maharajah of Darbhanga arrived at Allahabad, on the 26th January in connection with the Hindu University Deputation, which starts on tour to Benares, Mirzapur, Agra and Ajmere thereafter. The intention apparently is that the deputation should proceed on a visit to the Ruling Chiefs of Rajputana.

A mass meeting in connection with the Hindu University was held on the 31st January at 4 P.M., in the Central Hindu College grounds, H.H. the Maharaja of Benares presiding. The Maharaja of Darbhanga and Mrs. Besant were amongst the speakers.

A very largely attended open air meeting of Hindu citizens of Benares was held this afternoon in the Central Hindu College premises to raise subscriptions in aid of the Hindu University. The Maharaja of Benares presided. Amongst the members of the deputation present were the Maharaja Bahadur of Durbhanga, Rana Sheoraj Singh of Khajurao, Hon. M. Malaviya, Mrs. Besant, Babu Sangata Singh of Mozufferpore, and Babu Iswar Saran of Allahabad. The gathering was a representative one. A conspicuous feature of the meeting was that a large number of ladies were present. The Maharaja of Benares subscribed one lakh to the Fund and promised facilities for acquisition of land in Benares.

Moslem Deputation to H. E. the Viceroy.

THE VICEROY received at Dacca the Muhammadan deputation on the 31st January. The deputation consisted of nineteen gentlemen. The Nawab Bahadur acted as spokesman.

Moslem University.

The Aga Khan, in his address to the Bombay Mussulmans on the subject of the Aligarh University, said that there would be in the University an Oriental Side, specially developed, where, besides the teaching of Arabic and Persian, the history of the East and the general civilisation of Asia would form, so to speak, the atmosphere of the institution. For the advanced students there would be a special degree in Divinity. He might assure them that not only in India, but throughout the world there was, if he might say so, no greater need than that of having religious teachers who were themselves educated. The late Mr. Justice Tyabji once told him that there would probably never be a revival of Islam until such time as the average Moulvi and Mulla was ahead of the average educated man in India in education. They hoped that by having a Divinity branch at Aligarh a new type of more active and energetic Moulvi and Mulla would be produced. But their aim would not be merely religious. Their important work would really be to prepare the people to take their proper place, not only in India, but in the British Empire and as human beings really belonging to the world. With regard to the constitution, the Committee which met in conference with the representatives of the Government of India had drawn up a constitution which, in the opinion of all who had carefully studied and certainly in his opinion, gave the Muhammadan community all the rights that they could in their present stage use for the benefit of their co-religionists. The University would have the great benefit and honour, for it would be their benefit as well as their honour, of having His Excellency the Viceroy as its Chancellor. The moving of the capital of India would bring the Chancellor within a few hours of Aligarh and they would have the great advantage of being able to bring matters directly before the Chief of the State which would be an advantage not only to the institution but to the community. The constitution also secured them of having the direct control under Mussulmah representatives of the opinions of the people chosen from all over India with a strong body near Aligarh. This was the constitution which was waiting only to be asked for but first they must have 35 lakhs. That being their object, he appealed to them now to put their shoulders to the wheel and to do all that could be done in order to get this matter completed before the present session of the Viceroy's Council was over before the end of March.

In a letter to the Times of India on the 29th January 1905, the Aga Khan explains the work done so far and what remains to be accomplished. His Highness writes:—I had originally intended that I should collect a core of representatives from all over India to meet

University worth the name would need less than that sum. However, to make a modest beginning, I appealed to my brother Muslims for a sum of twenty lakhs, later on that sum was raised to 35 lakhs. But when the members of the Constitution Committee under the presidency of my friend the Hon. Raja Sahab of Mahmudabad met the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler and other Government officials at Simla and went carefully through details, they came to the conclusion that we would need at least 35 lakhs. The work was kept up throughout the whole year and the promises up to now amount to 37 lakhs out of which 26 lakhs have been collected and 11 lakhs are still outstanding. Many parts of India still remain to be worked up and I have no doubt that with persistent efforts we shall easily reach the total of half a crore. What I beg of my co-religionists is that they should now see to the immediate realisation of the promise. Most of the bigger donations from the generous Ruling Princes have already come in. Smaller donations must be realised immediately and if our workers in all parts of India put it plainly to the subscribers as to how much depends on each donor, I feel sure they will willingly make the necessary sacrifice. The Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler who has great sympathies with us and our great scheme went out of his way to announce in a speech in Urdu at Delhi:—"Show us 35 lakhs and take your University." I firmly believe that we would have collected this sum by this time, if it was not that our attentions were distracted owing to the very unfortunate happenings in Tripoli and Persia. I appeal to my co-religionists in all parts of India to make the slight effort that is needed now. We shall shortly be approaching the Government to request it after final consultation with our Constitution Committee to pass the Moslem University Act at the Calcutta session, but before we do so, we must realize another 9 lakhs. I should like to remind my people that we have other important work to look to. When we have got the funds we have got to build up our University. We shall shortly have to send out to study in Europe some of our best and brilliant students, so that on their return they can take up the lecturing work along with European professors. We have also to design and build our lecture rooms, students and staff quarters, and other necessary buildings. We cannot start and work unless we have collected the 9 lakhs and I have every hope that within a fortnight we shall do so. In the end, I take this opportunity of expressing my entire agreement with all that the Maharaja of Bikanir said at Calcutta. We Mussalmans are thankful to His Highness for his sympathies and heartily wish success to the Hindu University scheme and pray to God that both these great universities may come into existence soon to build a glorious future for our mother country—India

The death of Alexander William George Duff, first Duke of Fife, has caused a sad bereavement to the Royal Family for which deep sympathy will be felt throughout the Empire. The tragic event is peculiarly sad at this moment when the British nation is stirring with joy and thankfulness to greet the King and Queen on their home-coming after their triumphant and epoch-making visit to India. The late Duke was a fine type of the British aristocracy and possessed many sterling qualities of character and mind. His marriage with the Princess Royal, the eldest daughter of the late King Edward VII and sister of King George V, had proved to be a very popular and happy union. Both the husband and wife were by nature averse to public ceremonies and lived a life of peace and quiet and unbroken domestic felicity. The hearts of all classes of His Majesty's subjects will go out to the Princess Royal in the great affliction that has befallen her. The late Duke, besides holding the position of a great landlord, the duties of which he discharged with scrupulous care and sympathy, was prominently connected with a great banking concern of the City, and as a man of business enjoyed a well-deserved reputation on account of his upright character and honesty in all business relations. We offer our sincere and respectful condolence to the Princess Royal and the Royal Family.

H. H. THE AGA KHAN has made another appeal to his co-religionists for the immediate payment of the subscriptions promised in aid of the Moslem University. The work that was begun a year ago with great enthusiasm and yet with no small misgivings, has now reached a stage when only the speedy collection of the necessary funds is needed to carry it to a successful issue. What has been achieved so far is creditable both to the workers and the community, but the final success of the great undertaking must remain doubtful as long as the collections fall short of the required amount of 35 lakhs. There has been a perceptible slackening of effort during the last few months, both amongst the workers and the general public because, as His Highness says, their "attention has been distracted owing to the very unfortunate happenings in Tripoli and Persia." The Islamic world has been for some time past living amidst grave shocks and crises, heartburnings and humiliation. The past few months have revealed the existence of a formidable menace to the peaceful and progressive development of the Mussalman races throughout the world. One may quite naturally see behind this revelation the finger of Providence; and if their common sorrow and the dangers of their situation succeed in drawing them together and inspiring them with fresh courage and resolve to apply themselves to the task of self-regeneration, "the unfortunate happenings in Tripoli and Persia" must indeed be counted as blessings in disguise. In the last resort the status of a community depends on its own intrinsic capacity, on its intellectual and moral calibre. Education is the sovereign remedy for a stricken people to cure them of inertia, of weakened will and deadened aspiration. For the Mussalmans of India the creation of a University, well-equipped and thoroughly responsive to their needs, is the one hope, the only panacea for the untold ills that afflict them, be they intellectual and moral, social or economic. We trust the leaders of the community fully realise the nature and importance of the undertaking on which they have embarked and will recoil from no sacrifice, however heavy, to bring it to a successful conclusion. Now the question is only of realising unpaid promises. As the Aga Khan has truly observed, "the work was kept up throughout the whole year and the promises up to now amount to 37 lakhs, out of which 26 lakhs have been collected and 11 lakhs are still outstanding. Many parts of India still remain to be worked up and I have no doubt that with persistent efforts we would easily reach the total of half a crore. What I beg of my co-religionists is that they should now see to the immediate realisation of the promises. . . . Smaller donations must be realised immediately and if our workers in all parts of India put it plainly to the subscribers how much depends on each donor, I feel sure they will willingly make the necessary sacrifice. . . . We shall shortly be approaching the Government to request it, after final consultation with our Constitution Committee, to pass the Moslem University Act at the Calcutta Session; but, before we do so, we must realise another 9 lakhs." Let us hope His Highness's present appeal will be the last of its kind.

The One Hope of Italy.

If the press censor with the Italian army, who presides over the history of the war, could have also presided over its fortunes, the amour propre of the young Italian nation would have long ago been "rehabilitated." But the ways of wars are as uncertain as the courage and temper of soldiers constantly exposed to a ceaseless rain of bullets. Nor can a pathetic appeal to Europe to respect the budding imperialism of young Italy, setting out grandiloquently and with a great flourish of trumpets to demonstrate "the efficiency of the Italian army and navy," alter by one jot or tittle the grim logic of events. Perhaps the efficient army of 100,000 men, now cooped up on a fringe of the Tripolitan coast under the protection of the guns of the fleet, had originally conceived the venture as a stately and romantic march through a desert to the accompaniment of martial music. Perhaps bodies of frightened and demoralised Turks surrendering in sheer terror of the heroic legions that had come to vindicate the honour of Italian arms, and hosts of Arabs falling on the necks of their "deliverers" and weeping for sheer joy had also formed beauteous idylls in that romantic picture. Things sometimes have a horrible knack of happening differently and—well, every romance comes to an end, be it at Adowa in Abyssinia or the trenches in Tripoli! Italy appealing to the Powers for intervention has a humour of its own. If, however, the Powers do not see fit to intervene the way should be prepared for them. This is her only hope to extricate herself from the inglorious muddle into which her valiant and efficient army and her "inevitable destiny" has plunged her. She has, therefore, begun to exasperate the neutral Powers by harrying neutral commerce and shipping and by creating mischief all round, like the boy who recklessly smashes everything when he has drifted into a tight corner and does not know what to do. The recent outrages reported from Macedonia are believed to have been incited by Italian agents. The desultory and ineffectual firing on the Arabian and Syrian coasts is perhaps the best illustration of the wild despair that is coming over the nerveless Government which does not know how to retrieve the miscarriage of its grandiose schemes of "expansion." We trust the European Powers will refrain from "advising" Turkey now when they had refused to listen to her entreaties at the outset of the war. They have no business now to interfere and help Italy in securing what she cannot wrest by force. She and her ambitions should be left to their own fate. The only decent and useful service that the Powers can do now is to lay the soothing unction to the soul of young Italy and ask her to accept the inevitable with as much grace as has been left her. Any other form of interference is sure to bring a preferential treatment of Christian countries against Islam and only imbeciles should be surprised if Islam resents it.

The New Treasurer-General of Persia.

The regeneration of Persia, in fact, her independent and well-ordered existence was bound up with the financial re-organization which Mr. Shuster had undertaken with so much honesty, zeal and devotion. The establishment of peace and equitable administration, the introduction of reforms, the organization of the police and the creation of a disciplined and well-equipped army, all depended on the building up of a sound financial reserve out of the immense but disorganized material resources of the country which the great American financier was called upon to administer. Within a wonderfully short period he succeeded in evolving order and stability out of the financial bankruptcy and chaos, and it began to be hoped that after some time Persia would be able to stand on her legs again. Russia, however, desired nothing of the kind, and she began to create through her agents a state of things that would ultimately lead to the fall of Mr. Shuster. She has succeeded; Mr. Shuster has been driven out, thanks to the helpless condition of Persia, the passive acquiescence of Sir Edward Grey and her own unscrupulous methods which are now a matter of history. Persian finances being the key to the whole situation, to secure their effective control is tantamount to the virtual subjugation of the country. Russia has acted with this aim persistently in view. After the departure of Mr. Shuster she has saddled Persia with M. Mornard, a Belgian, as a "Provisional" Treasurer-General, who is a silent soldier of her policy. In fact, all

Belgians in the Persian service are Russian agents, open and undisguised. It was the rapacity and insolence of a Belgian Chief of Customs that gave its zest and energy to the constitutional movement in the reign of Muzzafaruddin, which at last succeeded in making a clean sweep of the financial shark and his tools. Writing about this latest specimen of the notorious gentry, the Pall Mall Gazette in its issue of the 4th January said:—"If M. Mornard be appointed, every British scheme, not only in the north but also in the south of Persia—our allotted sphere of influence—will be damned. The great extension of railways which is projected will pass into Russian hands, and, what is worse, we shall drift towards a situation in which the continued infringement of Persian liberty will cause an uprising of public opinion in this country which will not only put an end to the entente but will bring England and Russia into sharp antagonism." After this we can very well understand the deep umbrage that M. Mornard's appointment has caused to the Times. Russia may well derive a malicious satisfaction from the uneasiness of this temporizing journal, which had all along been dancing to the tunes of St Petersburg. It had never failed to explain, sometimes with a show of injured innocence, all that Russia had done—her coercion and bullying of the Persian Government, the despatch of the army of occupation, the slaughter of women and children and the murder of the best and noblest of Persian patriots. M. Mornard's appointment, however, yet awaits the Times' explanation, which may come, perhaps, when the Cossacks appear along the Indian Frontier. But even that will in its own good time be justified by the all too resourceful Times!

A MEETING of the Trustees of the Aligarh College was held on the 31st of January, and we are happy that the Trustees that attended, far from failing to make the quorum of seven which had almost become

Aligarh Affairs. a feature of such meetings, numbered no less than 22. Even this, however, is not a satisfactory number when we consider the fact that the Trustees numbered as many as 91 on that date, and included more than a dozen from the town and district of Aligarh itself. Some of these latter were even now conspicuous by their absence, and we do not know how the election of more local Trustees to two out of seven vacancies filled by election at this meeting can be a guarantee of better local attendance. As usual the chief attractions of the meeting were somewhat personal, consisting in the election of some Trustees and the question of the appointments of Secretary and Joint-Secretary at the expiry of the period for which Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk and Nawab Muzammulullah Khan were elected. The fortunate seven were Nawab Chulam Ahmed Khan Kalam of Madras, who deservedly secured the largest number of votes; Khan Bahadur Israr Hasan Khan Sahib, the influential Judicial Minister of Bhopal, Malik Mubarez Khan Sahib Tiwana, whose work for the Moslem University in the Shahpur District merits this recognition; Mr. Abdur Majid, Barrister-at-law, of the well-known Khwaja family of Aligarh, who is an Old Boy of the College and has always taken a deep interest in its affairs; Mr. Kasim Ali J. Peerbhi, J. P., of Bombay, who recently subscribed and, what is still more important, promptly paid, a lakh and a quarter to the Moslem University Fund; Haji Mohamed Saleh Khan Sahib of the Sherwani family, the munificence of which has been the mainstay of Aligarh finances in its early days; and Dr. Iqbal. The last-named Trustee needs no qualification, but it is a sad reflection on the merits of those that judge the merits of others that Iqbal should have received no more than 31 out of a possible 91 votes, and humped in the last of the new contingent of 7. As regards the election of the Secretary and the Joint-Secretary, the Trustees present on this occasion succeeded in persuading Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk to remain in office so long at least as the Moslem University was not finally established, and Nawab Muzammulullah Khan agreed, after a lengthy and not altogether dignified recital of facts and fancies on the part of more than one speaker at the meeting, to continue to work as Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk's colleague and to officiate for him whenever the need of rest compelled the Honorary Secretary to take leave of absence. Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk accepted the responsibility of these arrangements and the arduous labour which the work at Aligarh would entail whenever he is there with much reluctance and at great personal sacrifice, which would we feel sure be accepted by the community which had so unanimously entreated him to stay on with genuine gratitude. But there is some fear that the Nawab may not find it convenient to return to duty for a considerable length of time. In that case we are certain that the entreaties of his community will follow him to Amroha, and that they will be no more disregarded than their recent prayers. Nawab Mumtazuddin Sir Faiyaz Ali Khan, K.C.I.E., K.C.V.O., has been re-elected as President of the Trustees for another two years. Twelve Syndics have been elected to the vacancies, the candidates being mostly those who had held the office during the period which has just expired. The chief consideration in selecting the Syndics seems to be their propinquity to Aligarh, but this shows that even those Trustees who are at a reasonable distance from the College do not respond to the call of duty in the majority of cases, and as a result of this it is thought better to have a full even if a feeble Syndicate. The two years for which Mr. Towle was appointed officiating Principal of the College had expired at the end of October last, and when the Honorary Secretary was asked a week later to explain under what authority Mr. Towle was permitted to officiate in that post after the expiry of the period sanctioned by the Trustees, he had replied that the subject was under consideration. Although this statement was no answer to the question it served the purpose of a reminder, and we are glad to say that the Trustees have rectified the omission and extended the period during which Mr. Towle is to officiate till such time as the Moslem University is established. As there is every hope that the Moslem University Bill would be passed before the end of March, there seems to be no harm in the wording of the resolution in this respect. But what we cannot commend is the decision, arrived at by a majority composed for the most part of the proxy votes sent to the Honorary Secretary, which were enough to swamp the whole meeting, that Mr. Towle should be assured that he would be retained permanently on his present salary of Rs. 1,000. We do not think that Mr. Towle could have reasonably asked for such an assurance, because according to the conditions of the appointment which he accepted he could not now expect more than Rs. 750 a month. His appointment as acting Principal within eight years of his landing in India was an event which he could not have foreseen, and it has come to pass only because two Principals and three Senior Professors happened to leave within this short space of time. A long acting appointment after eight years of service on a salary which members of the Indian Educational Service secure after not less than ten years was in itself as good a reward as he could reasonably expect, and we have no reason to believe that Mr. Towle asked for or expected any other assurances. What the Trustees have now done is to profess that they do not wish to tie the hands of the first Court of Trustees of the Moslem University, and yet to force on it an appointment in a grade of professorship carrying as emoluments not less than Rs. 1,000. We do not wish to say a single word reflecting in any way on the merits of Mr. Towle. We may even say that he is reputed to be the best teacher of Economics in the Allahabad University. A Professor with such a reputation could not have been ignored by any properly constituted Court, and we have every hope that the present action of the Trustees will not in any way embarrass their successors. But for all that the principle is broken. Another effort was made by Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk to break the principle of leaving the concerns of the future to the future Court of Trustees, and to appoint twelve more new Trustees within the year before the University was established. In view of the fact that in the Budget meeting the proxies secured by the Nawab Sahib enabled him to have it decided that the Trustees are in favour of their retention as Life Trustees of the new Court as well, in spite of the decision of the Constitution Committee to the contrary, the addition of 12 more Trustees to the 98 already on the Board would have resulted in a majority of co-opted and permanent Trustees swamping the minority of the representatives of the community holding office for five years specially as some holders of temporary office also are to be elected periodically by a majority of the Court. Luckily this required an alteration in the Rules and could not be effected except by the vote of 61 Trustees. Only 4 of the Trustees who attended supported this reactionary measure, although all the 26 who had sent written votes had tamely and, we think we may say, indolently and ignorantly acquiesced. But these 30 could not pass such a measure even with the proxies of Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk, and thus the University of the future was partly saved from the evil effects of a system which has shown its evils only too visibly in the case of the present College. What is most surprising is that Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk himself, who had in 1907 declared it as his opinion that not only all Trustees should in future be elected for five years only, but that the present Trustees should also be deemed to have been elected for five years, should after five years not only desire to retain all the present Trustees as Life Members of the new Court but also seek to add to the number of such Trustees against the emphatic opinion of so many of his colleagues. One pleasing feature of this meeting of the Trustees was a scheme for the grant of gratuities to servants of the College drawing a salary of less than Rs. 25 a month on their retirement. The original scheme prepared by the Finance Member of the Syndicate was considerably altered and it has been decided to award in all suitable cases recommended by the heads of departments a gratuity of the last year's salary to such a servant retiring after a continuous service of not less than 15 years, and of the last two years' salary to one retiring after the completion of 25 years' continuous service. This decision would apply to those also who are already in service, and we congratulate the Trustees on being just to those who never threaten to strike even if they are generous to those who do. But an unfortunate decision was arrived at, inasmuch as the Trustees passed the rules which members of the self-constituted Female Education Association of Aligarh had passed more than six months ago, although few had considered these rules before attending the meeting, and it appeared from the rules themselves none of them was permitted to amend. A majority of the Trustees present was in favour of adding a clause to the effect that the Trustees of the College shall have power to repeal, add to or amend these rules; but 25 proxies are more than enough to swamp any such majority when the attendance dwindles down to about 15 at the close of the meeting. One Trustee asked a number of questions, drawing the attention of the Trustees and the Honorary Secretary to the fact that the Secretary's report required by the rules had ceased to be presented to the Board after the death of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, that the Principal's report is never presented to the Trustees nor discussed by them, that the report and the budget of the building department are not circulated to the Trustees nor come under discussion at any meeting of the Board, and that the standard of cricket at the College had fallen, was falling and, in view of the University Regulations recently enacted at the instigation of the staff of the College, would continue to fall. No satisfactory answer could be given to any of these questions, nor was one really attempted. The Honorary Secretary asked for notice, and as no rules exist to regulate the power of interpellation and none of the existing rules specify the legal effect of Resolutions of the Trustees, we hope no time will be lost in framing such rules in order to guide the present Trustees, or failing that, the Trustees of the future University.

WE HAD, some time ago, announced that the Hon Mr Shams-ul-Huda had been recommended for a seat on the Bench of the Calcutta High Court, and that his appointment to that high office would shortly be made public. Our information was based on good authority; and if things had remained as they were at the time, the appointment would have been made and officially announced in due course. However, alter the recent announcement of the administrative changes and the creation of the Presidency of Bengal it was quite naturally felt that a public man of the capacity and attainments of the Hon Mr. Shams-ul-Huda might be selected for a post of still greater responsibility and distinction. We now understand that Mr Shams-ul-Huda has been recommended by the Government of India for the membership of the Executive Council of Bengal. We are sure the appointment, when it comes to be made, will be received with immense satisfaction by the entire public irrespective of race and creed. As a Judge of the High Court he would have been an acquisition to the Bench. As an Executive Councillor he would, we are sure, be a source of great help and strength to the Government in the administration of the Presidency. The duties of a member of Council are varied and onerous, and only a man of great strength of character and breadth of mind, having the power to handle all administrative problems with true insight, judicious temper and broad and statesmanlike outlook, can discharge them well. The Hon. Mr. Shams-ul-Huda eminently satisfies the test of fitness if we have all these qualifications in mind. As regards the four new seats added to the Bench of the Calcutta High Court, it is announced that the two out of them have been offered to and accepted by Mr. A. Chaudhuri and Mr. Hassan Imam. Both these gentlemen are distinguished and talented members of the Calcutta Bar and by virtue of their ability and disinterested patriotism have risen to great eminence in the public life of the country. They will both of them suffer considerable pecuniary loss by their translation to the Bench; and the Indian public life, which is none too rich in manliness, broadminded tolerance and independence of character, will also suffer a distinct loss. We believe, however, that the gain of the Calcutta Bench will also prove to be a public gain.

Some New Appointments.

WE REGRET that we were not able to express our appreciation earlier of the service which Urdu periodicals owned and edited by Hindu gentlemen are doing to the cause of Urdu as a language and Indian literature in general. There are only too many Hindus who show a regrettable narrowness in dealing with linguistic questions, but we do not believe that there are any fewer Mussalmans who proclaim only too loudly their apprehensions about the progress and even the very existence of Urdu, but who make not the smallest effort to develop it and increase the bulk of its literature. Justice and even self-interest demand that while giving no quarter to the linguistic bigots we should also admire the valuable contribution of such Hindus as the proprietors and editors of the Zamana and the Idrah, who are among the most practical and most sturdy champions of Urdu. The Zamana of Cawnpore issued a Royal Durbar number which, in addition to two tri-colour plates and 24 other half-tone pictures—all far more expensive additions than the readers have any notion of, though they help to make the paper popular and increase its circulation—contained an excellent little poem on the Durbar by the one and only Iqbal, and some appropriate pieces of prose writing. Altogether the number was a great success, and what pleases us most is the camaraderie of all castes and creeds which is such a distinguishing feature of these periodicals. But the Durbar number was not a very exceptional issue, for the level of Mr. Nigam's magazine is uniformly high. The short stories of the Zamana are little gems and show glimpses of an originality that contains in it the promise of a brilliant future.

The Comrade.

An Impossible Minister.

I.

THERE can be no doubt whatever that those among the Mussalmans of India who understand anything of British Politics in Europe and Asia and know something of the British Parliamentary system have disapproved of the trend of Sir Edward Grey's foreign policy since he deserted the Young Turks after the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina after a feeble and maladroit diplomacy. But there are many in this country who do not know even this much, and to them a condemnation of a particular policy or an individual Minister is much the same as a condemnation of the British Nation. In view of this consideration, while it is absolutely necessary that British policy, so far as it affects Indians, should be clear and unambiguous, and that instead of undue reticence and evasion it should be explained and justified to them from time to time, Indian publicists also should make it clear to the people that whenever they differ from a Minister or even a Cabinet, and condemn a measure or a policy, they do not involve the British connexion in that condemnation, but keep it far out of the arena of political controversy.

We ourselves have voiced from time to time the universal feeling of such Mussalmans as take an intelligent interest in British foreign policy, and in doing so have never hesitated to call a spade a spade. We were worried by no imaginary fears which make people cut and clip their words and reduce their meaning to intellectual nullity, but which in reality betray the suspicion that the British Government in India is essentially opposed to candour and honest expression of opinion. It must be admitted that our own experience is not a long one; but slender as it is, it has none the less never inspired us with a horror of frankness and the use of effective language to press home our criticism. But it would be a poor return for this tacit encouragement of unfettered criticism, as frank as it is meant to be friendly, to suggest in any way that the foreign policy of the present English Government, which we have condemned, is in reality the deliberate and set purpose of the British Nation, that sheet anchor of India and all young nationalities struggling for enlightenment, freedom and unity. Indeed, the object of our writings has been more the expression of the public opinion among educated Mussalmans for the benefit of the Government than the guidance of that opinion itself, and, that being our motive, it presupposes a great hope that when these views are brought to the notice of the British Nation, either directly or through the Government of India, they would also affect public opinion in England in some measure. It cannot be conceived that an Imperial race should for ever be so ignorant of the demands of true Imperialism as to settle the policy of the Empire merely according to the wishes of a tenth of its population that inhabits the British Isles, and to be guided solely by their parochial intelligence and knowledge. Lord Morley has already assured us that in shaping the policy of the Foreign Office the feelings of a hundred million Mussalmans whose destinies have been placed in the hands of Great Britain are a guiding consideration. That is the legitimation of Moslem feeling during the war in Tripoli and the long-drawn Persian crisis, so long as that feeling itself is not vitiated by the taint of sedition. But while that assurance sanctions sentiments that are the necessary corollary of the Islamic faith, it in no way encourages disloyal ideas. In fact it promotes the loyalty which was being strained by the narrowness of so-called Imperialists, who smelt anarchy in every expression of sympathy for the Turks or of apprehensions for Persia.

Another source of strength to the Moslem loyalist who saw no inconsistency in sympathy for his co-religionists and allegiance to his Sovereign is an important section of the British Press which not only denounced the Italian raid and suspected Russian designs in Persia, but openly declares that Sir Edward Grey is now impossible. What makes us believe that this is the awakening of the British Nation itself after its somewhat long slumber is that there is no suspicion in this of the tactics of party politics. Both Liberals and Conservatives have been showing a growing dissatisfaction with the consequences of Sir Edward Grey's diplomacy. And yet this is no vulgar "G. M. G." (Grey Must Go!) like the "B. M. G." of the Die-Hards and the Last-Ditchers. If any doubt arises about this, it can easily be settled by applying to the situation the formula, "Tell me your friends and I will tell you what you are". The loudest supporter of Sir Edward Grey is Mr. Leo Maxse of the National Review himself.

To the December number of the Fortnightly Review "Diplomaticus" contributed a criticism of Sir Edward Grey the dispassionate tone of which would do credit to Sir Edward himself. It is not an indictment from the beginning to end, for praise is liberally mixed with blame. But there is no balance to the credit of the Foreign Secretary at the end of the reckoning, and we should indeed have been surprised if this cold and penetrating analysis of "Sir Edward Grey's Stewardship" had not powerfully influenced public opinion in England. The writer invites attention not merely to the six years' record of peace to which Lord Lansdowne referred with such gratification, but also to "a dangerously unstable international situation which has persisted during the whole of Sir Edward Grey's tenure of office," a tenure which is rightly characterised as "one long succession of more or less perilous crises." This is, indeed, an important fact and one which is apt to be ignored. No city can claim credit merely for the promptness with which the civic authorities put out its fires if the fires recur so often that the cures themselves suggest the absence of prevention. "At least three times during these six years Europe has stood on the brink of a great war in which we must inevitably have been involved, and to-day, apart from the scandalous foray of Italy in the Eastern Mediterranean, the general international outlook presents a picture of tension, of passion, and of veiled conflict which cannot but inspire the gravest anxiety."

In examining Sir Edward Grey's policy the writer explains "the two great rival formulæ of European policy which have for their object the maintenance of the general peace." Many would no doubt look askance at the Concert of Europe which the writer prefers as a formula of European policy, for it is generally known how unjust that Concert proved to Moslem States. But they will no doubt not find much consolation in the results of the rival formula of Balance of Power, which has brought more trouble to those States in less than a decade than the Concert did in a lifetime, and that too, when all these States showed unmistakable signs of progress or, at any rate, of the arrest of decay. It certainly does not look as if the prayer of the weaker States was granted, that (May God raise evil wherein may be our good) "Neither," says "Diplomaticus," "is infallible, and, indeed, both have had compromising vicissitudes of fortune, but whereas the Balance is only an expedient inherently unstable and variable owing to its fundamental concept of rivalry and the constantly disturbing influence thus exerted on the balance of armaments, the Concert is perfect in theory and quite possible in practice, and has, moreover, the supreme merit of responding to certain ideals which are calculated to dignify and elevate the otherwise often squalid machinery of international relations." It is true that after the break-up of the Quadruple Alliance it became "more of an ideal than a practical policy," but occasionally it managed to assume material shape, notably in exerting pressure on Turkey. Canning, however, gave "a work-a-day substitute, the policy of Free Hands which of late years has been called 'Splendid Isolation' though a more correct designation for it would be Splendid Opportunism." This formula the writer explains as "the opportunist entente, without specific fighting obligations, and ad hoc alliances to meet grave emergencies, but terminable with the emergencies." According to "Diplomaticus," it was a tremendous success, for while it occasionally toyed with the Balance it always kept the Concert steadily in view, and meanwhile held the door open for equally friendly relation with all Powers whatever their other attachments. This form of isolation was in reality no isolation, for it gave England as allies all the Powers who in a given crisis really wanted peace. Now, it is this writer's contention that although some people regard Lord Lansdowne's Japanese Alliance and the entente cordiale with France as a new departure, which Sir Edward Grey has only continued, it was nothing of the kind, but "only a return to an older tradition which the events of the eighties and later nineties had momentarily set aside." According to him, what Lord Lansdowne had originally in mind was merely to terminate the intolerable situation created by the long and bitter feuds with Russia and France, without any idea of modifying the Anglo-German relations.

We are not disposed to regard Lord Lansdowne exactly in the same light as "Diplomaticus" views him. We have already expressed it as our view in the issue of 14th October last, that although Sir Edward Grey did not initiate the policy of alliances, but merely took it up from his predecessor in office, "he has followed it far beyond the limits originally contemplated." It is not our belief that Lord Lansdowne intended to place a cordon round Germany and contemplated an alliance with Russia as well as France against that Power, for in that case it can rightly be argued, as "Diplomaticus" has done, that "Lord Lansdowne would scarcely have desired to begin his work by smashing one of his proposed allies." But it must also be remembered that not even Lord Lansdowne foresaw the victory of Japan, much less desired or helped in smashing a prospective ally. While the Russian Bear was unshorn of its brutal strength, danger lay in that quarter rather than in Germany, and the Japanese Alliance was an ad interim arrangement before the affections of the Bear were won over by the Unionist Foreign Secretary. It was only the crushing defeat of Russia that altered the situation completely. It robbed the Japanese Alliance of part of its value, made the friendly overtures to Russia more acceptable to the half-killed giant, and left Germany, after the two wars waged in South Africa and in Manchuria by the two other strongest powers of Europe, with an improved proportion of strength and enhanced chances of growth.

But whatever the cause or causes, when Lord Lansdowne made over charge of the office, England had wholly regained France and partly regained Russia. The end of those bitter feuds appeared in sight which had led England to the brink of war with France on three separate occasions in a single decade, and which increased the burdens of the Indian tax-payer who had to maintain out of his scanty resources a daily growing army on the North-West Frontier. The problem, then, was, how to maintain friendliness with these two Powers without creating an enemy in Germany or Austria. That was the task of Sir Edward Grey, and it is obvious that in this he has signally failed.

It cannot be argued in his defence that if he has offended the Germans and their Austrian allies, he has maintained the affections of the French and the Russians. Such an argument presupposes that all Sir Edward Grey had to do was to substitute new enemies for old. But even that supposition cannot save him, for in the first place, never were the relations with France so strained before the entente cordiale as have been those with Germany during Sir Edward Grey's tenure of office, and, in the second place, while military expenditure in India has not been reduced, and in view of the Persian trouble may have to be increased, naval expenditure in England has been increasing apace as the direct result of rivalry with Germany, which itself increases with the increase of armaments. It is the contention of those who disapprove of Sir Edward Grey's foreign policy that, while it is not proved that France will certainly do for England what England has recently done for France, and while it is certain that Russia will not show her friendship in a similar manner, Germany and Austria have definitely become enemies, that Europe is far less disposed towards peace to-day than when Sir Edward took over charge of the Foreign Office. That Asia is distinctly less friendly to England than before, that what sanctity was ever attached to treaties and agreements has now vanished, that the Moslem subjects of His Majesty have been exasperated, and that the pace in the mad race for military and naval superiority which prompted the ententes with France and Russia is much more furious to-day than it was six years ago. This is a long list of charges, and if even half of these are proved to the hilt, it will not be possible to call Sir Edward Grey's stewardship a success.

Before we examine these charges seriatim, in another issue, it must be understood that we shall not deal with intentions. In the administration of affairs intentions play a very small part indeed, for although they reflect on the character of the agent, they do not affect the nature of the acts. This is nothing but the truth in all departments of activity; but in diplomacy it is also the whole truth. Its only test is success, and there is no such thing as a grand failure. We have no desire to question the character or the motives of Sir Edward except so far as they reflect themselves in his acts, and indeed we may say that he is reputed to be a man of unimpeachable character, though his "generous aspirations" are somewhat unfructuous because, as Mr W. T. Stead says, "he is easily daunted in the pursuit of his ideals." Mr. Stead in a character sketch of Sir Edward in the January issue of the Review of Reviews instances three occasions on which he failed to screw his courage to the sticking place. He writes—

He was serious for the maintenance of the authority of the treaties of 1856, 1871 and 1878, when Austria-Hungary annexed Bosnia and the Herzegovina without saying 'by your leave' to the signatory powers. But when his attempt to maintain the Public Law of Europe was thwarted by the German mailed fist, he appears to have abandoned the cause of the Public Law as hopeless.

Another instance was the Congo question on which he wrote a despatch "which gladdened the heart of the Congo Reform Association." But what was the sequel? "No sooner, however, did he discover that there were rocks ahead than he turned on his own tracks with a celerity which made Mr Morel nearly expire with grief and chagrin." The third instance is too recent to need detailed mention, and Mr. Stead's simile of a "burnt child who dreads fire" is only too apt. And this is possible only in a man whose "generous aspirations" lack the divine fire of enthusiasm. The story goes, and Mr. Stead quotes it appositely, that Sir George Otto Trevelyan once replied to someone who asked him what manner of man Sir Edward is, "Some think he is as black as the devil, others believe him to be as white as an angel. In fact he is neither. He is just Grey." Both Sir George Trevelyan and Mr. Stead have personal knowledge of the Foreign Secretary's character which is denied to men in humbler stations and at such distance. But without knowing this story, we ourselves had chanced upon this expression and called the Foreign Secretary a pale grey Liberal. Anyhow the pun supplies Mr. Stead with another good simile. "He is a cold man, somewhat colourless, and therefore better able to take on, like a chameleon, the hue of the tree to which he clings." And these men, Sir Francis Bertie at Paris, and still more, Sir F. Cartwright, who inspires the rabid letters of the Times Vienna correspondent, are not only notoriously Germanophobe, but also anti-Moslem. Be that as it may, whatever may be the character of Sir Edward Grey, and whatever the feelings and motives of the entourage that dominates him, Sir Edward Grey cannot take refuge behind a barricade of the flagstones of the nether regions. It is not with his intentions that we are concerned.

but with his actions, not so much with causes as with consequences. It is by these that he must be judged, and the very position which he occupies deprives him of the consolation of those who stake all on the nobility of their enterprise, the comforting thought that

"Tis not in mortals to command success,
But we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

The Viceroy at Dacca.

THE visit of His Excellency the Viceroy to Dacca, following after the sudden changes announced at Delhi, had been looked forward to by the Mussalmans throughout India with more than anxious concern. The changes in themselves, at any rate as regards their downright physical aspect, may not be as formidably portentous as they look; and beyond bruising certain hearts, dislocating a few vested interests and affecting the material and moral progress of the large Moslem community in Eastern Bengal, they may not mean any distinct departure in the spirit and methods of the policy that underlies the governance of this country. But acts of State have not a mere physical aspect only. It is their moral and political effect that mostly matters, that ultimately determines their utility in the scheme of government. The Durbar Announcement may in official parlance mean nothing more than the removal of the capital to Delhi and the redistribution of certain administrative areas. It is not, however, in the spirit of red tapeism that the value of these executive coups has been assessed. Calcutta feels as if it has been betrayed. The Bengali Hindu has risen several cubits in political stature and is singing lustily songs in praise of "constitutional agitation." The Behari is swearing at a section of the Bengali Press that would not willingly let him enjoy the luxury of a separate High Court. The Mussalman, not only in Eastern Bengal but in every other part of the country, has been left floundering in a sea of doubts to examine his political charts and compass and estimate anew the resources of "contented loyalty." Even official despatches conceived in the spirit of excessive gratulation and soaked in antique sentiment have their aftermath

Be this as it may, the changes have come to stay. It is with their political and moral effect on the Mussalman opinion that we are primarily concerned to-day. Though their immediate practical effect will be felt by the Eastern Bengal Mussalmans, the manner in which the ripping open of a "settled fact" has been carried out has profoundly impressed the community throughout the land. To the Mussalmans it is something peculiarly strange, this abrupt character of the change that has come over the spirit of the Government policy. They feel the shifting of the political horizons and observe with no uncertain feelings the emergence of the new, incalculable forces that may conceivably render their political creed old-fashioned and obsolete and thrust them out of their legitimate share in the direction of Indian affairs. If the Government can bow to a persistent political agitation out of a mere consideration of expediency in one case, why not in another? If the legitimate facilities afforded to the Mussalmans can be taken away and solemn pledges broken at the bidding of a few demagogues with hysterical followings, there is no knowing that the general political status of the community may not suffer a similar fate. Such are the fears and misgivings that have begun to assail the minds of even the most temperate and politically conservative sections of the Mussalmans, and we leave it to the Government of India to judge how far the existence of such misgivings in a "contented and loyal" community is desirable in the best interests of the country.

The Viceroy's visit to Dacca, in view of the Moslem feeling throughout the country, possessed unusual interest and importance at the present time. He was expected not only to strike the keynote of the policy that the Government of united Bengal is to adopt in order to mitigate, in some measure, the hardships of the community that has been dethroned from its predominant position, but to indirectly reassure the Mussalmans of India that the pledges given to them in regard to their political status shall be kept in full integrity. The Moslem Deputation that waited on Lord Hardinge on the 31st January, headed by the Navab Bahadur of Dacca, was no mere conventional body of gentlemen approaching the Viceroy as a matter of formal courtesy. It was charged with a vital mission to lay before His Excellency the feelings of the Moslem community in Eastern Bengal created by the altered situation in which it has been left. What passed between the Viceroy and the Moslem representatives was not made public until this morning, and even then the Private Secretary of the Viceroy only selected a few daily papers for communicating His Excellency's pronouncement. We do not know why the shroud of secrecy has been thrown round a matter which has been in one way or another of so much pith and moment to the Mussalmans since the changes came to be announced. We hope it is not the result of a habit of secrecy formed after the recent secret despatches, or the clinging traits of diplomacy which have outlived their necessity. In any case, we think we have a genuine grievance in being wholly ignored even now when the Government has chosen to communicate what it needlessly regarded as secret and confidential.

We have already dealt in full detail with the needs of the Mussalmans of Bengal and how these needs should be met. They should have their full and legitimate share in all the political institutions and the public service of the province. Above all, their educational needs should be particularly looked after and should receive careful and special treatment. The Times of India has dealt with this question in a very sympathetic and luminous article on "The Muhammadans of Bengal" in its issue of the 23rd January. After discussing the definite safeguards that the Government should adopt in order to counteract the evil consequences likely to flow from the disappearance of Eastern Bengal as a separate province and the damage to the Moslem position, our contemporary urges the importance of formulating a comprehensive scheme of Moslem education which should be systematically worked out and pursued by the Mussalmans with the help of the Government. Says our contemporary:—

Schools and yet more schools, high schools and colleges, in districts where the need of the Muhammadans is greatest, and conducted on lines which specially meet the demands and susceptibilities of the Muhammadan community—these are the means whereby the Moslems can secure their salvation in the new Bengal. We suggest to the Muhammadans who are giving anxious thought to the position that this is a programme on which they should concentrate, for it is the only one which secures the future of their race in the new province. It is one which should rally every section of the community, and in which they can count confidently upon the support of the Government of India. It demands no change of policy from those in authority, for it is but the continuance of measures which would have been pushed to their logical conclusion if the development of Eastern Bengal and Assam under its own Government had not been abruptly arrested, and it is designed to secure the fulfilment of the ends specifically declared in the despatch. We would moreover add that this is a policy which the Government of India cannot leave entirely to the Governor of Bengal and his Council. They have inferentially assured the Secretary of State that the interests of the Muhammadans in Eastern Bengal shall not suffer under the redistribution, and they cannot put aside the responsibility there assumed, leaving its execution solely to a Bengal Government with its headquarters in Calcutta. They must see that the expectations based on their assurances—expectations which, combined with their traditional loyalty and respect for the person of the King-Emperor, have induced the Muhammadans silently to acquiesce in these radical schemes—are realised, so far as it is in the power of the Government of India to accomplish that purpose.

The tone of this article is most sympathetic; but we are not sure if it did not foreshadow the new "boon" granted to Eastern Bengal by the Viceroy. In that case, it is not so much a recommendation for sympathetic treatment of the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal as an "intelligent anticipation of events," beloved of the Daily Press, and a subtle effort to persuade Mussalmans to await His Excellency's pronouncement in the spirit of the prayer, "For all that we are about to receive, may the Lord make us truly thankful."

The Mussalmans accepted the decision of the Government with loyal acquiescence and have refrained from giving vent to angry feelings or indulge in the sort of agitation which has been almost consecrated by recent acts of the Government itself. It rested with the Government to show that their interests would be duly safeguarded and that the pledges given to them would be redeemed in full. Without definite safeguards, permanently binding and not dependent on the will of a Governor or a Viceroy, however sympathetic and well meaning, their future advancement cannot at all be assured. The Bengali Hindu exercises a very thoroughgoing and masterful influence in Calcutta, and the Mussalman cannot hope to secure his due share in the direction of provincial affairs unless the necessary equality of opportunity is afforded to him by the Government. It is a fashion with a certain class of newspapers to talk of the identity of interests between the Mussalmans and the Hindus of Bengal and to dub all communal activities as sectarian. We have never yet come across a single instance in which any one of these "patriotic" newspapers ever assisted the Mussalmans in their efforts to improve their lot educationally even by a word of sympathy or practical advice. The "identity" of interests exists as long as the Mussalmans feel no "interest" in their own progress and wellbeing. We believe Lord Hardinge has acquired enough knowledge of the Indian questions to be able to appraise the false cry of "separatism" at its proper value. The blatant preacher of Indian unity who practices the most exclusive and narrow creed of caste ascendancy is the will-o'-the-wisp that the Viceroy has yet to distinguish from the few steady lights of Indian politics—the high-souled dreamers and patriots. We may point out to His Excellency the dangers of the racial and religious bias that masquerades as patriotism by referring to the passage in the Address presented to him by "The Dacca People's Association," in which it was suggested that "in the regulations for the election of members to the Councils.....the principle of racial distinction in the matter of representation....." should be discarded. It is these sanctionous onslaughts on "the principle of racial distinction in the matter of representation" that have aroused the greatest apprehensions amongst the Mussalmans, because the sentiment is so fair to outward seeming and yet, alas! so false. That they can mislead to some extent even seasoned diplomats like Lord Hardinge would be evident from the manner of His Excellency's reply. It is, however, gratifying to find the Viceroy firmly laying it down "that pledges once given by the Government will not be broken." Our only wish is that this principle should be courageously enunciated wherever the occasion calls for it and as courageously applied. The Mussalmans ask for nothing more than that the pledges given to them by the Government should be kept intact and that they should be afforded the necessary equality of opportunity in their efforts at self-regeneration.

In the light of the foregoing remarks let us examine the pronouncement of His Excellency at Dacca. It is evident that this examination must be cursory and far from exhaustive, for we go to press within a few hours of the publication of the Private Secretary's communication. We are glad the Viceroy recognized education to be the greatest need of the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal, but it is equally the greatest need of the Mussalmans of Western Bengal, and the creation of a University at Dacca, and the appointment of a special officer for education in Eastern Bengal are an exemplification of the Persian adage

سوال از آسمان جواب از زمین

What the Mussalmans want, and that throughout Bengal, East and West, South and North, is the appointment of separate officers in each grade, from the Assistant Director of Public Instruction to the Deputy Inspector of Schools, to look after the Education of Mussalmans exclusively. What good a University at Dacca and a separate Director of Public Instruction for all communities will do to the backward Mussalmans only the Government of India know, and it is more than we can say if even the Government of India would tell. On the face of it the Government are obsessed by the dread of so called sectarianism, and until and unless they are made to understand that separate interests in India assume a caste or communal rather than a territorial aspect, there is no hope of their doing anything really useful for the Mussalmans. And as agitation is acknowledged by the Government to be the only effective method of converting them, we trust the Mussalmans, who are by tradition and instinct a proselytising community, will preach this doctrine on the road side and in the market-place till His Excellency and his colleagues are converted. So far as the scheme of a University at Dacca is concerned, it will seriously affect the prestige and influence of the proposed Moslem University, and His Excellency's new "boon" has confirmed the new significance that has now come to be associated with that ominous word. What the Mussalmans would have liked is, in the first place, an apportionment of the educational budget of the united Bengal between the two great communities in such a way that no school which taught Moslem boys or girls could have its progress impeded merely for lack of funds as at present, and, in the next place, the creation of two first grade colleges, mainly though not exclusively for the Mussalmans, aided by the Government, one at Calcutta, and the other at Dacca. What the Government has now done, however, gives no guarantee that Moslem students will not be refused admission into the Presidency College at Calcutta because their number had already reached thirty-five out of more than a hundred in each class, nor that Mrs. Sakhawat Husain, that courageous and noble lady who has founded and maintained almost exclusively at her own cost, both in money and labour, the only Moslem Girls' School in Calcutta, would not be told by the Department that she has no prospect of getting even a paltry grant of less than a hundred rupees a month, because the Bethune College needs improvements!

As regards the representation of Mussalmans upon local bodies, while the Viceroy deprecates the principle of proportional representation, he makes no promise at all that the Mussalmans would be treated any better than they are at present, and leaves them entirely at the mercy of the Local Governments. We must say this reminds us of Dickens' "my partner," that mythical personage who never existed, but who was always unkind to refuse a bargain which the sole proprietor did not choose to accept and yet did not wish to appear personally to refuse. These satrapies had no existence whatever when the far-reaching changes announced at Delhi, which are now being so unskillfully sugar-coated, were thought of and adopted, nor do they seem to have been in existence when in their unadvised wisdom the Government of India decided in secret conclave to dump another Director and University on Bengal. The question of adequate and real Moslem representation on the local bodies is no longer a provincial concern, for His Excellency's predecessor announced more than five years ago at Simla in unmistakable terms that Moslem representation must everywhere be communal and adequate, irrespective of mere numbers. From that position no future Government can recede without sullying its own reputation for sincerity and consistency and without courting absolute moral bankruptcy. It is time that the Mussalmans forced this autocratic

Government to a sense of its moral responsibility, and if agitation is unpalatable to His Excellency, as we have been informed on good authority, we hope the Viceroy would take the only effective step to prevent an agitation on this subject. We have, however, some fear that His Excellency has a different notion to ours as to what that step really is. We had ourselves asked for a declaration that in the Executive Council of Bengal care should be taken to discover efficient Mussalmans as well as Hindus, so that as a rule Hindus and Mussalmans may alternately hold that appointment. But the promise of His Excellency that "in the recommendations made to the Secretary of State for the new Executive Councils Muhammadan interests would not be ignored" is no answer to the demand for adequate Moslem representation on the local bodies. What the juxtaposition really suggests is that agitation would be stifled by recognizing personal merits of one or two leading individuals. We held and still hold very strong views on the subject of the G. C. I. E. conferred on the Hon. Khwaja Sir Salmullah, the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca, but we refrained from commenting editorially on this honour because there was some fear that our comments may be thought to reflect adversely on the merits of that amiable and, in some respects, ideal leader of the Mussalmans. But there is no doubt that the Nawab Bahadur has himself suffered considerably in popular estimation on account of the title conferred on him only a few hours before the administration of an unmerited slap on the face of those who bore the brunt of the battle under the banner of the Nawab. While we trust that other Mussalmans also will have their merits adequately recognized in the near future, we must say that this promise, side by side with a neglect of the claims of Mussalmans as a whole, would be adding an insult to the individuals themselves to the injury already caused to the community. It will give point to the playful remark of our irresponsible co-adjutor, Mr. Gnp, that the Government of India purchase Peace with Honours!

Far the least satisfactory portion of His Excellency's reply was that which referred to the Moslem claim for an apportionment of appointments in the Public Service. The shibboleth of efficiency has been staled by usage and worn by frequency into the commonest of commonplaces, and it does not argue a great resourcefulness in the Government to take cover behind a somewhat meaningless phrase of long antiquity. If the Mussalmans ever ask that men not qualified for certain posts should be thrust upon them we shall be the first to denounce such a demand. But we do not think that even this backward community is so ridiculously foolish as to ask for moon a outside His Excellency's cosmography. What the Mussalmans demand is that for every post in the gift of the Government a qualification should be fixed below which the Government will at no time go, and that so long as a Mussalman with the requisite qualification can be had no non-Moslem should be appointed to that post until and unless the Mussalmans are adequately represented in that grade of service. This is a demand about which His Excellency has been unduly reticent and we do not know what purpose can be served by this uncalled-for silence. Talents are like currency and have a similar value in the market. Now, all know the absurdities and the exasperating difficulties that would result if the legal tender in a country is deprived of two of its essential merits, a fixed value and certainty. Yet this is just what is being done in the case of educational qualifications. Men possessing all the requisite qualifications are refused appointments because someone with a still higher academic degree, who in nine cases out of ten has failed to recommend himself to the seeker after efficiency, is prepared to undersell the applicant. Nobody would engage an applicant as his bearer or clerk because he is a graduate and yet prepared to accept the same wage as the customary Uria or the unsophisticated hararchi. Yet this is what is being done every day in Government offices. Posts for which the matriculate of a University, full of youth and spirits, would have done well enough, are given to worn-out and disappointed B. A.'s and "failed B. A.'s" whose very appearance and the price they themselves put on their talents mark them unmistakably with inefficiency. The result is disappointing in the offices and demoralising in the lecture rooms. This measuring of administrative and clerical efficiency with academic distinctions not only gives feeble administrators and droning clerks but reduces so-called liberal education to a farce. And the result is incidentally most harmful for the Mussalmans who have been themselves backward in securing degrees, and in addition to it also neglected by the Government. All that His Excellency recognizes is the "desirability of a proper share of these appointments being held by Muhammadans, provided they were duly qualified to do so," and all that he is prepared to do is "to impress that view upon their new Governor." Any person whom His Majesty may select for the administration of a Presidency is as a rule presumed to know a few things at least, and at the least generous computation we should have thought that Lord Carmichael knew the stale doctrine repeated by His Excellency too well to need further schooling. But where the mischief creeps in is that every incoming satrap and Viceroy repeats the shibboleth, and, after the usual five years, departs homewards with unredeemed pledges left as a damnum hereditas for his successor, and the still small voice of a protesting minority is drowned in the well-mannered applause of the triumphant majority. It is time that the reasonableness of the Moslem demand was fully recognized in the form of a Government of India Resolution setting forth the principle in unmistakable terms, if not in an Act of the Supreme Legislature, so that the "loyal" and the "contented" were not left to the mercy of gubernatorial interpretations and the whims of the Secretariat. This Lord Hardinge has not fore-shadowed in his reply to the Mussalmans at Dacca, and if this is the last word on the satisfaction of Moslem claims, then we have no hesitation in saying that it is absolutely disappointing.

Short Story.

Fate and the Colonel.

TO BEGIN with, Peggy's real name was not Peggy at all. It was Marguerite and she only allowed her very especial friends to call her anything but Marguerite in full. If anyone so presumed she corrected them without the slightest hesitation but with a certain fascinating manner. "My name is Marguerite Christine Villiers, and you do not know me well enough to call me Peggy."

And if the corrected one should be so bold as to question, "How long must one know you?" Peggy's usual reply, but always in the sweetest of tones, was "It all depends, but I am afraid you—" with just the slightest inflexion on the pronoun—"will never know me well enough."

Whereupon the bold intruder would withdraw into his shell, fully realizing the extent of his folly.

It was invariably a "he" who so presumed, until at last Peggy began to look upon the sex with a decidedly superstitious mien as to their frivolousness.

Some women are born to fascinate. They cannot help themselves. It is not that they are exceptionally beautiful, for they may not be even good looking from most people's point of view, but there is some one thing about them that outweighs everything else, and their personality is absolutely charming. A woman may possess looks and yet fail to charm,—for beauty is but skin deep, but the woman who has that power of fascination does not fear the ravages of time as the merely beautiful woman does. And Peggy was one of these.

She was little more than a child and hardly realized her power. It was her first season in India, but the admiration she received might easily have turned the heads of many an older woman. Yet Peggy's daintily poised head was filled with more character than one might have given her credit for.

Perhaps her upbringing, with a somewhat old-fashioned maiden Aunt, had increased the strength of character with which nature had originally endowed her, but for her age she was wonderfully well balanced.

To describe her fully would be very difficult and might not do her justice even then, but her hair was a wavy wayward auburn with a habit of straying that even the most particular maiden aunt could not control or subdue. Her mouth and nose were not more noticeable than those of most people, but her eyes were glorious, big brown bewitching eyes, that one moment could be brimming with laughter and the next full of tender sympathy, winning admiration from all who came in contact with her. Therein lay Peggy's fascination. It was her eyes that drew men to her side, and the way in which she seemed to understand them kept them willing prisoners.

She was the despair of mothers with plain daughters, the avowed sweetheart of every small boy who knew her, and her popularity the envy of all. Such was Peggy when the Dashshires were garrisoned to the station, and every man amongst them, from the colonel to the latest joined subaltern, felt a certain feeling of self-satisfaction when he found himself the lucky man to play tennis with her, take her in to dinner, or knew that her name came next upon his dance programme. And in spite of all the attention she received there was not a woman in the station who would have dared to call her a flirt.

In just as many days as it takes minutes to write down, the Senior Subaltern had fallen in love with her. Not the sitting out dances, taking into dinner, tennis partner kind of falling in love, but the downright, serious, business-like kind of affair, which if a man is not very careful leads to marriage in no time.

Now, the Colonel saw which way the wind was blowing from the very outset, and as every decent Colonel does, he fought against it.

They know that it is madness to start trying to keep a wife before a fellow can keep himself, and that particular Colonel knew perfectly well that Wargrave, the Senior Subaltern, hadn't a penny beyond his pay. But he also knew Peggy. And if he had not had a wife himself, to say nothing of the family, he might have tried to have saved Wargrave in that way. There is no knowing. Colonels are men all the world over where a fascinating woman is concerned. And Peggy had fascinated them all without a doubt.

But the Colonel managed six months leave for Wargrave. He had been seedy. It was a splendid excuse, and the Colonel thought he was doing the very best thing for the boy.

He went home on a troopship and dreamed of Peggy and days to come.

There was no engagement, no scandal. Wargrave went and Peggy stayed.

But Fate had decreed those two should meet and their destinies be woven in one with the other.

Peggy had a letter from every port and heard regularly each-mail for two months. Then something quite unforeseen happened. Sir Andrew Villiers, Peggy's grandfather, died suddenly, and her father on receipt of the cable started for home immediately.

When four months later Jimmie Wargrave rejoined his Regiment, the Colonel wondered if Fate would still have given him a married subaltern if he had not tried to circumvent her. But he took a certain amount of consolation out of the fact that the latest addition to the Regiment was one that every man amongst them was proud of. He bore his disappointment like a soldier and his wife gave a dinner party to welcome the bride.

Verse.

A Dream of Youth.

METHOUGHT I dreamt a dream,
Delicious, sense-enthraling,
That one, forsooth may deem
Was come of Heaven's own calling.

The joys of life were there,
Such joys as never pall,
And all of earth or air
Seemed beautiful withal.

The joy that beamed within me
Shone mirrored all about,
And my notes of ecstasy
Were echoed with a shout.

Each phase of smiling nature
To me was full of glee,
With every living creature
My heart had sympathy.

Each tiny little flower
In garden, sward or heath,
Aye! every blade of clover
With nought but joy did breathe.

In every rustic maiden
I saw a thousand charms,
With homely virtues laden
Worthy my loving arms.

And nought of vice or failing
Peopled my vision world
No sorrow, no bewailing
Was ever seen or heard.

And "always to be blessed"
Was not the lot of man,
For blessing I confessed
O'erflowed our mortal span.

In such a world methought
I lived and had my being,
Where faith was sold nor bought,
Where seeing was believing.

And then there came a waking,
My happy dream was gone,
The shadows of my making
All vanished one by one.

Alas! it was no dream
But stern reality,
The type of what I deem Youth's ideality.

On lightning wings it came
On lightning wings 'twas gone:
Youth is an empty name
The blushes of a dawn.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

The Persia Committee gave a banquet in honour of Mr. Shuster on the 29th January at which two hundred Persians were present. In his speech Mr. Shuster prefaced his remark with the declaration that he spoke without irritation or rancour. Reciting his experiences during the past eight months, he dealt with the opposition to the finance law, the Stokes case and confiscation of the property of Shua-eh-Sultaneh, and continued "After a careful review of the incidents of the period of several months I believe that one of two conclusions must be drawn. Either the Russian and British Governments, and particularly the former in respect of the acts of its Consular officials in Persia, must have intended to pursue a policy calculated to destroy all hope of Persia's regeneration or the two Governments must have been continuously and grossly misinformed regarding what was happening on the spot. I am not bitter about my own experience but I should be a hypocrite if I pretended not to sympathise with the bitterness of the Muhammadan people who have so forcibly learned the lesson that the 'Ten Commandments do not apply to international politics. Let anyone who doubts this, review the events of the past year."

Moslem Feeling.

THE Committee of the London All-India Muslim League, in forwarding the resolutions passed at a Mass Meeting of the Mussalmans of the Madras Presidency, have addressed a letter to the Under-Secretary of State, Foreign Office, in which they say —

The Committee in submitting these resolutions, at the special request of the organisers of the Meeting, beg leave to state that the feelings of concern are universal among all Muhammadans, irrespective of sectarian differences, and even extend to non Moslem communities. Both at this and the Mass Meeting held at Bombay on the 8th December as at the earlier meeting in Calcutta and other important centres of population, Sunnis and Shi'ahs have joined in appealing to His Majesty's Government to preserve, in accord with explicit declaration, of the Anglo-Russian Convention, the independent existence of Persia.

The Committee feel it necessary to mention this fact as they have observed with regret statements in certain ill informed journals, that the Persians being Shi'ah "dissenters" any calamity to them will not effect Sunni sentiment.

At a Special Meeting of the Anjuman-i Imamiyah, Shahganj, Agra, held on the 24th January 1912, the following resolutions were passed:—

(1) That this Meeting of the Anjuman-i Imamiyah, Shahganj, Agra, look with great abhorrence and regret on the highhanded action of Russia in undermining the independence and integrity of Persia and earnestly hopes and prays that British Government will use its good offices to safeguard the sovereign rights of Persia.

(2) That a copy of the above resolution be forwarded to the Viceroy with the request that this may be forwarded to the Foreign Minister.

(3) That the Anjuman is sincerely grateful to the London Persia Committee for raising their voice in defence of Persia and her sovereign rights.

(4) That the copies of the resolutions passed at this meeting should be sent to Lord Lamington, Professor Browne, Mr. Lynch, Secretary, London Persia Committee, and the Persian Consul-General in India.

At a largely attended meeting of Muhammadans of Lahore on the 30th January the following resolutions of protest against Russian aggression in Persia were passed:—That the Muhammadans of Lahore assembled in a mass meeting regard Muscovite activities in Northern Persia as an open violation of the Anglo-Russian agreement, and in placing on record their deep abhorrence of the barbarous cruelties practised upon their co-religionists in Tabriz as corroborated by the New York Herald, venture to call upon their benign Government to take effective steps to preserve the independence and integrity of Persia which are menaced by the Russian repudiation of the spirit of the agreement. The Mussalmans of Lahore further beg to offer their deep gratitude to Earl Curzon, Lord Lamington, Professor Browne and other notable Englishmen and Englishwomen whose disinterested efforts in pleading the cause of hopeless and distracted people have earned the imperishable regard of millions of His Imperial Majesty's Moslem subjects. That this mass meeting of Mussalmans of Lahore is in entire accord with the views expressed by Nawab Vikar-ul-Mulk Bahadur, Honorary Secretary of M. A. O. College, Aligarh, as to the firm but respectful attitude that the Mussalmans should adopt in connection with the Persian and Tripolitan questions, and places its implicit confidence in the ability of the Nawab to lead them through the darkness that surrounds it at present.

"The Honorary Secretary, All-India Muslim League is informed by the Government of India that 'His Majesty's Government have reason to believe that the negotiations between Russia and Persia, the course of which it has been their utmost endeavour to smooth, are on the point of reaching a satisfactory conclusion'."

Russians at Tabriz.

IN THE Times of the 2nd instant there is an official statement from our Foreign Office that "His Majesty's Consul at Tabriz reports that the stories of massacre there are entirely without foundation. On the contrary, Persian women and children took refuge in the Russian camp and were well treated." In the case of Tripoli, it will be remembered, Sir E. Grey argued that the British Consul's evidence concerning the Italian atrocities was worthless because he was not present at the fighting and could not, therefore, have been an eyewitness of the alleged events, he could only report what he had heard. In that case, it was clear from Sir E. Grey's remarks, that he had a report from the British Consul, but it was against the Italians, and so he discredited and suppressed it. In Tabriz there is a report from the British Consul whitewashing the Russians. We are not told whether he was an eyewitness of the fighting or is merely retailing the Russian account. Thus does our nimble and straightforward Foreign Secretary pick his way, always excusing invasions of weak countries or censoring any humanitarian protests against atrocities committed in the course of these invasions.

Against the official Russian denials concerning the reports of the behaviour of the Russian troops at Tabriz, the following telegrams from the Andjuman (committee) at Tabriz and the Commander of the Tabriz Fida'is to the Andjuman-i-Sadeti-iraniyan (Persian Committee, of Constantinople, published by the Berliner Tageblatt present considerable interest. The telegram from the Andjuman says —

"On 19th December the Russian troops made an attack on the public buildings. School children were kicked about and maltreated. Passers-by and sick and weak persons were killed. A few shops were pillaged. The population, which had hitherto shown extraordinary patience, flew to arms, and drove the Russians out of the public buildings.

"On 20th December the Russians, who had concentrated their forces at Bagh-i-Shemal, opened fire on the city. On 21st December there was a pause, and it was rumoured that negotiations were about to be entered upon. The population then laid aside their arms. The Russians, however, reopened fire, and women and other non-combatants were shot at—especially near the Russian Consulate and Bagh-i-Shemal. Numerous members of prominent families were wounded there and taken prisoners. The terror which seized the population was extraordinary. A large number of children and women were killed, and various houses were burnt down."

The telegram of the Commander of the Fida'is says "During the night of 20th December the Russians suddenly attacked and occupied the police premises. Two policemen were killed, and the offices were broken into. In the morning the Russians occupied the law courts and the premises of the Andjuman. Peaceful citizens in all parts of the town and the bazaar were robbed and maltreated. I could not view these atrocities calmly, and to vindicate Persia's rights I drove the Russians out of the public buildings. Acting upon the orders of the Central Government, I called upon the populace to preserve calm. Thereupon, on 21st and 22nd December the Russians began firing upon the city. They killed a number of women and children, and burnt numerous houses, including the properties of Hadji Hasan Khatai and Hadji Kazim Seraf. Twelve members of the former's family, including women and children, were wounded and are now in the hands of the Russians as prisoners. . . . The atrocities and barbarity of the Russians are unparalleled."

THE Novos Vremya of last Saturday publishes the following brief telegrams from Tabriz:—

"To-day our troops blew up the houses of Sattar Khan and Baghir Khan, who played a prominent part in the first siege of Tabriz and caused enormous losses to our subjects Their property has been confiscated."

"Four houses have been blown up from which our troops were shot at on 21st and 22nd December. Three more persons have been hanged by decision of the field court-martial. Order in town is being restored."

"Yesterday the new Governor-General Shuja-ed-Dowleh, paid a visit to Major-General Voroponoff, Commander of the Russian troops, who repaid the visit to-day."

Of this Shuja-ed Dowleh (otherwise known as Samad Khan) a gentleman well acquainted with Persian affairs observed in the course of conversation with a representative of the Russian Liberal organ Rech on Sunday last that "no sooner did the Russian troops occupy Tabriz than Samad Khan, an adherent of the ex-Shah, hastened to enter the city and proclaimed himself Governor. This same Samad Khan had never even dared to come anywhere near the gates of Tabriz since last June. Now, however, when Tabriz has fallen into the hands of the Russian troops, the adherent of the ex-Shah comes freely into Tabriz."

The same gentleman spoke of the recent executions in Persia as follows:—"The telegraph has already brought the news of the execution of Persians guilty of treacherous attacks upon the Russian detachment at Tabriz. The St Petersburg Telegraph Agency has, with the consent of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, informed the world that among the executed was a certain mollah,

London.]

[Daily News.]

CERTAINLY !!

Russia to John Bull: "Thanks very much for your help in that last affair. I presume I may rely upon your passive assistance in this case."

Sikat-ul-Islam. But this Sikat-ul-Islam was one of the most prominent personalities of modern Persia. He was one of the so-called mudjtahids who . . . or the one hand form the highest class of Moslem clergy, and on the other act as interpreters of the Shariate (religious law), on which the entire social life of Persia is based. The mudjtahids are learned theologians, enjoying the unlimited confidence and affection of the entire population. There are at present in Persia altogether about three or four mudjtahids, and among them the Sikat-ul-Islam was the most prominent. I have a firm conviction that his execution will arouse the indignation not only of the Persians but also of the Moslems of other countries. And what is still more melancholy, is that the execution was carried out on the tenth day of Muharram, the sacred day of the sacred month of the Persians. . . I am quite surprised that M. Miller, the Russian Consul-General, who is regarded as an authority on Persia, should not have considered those facts and should not have permitted the Sikat-ul-Islam to be executed on that day. Of course I am unable to say whether the late mudjtahid was really guilty of a treacherous attack upon Russian troops. I can only say this—if he really had taken part in the anti-Russian movement he would surely not have waited for the court-martial, but would have left Tabriz in good time."

Reuter's Agency learns that telegrams have been received from Russian sources at Tabriz giving details of the situation arising out of the recent attack on the Russians. According to these Sikat-ul-Islam, the high ecclesiastic whose execution has given rise to some adverse comment, had been preaching the extermination of the Russians, and in this he was assisted by other members of the clergy and also by the military commander of the Fidaia. Notwithstanding repeated requests from the Russian Consul that steps should be taken to stop the assembling of the Fidaia, Sikat-ul-Islam continued to encourage these "Anarchist" meetings. Documents were found on him proving that neither he nor the Anjuman had carried out the orders received from Teheran to stop the agitation against the Russians.

The execution of Sikat-ul-Islam was carried out on the evening after the conclusion of the Mussalman "feast" (i. e., the Muharram mourning) after a trial by the Military tribunal. Fifteen of the ringleaders of the attack on the Russians were sentenced to death and executed, while 26 were pardoned and released. All the accused were handed over to the Military tribunal by the population themselves.

The Liberal Rech of St Petersburg comments upon the latest events in Persia in the following strain—"Is it the end of Persian affairs and of Persia itself? The latest telegrams of the Russian Telegraph Agency from Persia announce occurrences which are familiar from the practice of the various expeditionary corps in Russia [the forces which suppressed the revolution in the Baltic provinces, the Caucasus, and elsewhere in 1906] They, as it were, carry us back to the familiar surroundings of our own life. The telegrams speak monotonously enough of gallows raised for the enhancement of Russian 'prestige,' of hanged mudjtahids, of blown-up houses according to the practice of Yalta [under the famous Governor Dumbaze in 1906 and 1907], of editors of Persian Liberal organs flogged in the presence of the Russian Consul. Such is the triumphal progress of the punitive expedition and field court-martial justice. The results as attested by the same agency are excellent. Everywhere 'order' is being restored by command of the Russian authorities, the bazaars and the shops are being opened, the local authorities which had been appointed by the Constitutional Government of Persia are fleeing or taking 'bast' [asylum], and the population greets with enthusiasm the execution of its spiritual leaders, and is filled with gratitude at the sight of the Russian rifles and nagukas which have freed it from the hated agitators."

"This picture, however, is not complete. It must be supplemented by another series of facts which run parallel with these occurrences. The two series are indeed closely bound up together, the second not only accompanying but being actually provoked by the former. The telegrams describing the successful action of the Russian expeditionary forces are followed by others describing the revived hopes of the ex-Shah, his relatives, friends, and adherents, the increased chances of his success, and the active steps taken by him and his adherents for realising these chances. The triumphal progress of the punitive expedition clears the road for Mahomet Ali and his Turcoman and Shahseven bands. Mahomet Ali is only waiting for the withdrawal of the Russian troops. By his own efforts he was unable to destroy in the North of Persia the sparks of the regenerated national life and extinguish the feeble light of Persian liberty."

The allusion to the activity of the ex-Shah is no doubt based upon a communication published by the Novoye Vremya a few days ago, coming apparently from the ex-Shah's own entourage, saying that a Circassian officer from the Caucasus named Hadji Murad Daudoff is now organising his Turcoman forces, that his residence at Guntish Tepe is the centre of great military activity, that his bodyguard is composed of Moslem Ossetians from the Caucasus, and that the end of the January or beginning of February (O.S.) would probably see his advance on Teheran.

England's Duty to Persia.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—I trust that at the protest meeting to be held about Persia on the 15th instant, someone with a better sight than I have to be listened to will have the courage to speak out the one word which alone can save the situation at Teheran, namely, that it is England's duty and in this case to break with Russia and to fight for Persia's independence.

The Times a few days ago challenged its contemporaries of the Liberal Press to say that Persia was "worth the bones of a single British grenadier," and mocked at those who were urging Sir Edward Grey to use his moral influence with the Russian Government to spare its victim. I confess that it seemed to me the Times was right, and I have looked since to see the challenge taken up, but so far in vain. Even you, sir, who have been so good a friend to Persia, have stopped short at this, and continue to treat it as a first premise of the case that war for Persia is not to be thought of, though you would have Sir Edward Grey protest and even withdraw from the Entente of 1907.

I venture to ask in what way such a protest or even such a withdrawal, would save Persia from her fate. Let us conceive Sir Edward protesting on moral grounds. What would be his arguments with the Russian Ambassador of sufficient efficacy to secure a retirement of the Russian troops from Kazvin or Tabriz? He would be obliged to point out how wrong a thing it was for a great Christian Power to take advantage of the weakness and financial straits of an ancient but non-Christian nation to occupy its territory on the plea of restoring order, an order it had itself disturbed. He would have to protest against the bloodshed, the massacre and the rest of the horrors thereby inflicted on a people proud of their independence and resenting foreign invasion, the atrocities of war to be followed by executions on the plea of pretended rebellion. He would feel it his duty to warn His Excellency, as a friend, against the terrible temptation there would be to remain on in possession on the further plea of repairing the injury done, of educating the conquered people to self-government, and finally of protecting foreign interests, which would have grown up in connection with the foreign occupation, while it would be impossible for the Occupying Power to evade the duty of just government as long as its military control should be continued. It would be a sad thing to see Russia descend step by step to the moral degradation of having to suppress all the reality of Persian independence, and finally, perhaps, annex Persia to the Czar's already over-burdened Empire. If we can imagine the good Sir Edward Grey plying His Russian Excellency with these quite admirable phrases, we can also imagine the polite smile with which they would be received, ending in ripples of less staid hilarity. Alles, done, farieur! Parlez-moi de l'Egypte

No. I venture to affirm that moral protest applied by Sir Edward Grey, seeing what his Foreign Office morality of late has been, to the Foreign Office of His Majesty the Czar, seeing what Russian morality notoriously is, would only expose our Government to confusion. In this I agree with the Times. What I do not agree with is that the alternative is to go on with our wrongdoing, and where Russia insists with us on taking her pound of flesh in Northern Persia to console ourselves with taking ours in the South. What we could honourably do is—though we should have to choose some other mouthpiece than Sir Edward Grey—to speak out as a people here in England, and, confessing the enormity of our former sins, declare that we will go no further in these scandalous adventures. We must repudiate Sir Edward Grey and his unholy policy of alliances with all the robber nations of Europe and declare ourselves henceforth Persia's ally to the point of war with Russia if necessary. We should run small risk in taking up the more manly attitude. The Russian army is no such formidable foe to meet, and we should at once have Turkey with us on the Persian frontier, regaining thus the long forfeited goodwill of Islam. If at the same time we were in all friendship to join Germany in ending the Italian raid on Tripoli, we might start afresh on lines less deplorable than those which our Foreign Office has been following for the last few years—lines also I venture to say, infinitely less dangerous to our own safety here in England. The policy of "throwing the children to the wolves," is a coward's policy unworthy of our honourable past. It has been pursued by Sir Edward Grey to the verge of insanity. Let us return to our old courageous virtue while we can. This is the dividing line. Let us refuse to cross it, or it will lead us and our Empire to well-merited destruction.

WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT

Persia Moritura.

Howe of the free! Protector of the weak!
Shall we and this great grey ally make sand
(V all a nation's budding green, and wreak
Our winter will on that unhappy land?
Is all our steel of soul dissolved and flown?
Have fumes of fear encased our heart of flame?
Are we with panic so deep rotted down
In self, that we can feel no longer shame
To league, and steal a nation's hope of youth?
Oh! Sirs! Is our star merely cynical?
Is God reduced? That we must darken truth,
And break our honour with this creeping fall?
Is freedom but a word—a flaring boast?
Is self-concern horizon's utter sum?
If so—to-day let England die, and ghost
Through all her godless history to come!
If, Sirs, the faith of men be force alone,
Let us ring down—the farce is nothing worth!
If life be only prayer to things of stone—
Come death! And let us, friends go mocking forth!
But if there's aught, in all Time's bloody hours,
Of justice, if the herbs of pity grow—
O native land, let not thine only flowers
Of God be desert-straw and withered now!

CORRESPONDENCE

Petty Despotism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,—Will you extend me the courtesy of your columns to bring to light the highly voracious method adopted in a certain district of the Rubulkhund Division for raising "subscriptions" for the King Edward Memorial Fund?

In three different Tahsils where my family property is situated payment has been demanded of my Karindas when they appeared with the Government Revenue. In two of these cases the Wasal-baqinawis is reported, despite the Karinda's protests, to have appropriated a certain sum out of the amount tendered as Government Revenue, leaving an equal sum to stand as arrears, while in a third case he refused to take payment of the Revenue until the so-called "subscription" was paid. The agents concerned were instructed to complain of the illegal exactions to the District Officer and, in one case I am informed that the money has been actually recovered. But in the other two Karindas were permitted by me not to insist on the withdrawal of the money, though he says he made it clear that it had originally been appropriated in spite of his refusal to "subscribe." In the third Tahsil, my agent being repeatedly unsuccessful in his efforts to pay down the Government demand, the amount of the last rabi demand was remitted by post accompanied by a detailed explanation why this course had to be adopted.

Once again one of my Karindas is being pressed for subscriptions, and as I cannot reconcile myself to this high-handed method of collections my poor representatives on the spot are between the devil and the deep sea. I know of a number of other landholders who have been subjected to similar treatment and our Karindas state that the practice is general.

Whether or no this annoyance is practised by "petty despots" to the complete ignorance of high authorities, the practice itself is a fearful nuisance to self-respecting persons and, more than that, to the poor agents.

If you will, therefore, be instrumental by ventilating this grievance in securing relief to these persons, you will have done a very useful service to the landholders of the district and earned my personal gratitude.

LANDHOLDER.

Anecdote.

A WITTY saying of Lady Duff Gordon comes from across the Atlantic. Whenever she goes to New York, the pressmen hasten to her to get the latest tips on fashion, and this time the reporter who encountered her on the Kronprinzessin heard from her that the directoire skirt is coming back.

The directoire skirt, if you recall, is somewhat slit up the side. Lady Duff explained that the real things in Society would not have the directoire cut any higher than so, although some of the lesser ones might let it go to here. At this stage other pressmen joined in. The first reporter was annoyed. "Here I am," he said, "talking to a lady and a lot of perfect strangers come butting in." "You will find," said Lady Duff Gordon, "that the directoire skirt will always have that effect upon perfect strangers."

AN Irish doctor, while enjoying a holiday in the country, took the opportunity along with a friend to go fishing. During operations the doctor's sinker came off and was lost. He was in a dilemma—no sinker, no more fishing that day. Happy thought; he had a bottle in his pocket. The bottle was filled with water, carefully corked, and sent down on its mission.

After a few minutes' interval the doctor had a bite and pulled up his line at racing speed, finding a fine pair of fish, one on each hook. "Ha, doctor, twins this time!" exclaimed his companion. "Yes," quoth the doctor, "and brought up on the bottle, too."

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Paris on the 24th:—It is announced that pourparlers on the subject of the release of the Turks seized on board the Manouba are proceeding favourably. It is officially stated that the Italian enquiry corroborates the report that there are several doctors and hospital attendants among the Manouba prisoners. Others are stated to be treasury clerks. The wording of the note preliminary to their liberation is now being discussed.

Reuter wires from Paris on the 27th:—The Franco-Italian incident has been settled to the mutual satisfaction of all parties concerned.

By the settlement reached in the case of the French vessel Manouba, seized by the Italians, the Turks who were taken prisoners will be returned to France, when the French Government will establish their identity. The questions of principle and law involved by the seizures will be submitted to The Hague.

Reuter wires from Paris on the 27th:—The Turks captured on board the Manouba, have been transferred to the French Consulate at Cagliari.

The French Charge D'Affaires in Rome has been recalled to Paris to explain the handing over of the Turks to the Italians.

Reuter wires from Paris on the 29th:—The Turkish passengers from Manouba sailed for Marseilles this morning.

Italian warships have shelled points of the Coast of Syria between Gaza and Rifa, terrorizing the Bedouins.

Reuter wires from Tunis on the 27th:—The French steamer Fravignano was seized by Italian torpedo boats off the coast of Tunis and was taken to Tripoli. The vessel was, however, released after being searched.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 29th:—Following the night skirmishes, three thousand Arabs assaulted a position on the outskirts of Tripoli at dawn on the 27th instant, but were repulsed. The Italians lost two killed and eight wounded.

Reuter wires from Hodeidah on the 29th:—The Italian Cruiser Piemonte has seized a motor launch belonging to Messrs Thorneycroft which was flying the Union Jack.

Reuter wires from Perim on the 29th:—The Italians are effectively blockading the Yemen Coast. It is reported that the British Consul at Hodeidah has requested the presence of a warship. The Italians are threatening to bombard the town.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 30th:—With a view to preventing the recurrence of the seizure of vessels, the appointment of a Franco-Italian Commission is being considered to establish a modus vivendi.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 26th:—A telegram from Massowa states that the gunboat Volturno has arrived there with the twenty-six Turkish military men captured on board the steamers Africa and Bregenz. The prisoners from the latter vessel included the Major Commanding the fort of Hodeidah, which fired on the Volturno on 2nd October last.

A Turkish band attacked a Bulgarian Monastery in the Uskub district and led nine of the inmates to the church where they were decapitated. The band afterwards desecrated the church and plundered the monastery.

The affairs at Strumnitza on the 29th January where a bomb exploded killing six and wounding eight and that at Uskub are characteristic of the present condition of Macedonia where the situation is becoming more serious.

A remarkable feature is the reconciliation between the Greek and Bulgarian Churches which have hitherto been at feud, in the face of Turkish repression.

Reuter wires from Paris:—A torpedo flotilla is leaving Bizerta for exercises off the coast of Tunis. It is hoped to check attempts to land contraband.

Saloum.

THOUGH downright lying is not often resorted to by our Foreign Office, Sir Edward Grey has gone very near to it in regard to Tripoli. He was plied during the late session with questions about his complicity with that ungodly raid, as to which nobody with the smallest knowledge of foreign affairs had any doubt, not only of his foreknowledge, but that he was a consenting and approving party. He took up, however, so determined a position of denial that even so stalwart a questioner as Mr. John Dillon had to fall back disconcerted. Now, however, it appears from the confession of a member of the French Government that both the French and the English Governments had some time before come to an understanding with Italy that in the event of the intended raid being successful France should have acknowledged to her as part of Tunisian territory the oasis of Janet and England the seacoast west of Alexandria as far as Saloum Bay for Egypt. The arrangement evidently carries with it a foregone consent to the Italian design. Saloum and Janet were to be the £5 notes demanded as blackmail by the two consenting Powers before they agreed to stand in with the adventure. As a matter of history, there has been a longstanding dispute between the Ottoman Government, as sovereign lord of the Tripolitan coast, and the Viceroys of Egypt in regard to the exact western frontier line between the two Pashaliks. But it was considered of small importance and was never closely pressed, the disputed territory being almost entirely without settled population, or other inhabitants than the camel-herding nomads who crossed and recrossed the frontier. Neither Pashalik ever raised taxes or exercised the least executive authority in the district, nor did it contain a seaport worthy of the name. The value of Saloum was never discovered until the other day, and has since been very largely exaggerated. It is not a port or a place capable of being made into a port, but only a large, open roadstead, protected from the prevailing westerly and north-westerly winds, with good holding ground for anchorage, though quite unprotected from the east. The Arab tribes in its neighbourhood are a peculiarly wild and fanatically warlike race, accustomed to maintain their independence in arms, and it was worth nobody's while to attempt to subdue them. We are inclined to think that apart from the advantage taken by Sir Edward Grey of the Sultan's difficulties in North Africa, the importance of the matter has been somewhat exaggerated. As long as the Cyrenaica remained in Ottoman hands it possessed, indeed, almost none. But should the Italian Government succeed in its permanent occupation of Tobruk, there is no doubt that it would be an advantage to Egypt that the Italian frontier line should be as far removed as possible from Alexandria, which was only a short distance from the boundary claimed by the Porte. In the hands of an enterprising European Power railway communication in a country quite devoid of natural barriers would certainly be established, and might be made to extend to within striking distance of the open Delta. Public opinion, however, in Egypt has been roused by the taking possession of Saloum by Hopknison Pasha for Lord Kitchener, and it is interpreted as a design to prevent the passage of Egyptian volunteers and the conveyance of arms to the defenders of Tripoli. It is not at all unlikely that this may be the explanation, as by the latest accounts we learn that a new military cordon has been established on the eastern frontier with such an avowed object. It was for criticism in this sense of Lord Kitchener's Government that the Nationalist organ Al Alam has just been suppressed.—Argyll.

Pierre Loti's Indictment.

M. Pierre Loti, the celebrated French writer, publishes in the Figaro a passionate protest against the war in Tripoli. He recalls a sudden attack of a panther on a buffalo which he witnessed one night in an African thicket, and says: "My mind has brought into juxtaposition this incident in the thicket and the Italo-Turkish war. The same brusquerie, the same agility of the assailant, the same inequality of arms, and the semi-heroic fury of defence. But now it is human beings! And Europe, as always when people are being massacred, looks on calmly! What a derision all those big, empty words, 'progress,' 'pacifism,' 'conferences,' and 'arbitration.'"

M. Loti is aware that the French, too, had in the past "hand in such conquests. 'Let us bow our heads!' he exclaims. 'It is not against the Italians only that he raises his protest but against all of the so-called Christian peoples of Europe. It is always we who are the biggest killers, it is we who with the words of fraternity on our lips are every year inventing some new and more infernal explosion—we who put to fire and the sword for purposes of plunder.'

the old African or Asiatic world and treat men of the brown or yellow race like cattle. Everywhere we are destroying with our mitraillasses civilisations different from ours, which we despise without understanding, simply because they are less practical, less utilitarian, and less heavily armed. And when we have finished killing we bring our unbridled exploitation, our gangs of workmen, our large factories which are destructive of the small personal industries, and agitation, ugliness, drunkenness, cupidity, and despair. . . . In the eyes of Europe the Moslems of all countries are but so much game which it is permissible to shoot, and this shooting is generally successful, thanks to the superiority of Europe's killing machines."

M. Loti continues. "A great din has been raised naturally in Italy about the Bedouin atrocities. Granted. I know the inhabitants of the desert. I certainly do not regard them as very tender persons, and I deplore with all my heart the fate of the poor little soldiers who fell into their excited hands. But how I understand the fury of their hatred, their exasperated thirst for vengeance! Ah, those strangers who without the slightest provocation, disembarked one sinister day like demons to cut down, to burn down and to kill everybody! And the Italian atrocities? Alas! there was much of that too, and less excusable certainly. In those infamous days of October did they not dare, in contravention of the law of nations and of the strict rules of the Hague Convention, to shoot down in a mass the Arabs merely because they were suspected of having taken arms? And then they killed as if in amusement, and the bodies of several hundred inoffensive cultivators were thrown about the oasis, which became a human slaughter-house. And the savage scenes which attended the execution of the kavass Marco! And the humble sailing-boats of the Arabs in the Red Sea, burnt down by the Italian warships on the pretext that they might perhaps be used for the transport of troops!"

After an eloquent appeal to the "poor, beautiful, and spruce Italy, the friend of our own nation," Loti turns once more to the tragic spectacle in the African thicket, and recalls the appearance of the hyenas after the buffalo had been left by the panther. "The behaviour of 'certain European States' in demanding at this juncture 'compensations' from Turkey reminds him of those hyenas. "Compensations for what?" he exclaims. "What has Turkey done to them at any rate? Verily I prefer the hyenas of the thicket, who at least did not use any formulas"—Egypt.

The Desert War.

TURKISH HEADQUARTER CAMP

Ain Zara, November 25.

IS CHRISTIANITY dead in Europe? Is it indifference to the transgression of every principle of our professed faith which allows the Christian Powers to look on while Christian fights Moslem, and fights foul in every way, while the Moslem fight fair? Or is it merely that Europe is ignorant of the inhuman way in which Italy is waging war on a mere garrison of Turks and a few thousand ragged Arab tribesmen?

Hitherto the truth about Tripoli has been sedulously kept by the Italian censors from reaching Europe, and I believe that since the news of that hideous massacre of women and children leaked out nothing has been known. But though that massacre—I could add a score of almost incredible details to those already made known—though that massacre is Italy's most revolting crime against civilisation, it is by no means the only one. The Italians have bombarded our hospitals here, although the white flag flies from the roofs. This is not done in ignorance. Bombs have been deliberately dropped on them from aeroplanes, and the Italian gunners, having watched the hurried transference of sick and wounded from one hospital to another, have intentionally made a target of the new shelter. They have flatly refused to allow any medical stores to reach the Turkish army. Our doctors have not enough drugs or surgical instruments, and bandages have to be improvised from strips of clothing. Our sick and wounded—among them an English officer, who has lain in bed for six weeks with dysentery—are suffering for want of proper attention. The Italians know it, and have refused the application made to them for permission to pass medical stores through to the Turks.

Italian Cruisers patrol the coast, casually bombarding any miserable village in sight. They wrecked Zouara with their shells, giving no warning of their intended bombardment; so that women, children, and invalids had to be withdrawn under fire. It is also reported that the Italians, having made no prisoners of war (for reasons which I shall state presently) have transhipped about three thousand of the non-combatant Arab population of Tripoli to Italy, to exhibit the poor wretches there as proofs of the "unlimited success of Italian arms." Meanwhile the Moslem fight fair—and win. For, let there be no mistake about it, Turkey is winning all along the line. The headquarter camp of Neahat Bey, in which I now write, was occupied less than a month ago by the Italians. Now, the Italians hardly dare to show themselves beyond the walls of Tripoli. This afternoon I rode out, with a small party of officers, beyond our advanced posts almost to the town itself. We were seen and fired at by heavy artillery from three separate points. The Italian gunners think half a dozen mounted men well worth the expenditure of a score or so of their biggest shells. All day long, the boom of Italian cannon rolls and mutters over the sand dunes. One would think that heavy artillery duels between two armies in close conflict were constantly in progress.

They would be, if the Turks had their way; but as it is, this perpetual thunder of guns means that a Turkish scout has shown up for a moment on the skyline, or that an Arab caravan has passed within sight of the forts; or that an Italian gunner thinks he has seen a horse or two on the horizon. But, though they bombard with much noise, they have hitherto done little harm, and for days they have refused to come out into the open. As a matter of fact, it is of the Arabs that the Italians are afraid. That massacre of unarmed men, of women, and of children was a bad mistake. Without it, Italy need hardly have feared any serious opposition from the Arab tribesmen, for the Arab is not a patriot, and not even the Turks themselves had much hope of help from the tribes. They knew that the Arab, though he can be fanatical enough, is not gifted with foresight. He seeks always his immediate profit and would probably have preferred selling provisions to Turks and Italians alike to taking up arms for either. But that massacre has roused the whole population of the desert. Touch his wife, his horse, or his house, and you rouse undying enmity in the Arab, and the Arabs of Tripoli have seen well's filled with the mutilated bodies of their wives and children; have seen their unarmed fathers and brothers shot down in scores; their poor houses battered into dust by Italian shells, their gardens wantonly ruined, and their trees destroyed. There are other considerations, too, which make it highly improbable that the ever be reconciled to the notion of Arabs will peace. The Turks provide them with arms, and an Arab will do almost anything for a handful of cartridges. The Arab auxiliaries receive fodder for their horses, rice for themselves, and a piastre (5d.) apiece per day.

And, more than all, there are prospects of unlimited plunder. Italian carbines, knapsacks, bayonets, boots, saddles, even wagons (of the Bersaglieri) are scattered all over Northern Tripoli. Loot is being sold every day in the markets, and even horses are going cheap. For the Arab this is primarily a war of vengeance! but it is a war of rich profits also, and the Arab, at least, will never seek for peace. How, then, is all this to end? It took the French, who, after all, are soldiers, forty years to "pacify" Algeria—au bout du canon. What chance has this Italian army of ever venturing outside the walls of Tripoli? Were it not for the guns of their fleet they could not even hold their present position; and the prospects of a successful advance do not present themselves at all.

The Turks themselves hope that Italy will be unable to continue the war, owing to the enormous expense which it entails upon her. The cost of the war to Turkey is practically nothing, but the reckless expenditure of big-gun ammunition alone costs the Italians thousands every hour.

There are a few Italian prisoners here with the Turks. They have been allowed to telegraph home, at the expense of the Ottoman Government, to say that they are safe and in no danger of being eaten (which they firmly believed would be their fate), and those of them that are wounded receive every attention that the limited resources of the Turkish hospitals afford. The Turkish doctors have other patients, too. I was in one of the medical tents this morning, and there entered a muffled little figure in the dress of an Arab girl. Hiding her face, she crouched on the floor, and the doctor, removing bandages and pads, showed me a ghastly cavity in the poor little creature's shoulder. An Italian bullet had entered—from behind—and had passed through, making a dreadful wound. I questioned her, and the child, still muffling her face in her striped robe, told me how the Christian soldiers broke into her father's house and killed her mother and sister, and how she, being near the door, had run out into the street. Some of the soldiers followed her to the door, and stood there hring at her as she ran down the street; and "At last," said she, "one of those Christians shot me, as you see, here in the shoulder, and I fell down."

A Paladin in Tripoli.

WRITING from the Turkish Headquarters at Azizia the special correspondent of the Daily Express says:—

The hospital near the old headquarter camp at Ain Zara was a long, low structure of whitewashed mud strengthened by palm beams. A tunnelled archway ran under the middle of the building—convalescent Turkish and Arab soldiers used to squat in the shade of it, watching Italian shells tear up the ground within a few hundred feet—and on the far side was a large, untidy quadrangle. Here, generally in the early morning bands of armed Arabs were wont to arrive from the fighting line down at Sok-el-Juma, their apparent object being to chant weird, mournful dirges for a short while, and then hurry back to battle. But these strange, monotonous chants had a very special significance. They were prayers to Allah for the speedy recovery of a sick man, and the Arabs who sang them had come all the way across the sand-dunes from the fighting line, to learn how much longer it would be before "our Englishman" could once more lead into battle the savage soldiers who had come to look on him as a mascot—a specially appointed destroyer of the Italians. It was a weird ceremony. It made one think of veterans of the Mutiny and tribes on the Afghan frontier who once defied a great English soldier, and, as the tales go, still pray to the spirit of "Nikalseyn" Sahib.

I wonder how many Englishmen could boast of such adventures as have already fallen to the lot of this young lieutenant of the Royal Fusiliers, who came out here from England less than three months ago, and is already the idol of the Arab irregulars. Arabs, as a race, are not particularly given to placing foreigners on pedestals, but they certainly do idolise Mr. Montagu. He can actually make his men withhold their fire, or refrain from rushing tactics until the right moment. Anybody who knows the Arab's propensity to squib his rifle of as soon as he sees the enemy, or to deliver a wild charge at precisely the wrong moment, will almost doubt this statement; but it is perfectly true. It is to his control over practically undisciplined men that Mr. Montagu owes his record—unbroken of successes against the Italians here. He was one of many English officers who set out with the idea of helping the Turks in Tripoli. And he was the only one to get here. What became of the rest no one here knows. Possibly they realised that officers who go to the trouble of really trying to learn anything of the art of war are liable to get into trouble with the authorities at home. At any rate, they did not reach the front, and Mr. Montagu did.

He seems to have been drawn at once into a very whirlpool of adventure. He spent eleven days (many of them without drinking water) in an under-keel Arab sailing boat, which brought him from Sfax to Zourara. Then he pushed on to headquarters, and after spending three days with the staff, learning the lie of the country and the disposition of the enemy down he went to Sok el Juma and set to work, with raw Arab levies, to harass the Italians.

One piece together the story of his doings up to the time that he went down with dysentery, mainly from the eulogies of Turkish officers, and the unrestrained praises of the Arabs who fought under him. From the man himself, one learns next to nothing. I suppose it is characteristic of the Englishman that, having passed through more than usually stirring happenings, he is unable, or unwilling to give anything like a vivid description of them. The retreat of an Italian battalion, for example, in which the Arabs cut to pieces about a hundred men, would make an epic in the mouth of a French officer, even of the Foreign Legion. Still, one manages to gather an outline of the way in which Montagu and his Arabs managed in the space of practically a few days to demoralise the whole Italian Army.

This sort of thing, for instance. On the day after his first engagement, wherein Italians were dislodged from a series of fortified houses and chased for six hundred yards, he went out early in the morning with Emin Effendi, a young cavalry subaltern, to prepare the stage for the day's performance. They cast about for a nice snug place for their guns, and found it among the gardens and houses occupied by the enemy's Maxims. Then they went back to lunch. They came down in the afternoon with a company of Turkish soldiers, and about 2,000 Arabs, Mr. Montagu taking command. He pushed his guns and infantry up to within 150 yards of the Italian Maxims, and found himself face to face with a nest of loop-holed and fortified houses, screened by four parallel walls, and pouring forth a perfect storm of bullets. Montagu made his Arabs take cover as they could find it ("I saw one chap squirm up behind a pile of nasty putrid corpses"), and absolutely forbade them to fire a shot until the word of command was given. Then he set to work to batter down the walls, hammering at them from guns Nos. 1 and 3 with shell, while 2 and 4 sent shrapnel over them among the houses. "After a bit, down goes the first wall, and we saw the chaps who'd been potting at us from behind it bolting like mad to get behind the next wall. So I turned Nos. 2 and 4 guns into the thick of 'em, and simply gave 'em beans till they got into cover." All four guns loaded with bursting shell soon demolished the second wall of defence, and the Italians, about a battalion strong, left their trenches and took shelter in the houses. From the windows and loopholes of the biggest of these, their Maxims sent a frantic fire. Result—two Turkish gunners wounded. Presently the heavy shell-fire from the Turkish guns blew a couple of breaches in the wall—"one of the windows shut down just like a man's eye winking at you"—and burst the door in; whereupon the enemy decamped with their Maxims by the back way, followed by a hail of shrapnel.

The enemy's retreat was the sequel for the charge of the Arabs, Montagu leading them, while his second-in-command stayed to work the guns. Many of the Italians had gained the shelter of other houses, but the Arabs, with bayonets, scimitars, two-handed swords and even daggers, caught the disorganised main body before it had gone many yards, and killed right and left. The Arab rush was only checked by the Italian Maxims, which had managed to take up a position half a mile to the rear of their original line. Mr. Montagu left patrolling pickets and outposts and returned to camp, his men following with a vast booty of Italian rifles, ammunition, kit, beds, bedding, and general stores. I believe this profitable afternoon was followed up by an unusually spirited little night attack (of which there were several every week); and it made a good prelude to the general attack under Fethi Bey, in which Mr. Montagu was prominent. He gave his Arabs—and the enemy—no rest, and was always successful; or, as he puts it "had heaps of luck."

His day's routine is interesting. Breakfast at about six, with horse ready saddled, and Arabs fidgeting like a pack waiting to be unkenelled. Mixed fighting all the morning, mainly skirmishing and reconnaissance, followed by lunch and an hour's rest. Then a more or less formal attack, generally lasting until dusk, and often enough prolonged, with an interval for a hurried dinner, into series of night skirmishes, "just to keep the other Johnnies on the hop you know." Which it seems to have done.

The following is written by Mr. H. Montagu:—

ONE may live through a lot in three months. It is difficult for me to realise that the experiences which I shall endeavour to relate in these articles have been compressed into a period which opened with the early days of October. But so it is. On the morning of Saturday, 30th September, the news reached Aldershot of the outbreak of war, on the night of the following Monday I left England for the theatre of hostilities, and on the evening of New Year's Day I reached London once again.

I have always been interested in Turkey and the Turks, and I was not the only officer at Aldershot who determined to join the Turkish forces in Tripoli. That Saturday afternoon I motored up to town and visited the Turkish Ambassador. I received my papers on the Sunday, and getting my traps together as quickly as I could I started on the Monday night for Marseilles, en route for Sfax.

One of my brother officers started a day ahead of me, and several others endeavoured to make the journey via Italy and Tripoli town, but I was the only one who was fortunate enough to get through. I was held up in Marseilles for four days waiting for a boat, and in Sfax for another ten days. Here I found a man who, for an absurdly high price, was ready to risk a run for Zwarra in his boat. Before closing with him I sought out the Governor of Sfax, and, representing myself to be a journalist, asked to be allowed to cross the frontier. But the Governor coldly advised me to go back to England, and I realised that I should have to close with my Arab and take the risks.

At a cafe in Sfax I came across Mr. Seppings Wright, the Special Correspondent of the Central News. He was in difficulties with the authorities, and was despairing of his chances of joining the Turks, so I offered him a place in my dhow, and in the dead of night, when the good people of Sfax thought us safe on the English steamer, we started off on that frightful voyage to Bukamesch which has already been pretty fully described. Storm-battered and ready for anything rather than another such trip, we eventually landed at Bukamesch, where Wright and I took camp for Zwarra.

At Zwarra we made ourselves known to Mousa Bey, the district commander, and we received the most cordial of welcomes. On the following day we were waited upon by two Deputies from Constantinople (Rami Bey was one of them), who had been sent to Tripoli to preach the Holy War. They were accompanied by a Turkish officer, Abdul Kadir Bey, with whom I became firm friends, and it was decided that we should all journey together to headquarters.

We rode, with an escort of a dozen cavalymen, as far as Adjala, but on the morning following our arrival we learned that a telegram had come in from headquarters giving orders for Wright and myself to be sent back to Zwarra. The Turkish communications were rapid and good, and news of the arrival of two Englishmen—one of them admittedly a journalist—had gone on ahead of us. However, Rami Bey removed the difficulty as far as I was concerned, and wired explanations to the front, with the result that I was told to proceed. Poor Wright was sent back to Zwarra, and that was the last I saw of him for a long time.

One of the first things that struck me during our journey to headquarters was the marked absence of all the inhabited districts which we traversed. Every man able to best arms had hurried forward to the fighting line, and man one had already laid down his life on the field. One could no help being profoundly moved at incidents which we witnessed in some of the Arab villages. Too often news of death had been borne in by messengers, and about our course there clustered women throwing dust upon their clothes, and uttering piteous lamentations.

So we made our way, steadily and without interruption from the enemy, towards the Turkish headquarters, which were then situated in an oasis not far from Ain Zara. In company with the two Turkish deputies I was introduced to the Commander-in-Chief, Nesciat Bey, and to Munir Pasha. Nesciat Bey made a great impression on me. He struck me as a man who would take fright at nothing. News of all sorts—good bad, and indifferent—he received smilingly. He is a short, sturdy, rotund man, a Friar Tuck if you like, and the relative smallness of the forces at his disposal seemingly gave him no concern. The Turkish soldiers were a magnificent body of men. They endured amazing hardship with perfect sang-froid, and their enthusiasm was a joy to all.

With the Arabs, of course, things were different. They are impatient of anything approaching regular military discipline, and such rough drilling as they underwent at the hands of their own sheikhs or of Turkish officers was confined to practice in the broad methods of advance and war lust. Tripoli had been bombarded, and they were eager for their revenge. Two days before my arrival they had driven the Italians in with heavy losses, and their exultation was running high.

At this time the Italian front was at Heni. Our own headquarters were moved, on the day after I joined, to Azizia, where I remained for two days. At this juncture Fethi Bey, who was in command of the Turkish right wing came over from Souk-el-Youhna, and I was ordered to go back with him into the firing line, which was about five miles outside the town of Tripoli. There I joined company with Captain Huni, who, to my great sorrow, was later killed in action.

At last I was actually at the front, and on the morrow I was to see my first battle. As we came to our position we became conscious of something ghastly in the atmosphere, something that told us of the harvest which Death had been reaping here already. How many of us were to be gathered in by that dread reaper before the harvest was over? That was a question which the morrow might go far towards answering.—Manchester Guardian

At Hampstead a number of Muhammadan gentlemen waited on Mr. Herbert G. Montagu at his father's residence, and presented to him an illuminated address expressing their gratitude for his services to the Moslems of Tripoli.

The Secretary of the War Office requests us to state that Mr. H. G. Montagu, the gentleman referred to in some of our contemporaries in connexion with the operations in Tripoli as a British officer, does not now hold any such position. He was appointed a Second Lieutenant on probation in the 5th (Special Reserve) Battalion Royal Fusiliers on 1st April 1911, but his appointment was subsequently cancelled.—The Times

The Finances of Turkey.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" FINANCIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

CONSTANTINOPLE, January 4.

THE Budget for 1912-13 is a voluminous and carefully prepared document, which, besides giving the Budget for 1912-13 compared with that of 1911-12 and the motives for the various increases or decreases in revenue and expenditure, contains statistical tables relating to Customs revenue, gross receipts of railways, with and without electric guarantees, the receipts of various quay companies, and the amount of Turkish gold minted year by year since 1908-09. This latter table is particularly interesting in view of the recent gold famine in Turkey, as it shows that whereas in 1908-09 on £1,065,315 was minted, in 1910-11 the amount was £5,040,000. In 1907-08, the year of the declaration of the Constitution, the total Customs receipts amounted to £3,319,224, whilst last year they reached £4,605,318, an increase of £1,286,094, equal to 27 per cent.

The object of these statistical tables, as explained by the Minister of Finance, is to give some idea, even if an incomplete one, of the economic progress of the country during the past few years.

The expenditure for 1912-13 is estimated at £33,247,038, as against £35,314,995 in the previous year, a decrease of £2,067,957. The receipts are estimated at £29,680,998, as against £27,755,683 in 1911-12, an increase of £1,925,315. The apparent deficit next year will therefore be only £3,566,040, as compared with an estimated deficit in 1911-12 of £7,559,312.

Whilst it must not be forgotten that the Budget may undergo considerable modification at the hands of the Budgetary Commission and the Chamber of Deputies, it is satisfactory to note that a serious effort has been made to cut down expenditure, and that the actual revenue returns seem to justify each year an increased estimate of receipts. The returns for the year 1909-10 exceeded the estimate of that year by £2,426,337, while the amount encashed in 1910-11 surpassed the estimate of that year by £2,245,824, and the receipts of the previous year by £4,672,172. The receipts of the current year, as far as can be judged up to the present, are showing equally good results. This is all the more satisfactory when it is remembered that no fresh taxation has been imposed, and that in certain cases taxes have even been abolished. It is a convincing proof of two things—that the financial administration has considerably improved, and that the taxpayer is better able to stand the calls which are made upon him.

On the other hand, many of the State Departments were able to carry on their work with an actual expenditure much below that which figured to their credit in the Budget. This was owing to the lack of reliable statistics previous to 1908-09, which prevented the Ministers from knowing just what the requirements of their Departments were. In 1910-11 the Ministries of Posts and Telegraphs, Foreign Affairs, and Commerce and Public Works only used 61 per cent, 49.70 per cent., and 24.68 per cent. respectively of the credits allotted to them. These two factors have enabled the Minister of Finance to reduce his apparent deficit in 1911-12, and no fresh loan operations took place. Only an advance was obtained of some £3,000,000 on the balance of £4,000,000 remaining over from the £11,000,000 loan contracted in 1910.

In the Budget of 1912-13, with the exception of the Public Debt, Civil List, and Audit Office, there is a decrease in the credits allotted to all the departments of the State. The most important decreases are in the War Department (£877,192), Posts and Telegraphs (£445,142), and Public Works (£1318,075). The credits of some of the other Ministries, such as Public Instruction and Justice, can hardly be reduced without prejudice to the country, but as it is considered imperative to diminish and eventually to eliminate the deficit, and as at present there are no fresh sources of revenue available, the temettu tax on foreigners and the increase of Customs duty by 4 per cent. still being in the negotiation stage, the only way to obtain the end in view is by a reduction of the estimates, however great a sacrifice this may entail in certain cases.

Out of a total estimated expenditure for 1912-13 of £33,247,038 the Army and Navy together account for £19,040,935, or 27 per cent., the services under the heading Public Debt absorb £11,715,489, or a further 35 per cent., in all £21,756,424, or 62 per cent. of the total, leaving only £11,490,614, or 38 per cent., for the other departments of the State, which are in reality the more productive ones. This is, of course, to be regretted as it is essential that the regeneration of the country should be brought about through the civilising agencies of public works and instruction, a better administration of justice, and greater personal security.

The expenditure of the War Departments must eventually be reduced, and it is satisfactory to note that a beginning has already been made, though whether the reduction of £877,192 in the Army estimate will be maintained if the war with Italy continues remains to be seen.

The question of the settlement of the Floating Debt, which amounts to some £19,500,000, is as yet in abeyance. The Bill for the payment of this debt is still under consideration by the Council of State, and it is hardly to be expected under present circumstances that it will be approved by Parliament at an early date, though it is a matter which will have to be arranged sooner or later.

The negotiations concerning the Tobacco Monopoly have progressed appreciably of late. The projected Bill entrusting the direct administration of this revenue to the Public Debt Department and the regulations for the cultivation, manufacture, and sale of tobacco have been drawn up by this Department and are being discussed at the Ministry of Finance. It is believed that both the Bill and the regulations will be definitely approved both by the Ministry of Finance and the Debt Administration at no distant date, and will be duly submitted to the Chamber of Deputies. Should they be passed by Parliament the lengthy negotiations on the Tobacco Monopoly question will be settled and the Régie Company will have ample time to wind up its affair before 1914, the date of the expiration of the concession, and the fisc will no doubt benefit considerably after that date.

In 1910 the total length of railways in operation in the Turkish Empire was 6,233 kilometres, whilst in 1909 it was 6,228 kilometres. In 1911, however, the construction of several fresh lines was undertaken, such as the Hama-Tripoli, Soma-Panderma, and Babu Eski-Kirk-Kilese lines. The Baghdad, Aidin, and Hedjaz railways were pushed forward, and work was started on the Hodeidah-Sana and Samsun-Sivas lines. The gross receipts of the railways amounted to £2,702,960 in 1910, as against £2,236,320 in the previous year, an increase in favour of 1910 of £466,640, or 17 per cent. This was largely due to the good harvest and to the abolition of the internal passport, which greatly facilitated travelling. It is anticipated that the returns for 1911 will equal, if not surpass, those of 1910.

The Financial Adviser to the Egyptian Government, in his notes on the Budget of 1912, says that "railway receipts are another good index of the material condition of the country." In Turkey there is also this advantage, that increased railway receipts mean a decrease in the kilometic guarantees to be paid by Government. Of the 6,532 kilometres of railway, 1,468 kilometres are purely Turkish, namely, the Hedjaz railway. French capitalists control 1,697 kilometres, German capitalists 1,519 kilometres, Austrian capitalists 955 kilometres, and English capitalists 552 kilometres, while the Mudania-Brusa line of 41 kilometres does not enter any one of these groups.

In 1911 several concessions were granted for public works, among the more important ones being the electrification of the Constantinople tramways, the telephone concession for the capital, and the further convention with the Baghdad railway company. Many other projects were discussed, and it is probable that some of them at any rate will mature in 1912.

If, therefore, a retrospective view is taken over the past two years it will be observed that in all directions there has been progress, perhaps not very marked, but always progress. The revenues are steadily yielding more, public works are gradually being executed or examined, and it is only fair to say that in a country which shows a steady and sustained improvement in these directions year by year hope should be entertained for the future. Too much must not be expected at once, but if material progress is a sign of increasing prosperity of a State, then more confidence may be placed in Turkey's financial stability than hitherto, and she should be encouraged in her attempts at economic reform. Should the same steady rate of progress be maintained in 1912, and the Budget kept within reasonable bounds, there need not be so much anxiety as far as the finances of the country are concerned.

The Turkish Outlook.

THE hopes of an early termination of the war were revived early in the week by a message from Salonika that negotiations were afoot. At one time such rumours had become so prevalent that they were regarded with scepticism as a mere matter of course, but the fact that such an announcement emanated from the town which is the headquarters of the Committee of Union and Progress was hailed as sufficient proof of its accuracy. Little time, however, was lost in an official denial of the report from both Governments, and it still remains to be seen whether the reconstruction of Said Pasha's Ministry will materially affect the situation. That the Grand Vizier is animated by a sincere desire for peace cannot be doubted, but it is equally certain that he will be confronted by determined opposition on this point. It will be recalled that Enver Bey has declared in the most categorical manner that he will not make peace even if the Ottoman Government consents to it, and that the Arabs under his orders cannot be induced to lay down their arms. That such an uncompromising attitude has actually been inspired by the Committee, in which Enver Bey is a commanding personage, is not unlikely for the real obstacles to peace are centred in that party. The war has enabled the Committee to brush aside many professions which were proving highly inconvenient. They were being threatened with the dangerous resurgence of the ultra orthodox Mussalmans, and it was only by appearing as the champions of the Faith against the infidels that they were able to silence this group of opponents. It will not be easy, therefore, for them to withdraw from this position, and it will be correspondingly difficult for Said Pasha to reconcile such conflicting elements.

The issue of struggle lies with the Hotspurs of the Committee, and much depends on the value they place on vague and nebulous operations in Tripoli. At the outset of the war it was obvious that a policy of tame submission to the occupation of Tripoli was out of the question. It would merely act as an incentive to other countries to seize any part of the Turkish Empire, and long experience of Balkan ambitions has taught the Porte how little encouragement is necessary to kindle any hopes and aspirations in that quarter. The abandonment of Tripoli would have been the first step towards the disintegration of the Ottoman Empire. But during the last few weeks the war has served a very useful purpose. It has shown that Turkey, as a military Power, cannot be attacked with impunity, and this fact should weigh with the Committee before they definitely decide on the prolongation of the struggle. Turkish military prestige has lost nothing by the Tripolitan campaign, it has rather added to its honours. For the first time in modern history we have seen a vastly inferior force encircling and hemming in an enemy equipped with every modern appliance and protected by the guns of their fleet; and although by now the invaders have pushed a little way inland, a few thousand Turkish troops, aided by Arab irregulars, have made the Italians realise the enormity of their task. The present situation, therefore, is really the strongest argument for peace, a peace honourable and satisfactory to either party. Geographical considerations have made it impossible for Turkey to place any reinforcements in the country, so that no useful purpose can be served by an indefinite prolongation of the war. Such a course can only lead to further animosity and bitterness; for though the Italians may believe that, having mastered the coast towns, they can wait in patience and security until the tribes of the interior, driven by commercial necessity, come to terms, it is not a policy which recommends itself to any who have had actual experience of Arab warfare. A conscript army is least adapted to the wearisome ordeal of a waiting game. The basis for negotiations is ready, if only the Committee will rise to the occasion and remember that patriotism can take other turns than that of clinging obstinately to the fetish of nominal suzerainty. Their reasons for resistance at the outset were admittedly based on sentimentality, not on a prospect of successful operations; and now that the kudos of the campaign has been granted them by every military expert, it is surely time that they turned to the more serious problem of home reform. The Italian assertion that the stubborn policy on which the Committee seems insistent is being fostered by certain of the Great Powers for no disinterested purpose is not without a large proportion of truth; and the Committee might do well to examine the motives of the countries where such inflammatory and anti-Italian articles are the vogue, and conduct a searching inquiry into their treatment of the Ottoman Empire during the last few years. A few memories of "shining armour" might induce them not to lend too willing an ear to the siren call, "Codlin's your friend, not Short." Protracted hostilities may jeopardise many interests of far greater importance.

It needs but the briefest scrutiny of Turkish history to know that the spring too often sees a recurrence of dissensions and disorders in the European provinces. The revolt of the Malissori last year was a case in point. And if the Tripolitan campaign is still dragging on when the snow melts from the mountains in Albania and Macedonia, the danger of a more extensive outbreak would be doubled. It is certainly a disastrous fact that the Young Turks have so far failed signally in their attempts to deal with the Albanians. A race of mountaineer borderers, who are fighters to a man, is an asset that no Empire can afford to throw away, and the Committee of Union and Progress would be doing their country a real and inestimable service if they would shelve this war and study the question of the Albanian demands. There is no saying when they may not need Albanian assistance. Towards the end of the late year we saw a deplorable recrudescence of Bulgarian activity in Macedonia, and it would be idle to overlook the faintest possibility of some sudden coup. The diplomacy dictated from Sofia is sometimes of a sinister nature, and no one could accuse King Ferdinand and his Ministers of losing any opportunity for self-aggrandisement. When Turkey moved up her troops near Adrianople during the Malissori revolt last year, Bulgaria protested to be alarmed, and, had her neighbour been already hampered by the war in Africa, there is little doubt but that her misgivings would have taken a more definite shape. And, finally, there is one last consideration which cannot be ignored. We have already seen in the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina how successful a cynical disregard of international treaties can be when supported by the sword; the remembrance of that incident must have been a powerful stimulant to Turkish resistance in the Tripolitaine. It is the more curious, therefore, that the parties chiefly responsible for the execution of that coup should be encouraging Turkey to continue the present struggle. One of the parties, moreover, has long nourished ambitions in the direction of a port in the Aegean; and it may be that some attempt to secure that position is under consideration. Now Italy, apart from her sentimental interests in Albania, has viewed with the gravest mistrust the extension of Austrian influence in the Balkans, and would regard any encroachment on Salonika as a direct challenge to her naval power. In the event of any movement which might imperil Macedonia, she could exercise a strong influence on behalf of Turkey by throwing herself into the balance, but it is self-evident that any such intervention would be impossible if she were at the moment engaged in hostilities with the country in question. In throwing out a suggestion as to the advisability of peace we are actuated by the sincerest desire for Turkey's welfare. Her humiliation is the last thing we should like to see; and happily her tenacity and vigour in the present campaign have shown that it is the last thing which we are likely to see.—Near East.

The Week.

Mr. Lloyd George.

SPEAKING in the City Liberal Club on the 3rd Mr. Lloyd George said the city was rather a chilly atmosphere for Liberalism, but he trusted by the next general election to get rid of the refrigeratory influence of the plural voter. He denied that there was a split in the Cabinet or between Mr. Asquith and himself. None of the members of the Cabinet knew of such a split. It must have happened when they were all asleep he said.

He considered that the Unionists were premature in making a fuss about a few bye-elections because they were a long way from the general election. Mr. Lloyd George pointed out that there had been twenty contested elections since the introduction of the Insurance Bill. Liberals had won fourteen of these. That did not look as if the country was going against the Government.

The Chancellor continued by saying that judging by Mr. Bonar Law's speech, the Unionists were no longer going to suffer from too much intellect. Mr. Bonar Law was an able man, but a most inaccurate dialectician on any Front Bench. His statement that our weapons were inferior to other countries was untrue, his palpable gross misstatements with regard to finance were without parallel. His allegation that the annual increase in expenditure was forty millions should be something like twenty-nine millions. Mr. Lloyd George in this connection said the Opposition had no right to cry shame as the increase in Navy expenditure was £7,750,000, in that of the Post Office £5,250,000, while £3,500,000 more had been spent on education. Indeed only one-thirtieth of the amount had gone to the creation of new officers, while the charges of political corruption were absolutely untrue. At present there were no examinations that could be applied to the functions created but there would be special examinations in future. He made enquiries and had found that most of the officials appointed were Unionists.

Mr. Lloyd George laid stress on the declarations that the Budget of 1909 had been a complete success. He believed that with the Conservative finance there would have been ten times as many Socialists in Great Britain, since one way to create extreme socialism was to decline to treat the masses sympathetically. It was true, continued Mr. Lloyd George, that all Government securities in Europe had fallen but only an amateur could attribute that circumstance to the Budget. It was a matter for grave consideration but the claptrap talked at the Albert Hall merely confused the issue. The Chancellor affirmed that the reasons for the decline in Consols were non-political and needed a judicial and impartial examination. To say that British credit had gone was not only unpatriotic but utterly untrue.

Mr. Lloyd George concluded his speech by speaking clearly and emphatically on Foreign affairs. He said there never was a time in the history of the country when it was better prepared to face any emergency (cheers). If they wanted to effect economy in finance they must arrest the growth of armaments but until international envies jealousies and fears had been removed, the growth of armaments would never be arrested. Mr. Lloyd George said this was the most advantageous moment to consider the subject. Recent events had had the effect of calling the attention of all nations to the perils of the position. He was not going to break upon any past circumstances, he was not going to defend himself for any part which he took. Why was he not going to do so? Not because he was unprepared, but because he was convinced that the more he went on justifying the more he would keep up irritation. There was one most favourable circumstance, namely, the question of Morocco, which was a constant source of irritation and exasperation between the great Powers. It had been settled, there had been an Agreement between France and Germany to the mutual advantage of those countries and which was not injurious to British interests; and after all the morrow of the dispute was not always the worst time to make up the difference. He believed it was in the interest of France, Germany, Russia and ourselves that there should be a better understanding between nations. (Loud cheers) He believed that with candour, frankness and boldness, it was attainable (cheers). The world would be better and richer, for its taxes might be reduced and all money saved from armaments could be devoted to developing the resources of the country and improving the conditions of the people. The money spent on education and housing and uplifting a lot of people was a better and more assured investment than any which could be produced. In conclusion, he said, he would like to say this one word—the corner stone of sound finance was peace on earth and goodwill towards men.

Home Rule.

THE Daily Chronicle on the 2nd published a forecast of the Irish Home Rule Bill. It said the Irish Parliament will have control of the customs and excise and that provision will be made for the continuance of free trade between Ireland and England. Ireland will receive an imperial subsidy of two millions yearly for fifteen years, after which Ireland will contribute a certain percentage of its revenues to the Imperial expenditure. The Second Chamber will have a suspensory veto on legislation and a joint sessions of the two Houses will be arranged to decide any question over which deadlock may arise. Representatives will continue to be sent to the Imperial Parliament but their number will be much smaller. The establishment of any religion will be forbidden. The Royal Connabulary will be controlled by the Imperial Government for twelve years. The Times also publishes a forecast of the Home Rule Bill, the chief feature of which is a contradiction of the Daily Chronicle's statement with regard to customs and excise. The Times says these will remain under Imperial control in spite of the report of the Financial Committee.

The speakers at the Belfast meetings affirmed that Presbyterians would not obey the laws of the Irish Parliament and would throw its demands for money into the fire. This decision was final and unchanging. Ten thousand Irish Presbyterians held five simultaneous meetings in Belfast at which resolutions were passed calling upon the Government with which apart from Home Rule, so many of them sympathised, to save the Irish Presbyterians from disaster.

Sir Edward Carson, speaking in London, hoped that Mr. Churchill's visit to Belfast would be a peaceful one since he had decided to pursue the Nationalists' aspiration in the Nationalist quarter. Mr. John Robertson, speaking in London, said that the vital problem of Home Rule was the claim to fiscal autonomy which meant separation. It would be hopeless to carry such a Bill.

Five thousand troops will assist the police in guarding the route along which Mr. Churchill will pass on his way to the meeting at Belfast on 8th February. Troops have begun to arrive at Belfast but resolutions have been passed by the Unionist Council and the Grand Orange Lodge urging that there will be no interference with the "Nationalist" meeting on 8th February. As a result of these resolutions, it is expected that Mr. Churchill will have a quiet hearing.

There are now 3,500 troops in Belfast. The Police will line and patrol the streets. The Unionists agreed to give up Ulster Hall on Wednesday on the police guaranteeing that the Liberals do not have it on Thursday. The lunch which the Liberals were giving in honour of Mr. Churchill has been abandoned. He will be entertained privately. The Master of Elibank will not accompany Mr. Churchill to Belfast owing to pressure of his Parliamentary duties.

The Mayoress of Belfast has issued an appeal to the Protestant women to help in keeping the peace in the city.

The Cabinet sat for three and a half hours yesterday. Some papers declare the Government is still drafting the Home Rule Bill.

China.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 31st:—The Empress has informed the Cabinet that peace has been decided upon and has instructed the Ministers to arrange accordingly.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 31st.—A telegram from Mukden states that in consequence of the arrest of a Japanese on suspicion of conducting revolutionary propaganda a detachment of Japanese troops entered Mukden to protect the lives and property of the Japanese. The message further states that 37 revolutionaries were executed on the 30th and 31st January.

Reuter wires from Shanghai on the 31st.—On the instructions of the Republican Government, the Hartman Iron works Company has signed a preliminary contract with Japanese financiers through the agency of the Yokohama Specie Bank for the admission of Japanese capital into the Company which will subsequently lend the Nanking Government five million taels.

Reuter wires from Shanghai.—The shareholders of the China Merchants' Navigation Company who recently received a demand from the Republicans to pay ten million taels have resolved to transfer their ships to the Republicans as security for the loan, on receipt of assurances that the company would be the object of special solicitude of the Republic when the latter was fully established.

The Hongkong and Shanghai Bank has received a telegram from the Inspector-General of Customs at Peking stating that arrangements for providing weekly remittances of the loan service are practically complete. Payments will begin shortly. The net revenue collection for December showed a smaller decrease than in November.

A telegram from Urga states that the Mongolians intend to leave to Russia the exploitation of Mongolia's mineral wealth, receiving compensation for it. Russian contractors have already arrived at Urga.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 5th:—The Revolutionaries landed from the Yalu River and defeated the Imperial troops from Mukden.

The Revolutionaries drove back Chang-Sun's Army on the 4th which was sent to re-capture Nanking. Chang-Sun's Army, however, was weakened by a thousand desertions.

Home Rule for India.

Before the East India Association on the 31st Mr. J. B. Pennington (Madras C.S. retired) read a paper on "Home Rule for India" on behalf of the veteran historian, Mr. Henry Keene. While regarding the recent reforms as marking a transitory stage which was obviously intended to prepare for Home Rule, Mr. Pennington said the British nation would be false alike to honour and expediency if it gave full power to races which had not established their claim to confidence. Sir J. D. Rees, who presided, said it was futile to think of Home Rule for India since the country could not support an adequate Navy. The extremist, Mr. Saklatwala, was cheered by many young Indians present when he rose to speak. Mr. Sessodia, editor of Rajput however was hissed by them when he said there might be defects in the British Government but they should appeal to their generosity. Home Rule being impossible while they were divided in language and sentiment. He, for example, would greatly dislike any Indian Rule but that of a Rajput.

Moslem Education in Bengal.

It is understood that the Hon. Chowdhury Mohamed Ismail Sahib, Zemindar of Choramuddi, in Barisal, has informed the Government of his intention to make a donation of his zemindari to the cause of Muhammadan education in Bengal. The gross income of the property is about Rs. 54,000, of which Rs. 12,000 is to be reserved to the donor for his lifetime, and on his death his widow is to get a pension and on her death the whole income will go to the fund. A committee under the control of the local Government consisting of some leading Muhammadan gentlemen of the province will be vested with the trust of the property. It is further stated that out of the trust fund, 28 Muhammadan students of Bengal will be sent every year for education in Europe. The Hon. Mohamed Ismail Sahib is quite a young man, much below forty, and will shortly proceed to England.

Verse.

The Hermit's Cry.

And what is Life—the life I lead to me?
Nought but a living death.

I A misery.

More preferable were death than solitude
This solitude of mine,

Where none intrude.

Through Love, for love, God gave to man a heart;

And yet how oft is love

A thing a part.

Here in the midst of men I live alone,
A mere nonentity,

Unloved, unknown.

Oh! you of all the crowds who pass me by
It is not help I crave,

But sympathy.

TETE À TETE

With the momentous and far-reaching changes which have been the subject of much discussion, jubilation, and criticism were announced through His Majesty the King-Emperor at Delhi, we were authoritatively assured that the procedure, whatever else it may have been, was wholly constitutional. More than that, it was assumed by the rulers as well as by the rayyat that although ordinary "settled facts" were no longer "settled facts," the changes announced at Delhi were something entirely different and could not be "unsettled". We are told that Lord Curzon, the author of the Partition—who, by an irony of fate, also happened to be the author of a Coronation Durbar that no doubt suggested the one which was utilized to rip up the "settled fact" so dramatically—heard the news in the Lords with a flushed face and every sign of strong and painful emotion. We do not wonder at all this; but what must Lord Curzon have thought when the leader of his own party in the House of Lords proclaimed "that the word of the King-Emperor had been spoken and that word is irrevocable"? Many in this country appear to have been led to infer, from the assurance that the procedure was constitutional, taken together with the admission that the announcement was irrevocable, that Parliament had nothing to do with the changes, and that the Executive Government alone had authority. Even Mr Shorrock thought that all the those who disapproved of the changes could do was to say "The announcement has been made on the advice of His Majesty's Ministers. We question the wisdom of that advice, and we ask for a Royal Commission to take evidence as to its soundness." But it is now evident that the Executive Government was not competent on its own authority to carry out such changes, and the Government of India Bill which embodies them is awaiting presentation in Parliament. The question is, what if Parliament rejects the Bill? Not that it has any chance of doing that, but if it does, what would be the position of His Majesty? As a constitutional monarch, he can give the royal assent to the Bill only when the two Houses of Parliament have passed it. And yet the royal assent has not only been given, but also announced to a hundred thousand people at Delhi and thereafter to the whole world. In this connection, we would like to quote the opinion of Mr. W. T. Stead. "Nobody," writes that veteran journalist, "seems to have protested against that doctrine, therefore needs must, and so I, even if alone, as Athanasius contra mundum, protest against the notion that the King-Emperor possesses any prerogative or power to utter 'irrevocable' words. Are we back in the days of the Medes and Persians forsooth, that the writing which is written in the King's name, and sealed with the King's ring, no man may reverse? Much as I rejoice at the undoing of the Partition of Bengal, I dislike the manner of the undoing of it. This magnification of the Sovereign is un-English and undemocratic, and we may hereafter have to pay for it dearly."

EVEN Dr. E. J. Dillon, who cannot be suspected of any undue preference for Moslems and Turks, or for the matter of that for any Asiatic people, wrote in the December Contemporary Review that the Italians intoned their anticipatory peans several notes too high, and that the phrase coined by an Italian officer who spoke of "the triumphal march of the descendants of the Scipios" was infelicitous. How high these notes were and how "previous" the "descendants of the Scipios" were in coining that "infelicitous" phrase can be judged far better to-day than it could have been two months ago. Since the idyllic scene of grateful Arabs uttering a Tripolitan version of the Nunc Dimittis before the Consular corps at a brilliant reception given by the Italian Governor-General, a description of which was telegraphed to all the capitals of Europe, the wires have been more sparingly used, while the Moslems have been having their innings. But Reuter still regales us occasionally with the small beer that he is left to chronicle, and when all other sources of information fail, the resourceful Baron wires on the 1st from Perim that Djebunnah was bombarded on the 27th January, and then on the 3rd from Hodeidah that Jabana was bombarded on the same date, forgetting that on a previous occasion he had wired from a third station that Al-Gabana was bombarded, the three being variations of one and the same locality. But the latest is far and away the best, as the result of 150 shells fired from the gallant Italian men-o-war was the burning of two tents and the sad demise of a goat! The Baron is indeed delightful, but did ever a war begin so heroically to sink in four months into such a farce? If anything surpasses the ridiculous actions or rather inaction of the Italians it is the support of their journalistic apologists. The Times seems at first to have commissioned the Italian Commander-in-Chief, with his otium cum dignitate, as its War Correspondent, for not a line did we get after a time from the customary creators of its news in Tripoli. But even the Italian generalissimo is strangely silent and at last "A Correspondent", with his label of irresponsibility, is utilized for the publication of as amusing a bit of war literature as ever contributed to the gaiety of nations. This refreshing writer apologised from Tripoli for his Italian protégés by saying that "it is acutely realized that the disaster of Adowa was largely due to the national eagerness of temperament and the authorities are determined that there shall be no repetition of the mistakes then made." We have no doubt that this determination is wise, but might not "the national eagerness of temperament," which caused the disaster at Adowa, have been curbed at Rome just as well as at Tripoli, and the raid never undertaken? Writing of Turkish and Arab movements, this delightful scribe tells us that the indications show that they contemplate an attack, and prophetically adds that "if such an attack does take place, the Turks will be playing directly into the hands of the Italians." That was on the 27th December, and some six weeks have passed since then. But it seems nobody has yet played directly into the hands of the Italians—unless we include the solitary goat of Jabana. But this is not all. A week later the same correspondent wrote that "it must be perfectly obvious to the Turkish authorities that their African provinces are finally lost and that the most they can expect is to put Italy to further expense and trouble by refusing to acquiesce in the inevitable." The Italian arms have been successful in Tripolitania as far as they have been tested and the situation of the Turks is hopeless. His reference to the crushing defeat at Bir Tobras is still more amusing. "They sent a force from Ain Zara to Bir Tobras, which, after stiff fighting, retired upon Ain Zara without having attained any visible objective." But the parce de resistance is certainly the following. "The Arab sees all this, sees that the Italian positions are no further advanced than they were a month ago, and that Italian troops have twice retired upon their base after making a temporary forward movement. He does not see that the Italians are being cautious and leisurely of set purpose." If we remember aright, there was once upon a time another descendant of the Scipios, called Signior Giovanni Falstaff, whom a wretched playactor and playwright, known as Guiliam Shakespeare, lampooned very vilely. The latter made a rollicking boisterous Prince say to Signior Giovanni after a thievish raid as this, "You earned your guts away as nimbly, with as quickexterity, and roared for mercy, and still ran and roared, as ever I heard bull calf . . . What trick, what device, what starting-hole, canst thou now find out to hide thee from this open and apparent shame?" Whereupon the direct descendant of the Scipios is made by this vile lampooner of the brave and the noble to say, "By the Lord, I knew ye as well as he that made ye. Why, hear me, my masters, was it for me to kill the hen-apparent? Should I turn upon the true prince? Why thou knowest I am as valiant as Hercules, but beware of instinct, the lion will not touch the true prince. Instinct is a great matter. I was a coward upon instinct." Henceforth all ye that now traduce the successors of the Scipios, be it known unto ye by these presents that whenever the Italians retire from the field of battle with 500 killed—which is only 84 in Rome, and failure to attain "any visible objective" in Tripoli—beware of instinct—which is a great matter—and remember that, in reality valiant as Hercules, the Italians are only cowards upon instinct.

But there is a grave lying to this jocund cloud and that is a matter of grim earnestness to the three hundred million Mussalmans of the world. When Italy raided Tripoli, the Ottoman Government repeatedly appealed to one Power after another for intervention and promised to take the case to the Hague Tribunal. Mussalmans all the world over offered prayers, and those who had forgotten that "more things are wrought by prayer than thou deemest of" sneered at this appeal from the indifference of the Powers towards the weak to a still greater Power above them that is not indifferent to their wails. A month later news reached Europe, and from European sources themselves, of atrocities that have no parallel in history. But Europe with its up-to-date humanity sat unmoved and the blood of women and children, the old and the infirm, remained unavenged. To day it is Pierre Loti, but yesterday it was James Douglas who accused Europe of something worse than the ethics of the jungle. This is what that courageous and conscientious Englishman wrote of it. "The blood of the Arabs defiles the whole map of Europe. It is not Italy alone that is smeared with the innocent blood. The foul red blotch is on all the Christian Powers. Not one of them is clean. England, France, Russia, Germany, Austria—they are all stricken with bloodguiltiness. The blood of the Arabs is on the lintels of every Chancellery. Downing Street reeks with it. It congeals on the Quai d'Orsay. It streams along the Wilhelmstrasse. It trickles over the Ballplatz. It drips from the Quirinal. It reddens the snows of Petersburg. Yes, Europe, Christian Europe, is a den of cowardly murderers, all in league with each other, and there is not a statesman who has the courage to call upon the conscience of his fellows." But the Lord does not always leave his slaughtered saints unavenged. The success of Turkey's arms in the Tripolitaine is the twentieth century miracle that compels credence. The Powers are neutral. Well, if they are neutral, so let it be. But that is just what the Powers do not appear to intend to remain. All Anatolia are not hisping babes and sucklings ignorant of the political tactics of Europe, and many see clearly how European intervention is being skillfully manoeuvred. Before any of her friends called for intervention, Italy herself wanted the Powers to "stop senseless bloodshed" and secure her the annexation of Tripoli and Cyrenaica which she had already proclaimed by the most peculiar of all decrees. The answer of the Turks was "As things now are we take our stand on principles recognised by every Power, civilized or barbarous, that if you would expropriate your neighbour's property you must at least seize and keep it. You cannot, without becoming a laughingstock, content yourself with touching one end of it and calling out to the owner to hand you the remainder. Italy wants us to assist her to rob us. We refuse. Meanwhile we will strive to render her scheme impossible." Dr Dillon recognised the undoubted reasonableness of this, but all that notwithstanding, set the ball of intervention rolling. He argued that according to present indications the Turks would need a new loan, probably not later than March, and "so long as the war goes on it will have to dispense with borrowed money and continue its inability to pay its own functionaries, or else accept usurious and therefore humiliating terms." This would be the opportunity of Christian Shylocks, and Dr Dillon suggested that "these terms might be made to include acceptance of Italy's offer to negotiate on the basis of annexation." He went on to remind the neutral Powers that they too are losers by the war owing to the rise in the rates of maritime insurance, the slackness of commerce in various parts of the Continent and the stagnation of some branches of industry. "This dislocation of trade and industry cannot be allowed to continue indefinitely; one of the two belligerents may be firmly pressed to make a compromise; and here the line of least resistance will probably be followed. To force majeure the Committee of Union and Progress would yield with grace." The significance of this was unmistakeable, and it has now been confirmed. The correspondent whose letters from Tripoli the Times is now publishing wrote on the 27th December that the Italians are "fully alive to the hardness of the nut which they have to crack, and they are not likely to break their teeth upon it instead of using nut-crackers." The hard nut was of course Turkey, but what could the nut-crackers be if not the neutral Powers? This was evidently hinted towards the end of the letter, for the writer said, "there are ups and downs and difficulties in all colonial wars, we have proved that ourselves up to the hilt. But Italy cannot fail to carry out her task, and it would save a great deal of trouble if the financial world, as well as the political, were to make up its mind to recognise the fact." A week later the increasing need of intervention increased the boldness of the writer, and on the 4th January he wrote that "there are rumours of pressure (on the Turks) from other Powers, and it appears as though the interests of Europe in general were united in demanding the cessation of a state of war between Italy and Turkey. There is always the nervous feeling that the end of the winter may bring serious trouble in the Balkans. In that region strife and tension are hardly annuals, but this year it is felt more strongly than usual that the pressure of circumstances may ripen another bidoun, the red blossom of actual war. There is much natural anxiety to see the conclusion of peace between Italy and Turkey before the winter is over. The Chancelleries of Europe are probably united on this point." There is one difficulty, however, which still worries this correspondent, and it is the dread of peace ordered from Rome and Constantinople before the Italian army should have re-established its prestige by annihilating the handful of Turkish forces that have made success impossible. "This point," says the writer, "is of prime importance for Italy, but it does not concern Italy alone. It concerns other Powers in that it affects the question of European prestige; and it concerns, particularly, the Powers which hold the rest of North Africa." So, nut-crackers, please! Evidently peace with dishonour is not enough for the second in this duel, but the annihilation of his principal's opponent is also demanded. That these are not unconnected, childish and ridiculous appeals for the suppression of Turkey is evident from the fact that after another week the Times correspondent in the Balkan Peninsula wrote in the same strain. After saddling the Turks with the guilt of the anarchist Bulgarian bands in Macedonia, and the crime of Montenegro in once more stirring up, with the possible aid of the Italians, the highlanders of Albania, this extremely veracious correspondent writes that in Turkey "for the moment 'Ottomanism' has been forgotten and the Jihad and the green flag are the order of the day. Brilliant journalistic romances breathing the atmosphere of the Thousand and One Nights have glorified the campaign in Tripoli and rehabilitated the moribund Caucasus in the eyes of a credulous public. But a fame based on fantasy can hardly be long lived." Yet all this wordy vengeance for the disasters to Italian arms is prefaced with the same whining for peace and the same obvious subterfuges are used. "The need for an early settlement is all the greater as Italy cannot be expected to carry on a costly war for an indefinite time within a confined area, and financial considerations alone may compel her to break the limits hitherto observed in order to deal a decisive blow at her adversary. Whenever and wherever that blow will be struck the effect on the Balkan Peninsula will be immediate. The whole country from the Aegean to the Adriatic is ripe for rebellion. In order to avert the threatened catastrophe, which may entail incalculable consequences, the Powers should exert themselves betimes to bring the present conflict to an end." But this is not all. In three successive weeks the Times had prepared the ground thoroughly for its editorial sowings, and at last on the 18th January it recommends peace—of course a humiliating peace—not to the vanquished but to the victor. It writes with its customary naivete and sanctimoniousness that the peace, whoever make it, Said Pasha, the Committee of Union and Progress or the new Chamber, must be an unpopular peace. "It would involve, as a matter of course, the cession of territory and the renunciation of sovereignty. These conditions must offend the pride and the religious feeling of the great majority of Turks. Have the Committee the courage to support such a course on the eve of an election? . . . The honour of the Turkish flag has been brilliantly saved, and it has become clearer that nothing material is to be gained by the prolongation of the war. There are indications, too, that Said is not absolutely and irrevocably committed to dependence upon the Committee, powerful though they are. He is the Ulysses who has steered his ship through many perils. If the Committee prove obdurate and impracticable he may possibly find solid elements of support in the Opposition, or he might even venture to carry out the policy which he knows to be right and patriotic without the immediate help of either, and confront the new Parliament—in the composition of which he too may have a potent voice—with an accomplished fact and ask for their approval."

So this is the way the wind blows. Just as with the aid and abetment of the Times, and against the wishes of the Parliament and the Nation, Sir Edward Grey has handed over Persia to Russia, so too must Said Pasha, the much flattered Ulysses of Turkey, hand over Tripoli to Italy in the teeth of the Committee's opposition and behind the back of the new Chamber. Well, Persia was not England's to give and her independence and integrity may have been unworthy even of a single British grenadier's bones. But Tripoli is flesh of Turkey's flesh and bone of her bone, and many a valiant Turk and desperate Arab has soaked its desert sand with his blood. And whatever may happen to Persia, God willing, Tripoli shall not go. If Tripoli goes, then Turkey must go with it, and Islam must stand before the world denuded of all worldly power. The gravest danger stares it in the face. Bullies are generally cowards and cowards bullies, and Italy has revived this truism. Let us Lieutenant Montagu, whose letters we publish elsewhere, tell the tale of Italian atrocities, for English consciences must be awakened by English disclosures. But we have already heard from Yemen how mosques too conspicuous to be mistaken have been bombarded on a Friday and that too just at the hour of Juma' prayer. Now comes the news of a proposed bombardment of Jeddah and Yambo, the ports that lead to the Sacred Cities of Mecca and Medina. How this can give Tripoli to Italy is not easily apparent. But it is presumed by these calculating bandits whose very wars, according to Macaulay, are more peaceful than the peace of other nations, that the news would create tremendous stir in the Moslem populations subject to France, England and Russia, and that, like the ransom demanded by the bandit, peace on their own terms could be purchased by them with the assistance of these neutral Powers. If that fails, an aeroplane could reach Mecca from Jeddah in an hour and Medina from Yambo in two hours. A few bombs dropped on the Holy Places are calculated to fire the mine throughout the Moslem world. It is not, therefore, without reason that the Englishman's headline describes the plan as "Designs on Mecca." Turkey has appealed to the Powers oftener than she should have done, and the Mussalmans of India have implored their own Government in a manner fully consistent with their loyalty. Would they now have to put their trust solely in Him who destroyed the People of the Elephant and made them like a chewed blade of corn? This time it is the assailants of the Ka'ba that have a sort of fair (bird) on their side and the stones that it can drop are more potent than those of the earth. But the resources of Heaven are not limited, nor is it always neutral. And it is only to the unbelieving and the cowardly that Heaven appears to be on the side of bigger battalions.

WE HAD announced some time ago that by arrangement with the Gramophone Company at Calcutta we had requested a young gentleman from Aligarh to sing Dr. Iqbal's famous Ode for the Company with a view to the manufacture of Gramophone records of the same, on the sale of each of which the Company had contracted to pay a royalty of Rs. 6 to the Moslem University. We have now to announce that up to the end of the year 1911, only 388 such records had been sold, and the Company has paid us Rs. 145-8-0 which have been duly forwarded to Mr. S. Sultan Ahmad, the Honorary Secretary of the Bengal Provincial Committee of the Moslem University Fund. Although every additional pice contributed to the fund gives us pleasure, we must say we do not find it in our heart to rejoice over this small contribution, for it is far below our expectations. We have advertised the records regularly since they were placed on the market, and it will not perhaps be amiss if we say that the actual cost to us of printing the advertisement has far exceeded the royalties paid to the University. Other papers have done the same and continue to do so, but the response of the purchasers is feeble to a degree. It is not altogether a charity, for the record, which is available at every branch of the Gramophone Company, and can in any case be obtained direct from their Calcutta Head Office, is excellent. As for the Ode itself, it is above our praise. Its popularity is such that it must have been repeated a hundred thousand times a day in India during the last few months. We should have thought that a thing of beauty, which, thanks to the gramophone, also happens to be a joy for ever, would have created a demand far beyond the capacity of supply. But it now appears painfully evident that lovers of Indian music, who crowded at the doors of the Theatre at the Allahabad Exhibition a year ago, are not equally keen in bidding for a pearl without a price.

The Recent Changes and the Mussalmans.

By HIS HIGHNESS THE AGA KHAN, G. C. S. I., G. C. I. E.

THE recent changes came so suddenly that it is not strange that the Mussalman public should have hesitated in deciding how it should receive them. That they will have considerable effect on Islam's future destiny in India is an evident truism. Yet I doubt if there be a single individual, outside the small circle of the authors of these changes, who has not passed through different emotions since he heard the royal announcement.

I, for one, however, after a careful consideration of every aspect of the question have come to the conclusion that the Mussalmans do not lose anything of consequence, while India as a whole and the Empire will gain considerably. The gain of India must be the gain of the Mussalmans of India, provided no direct Moslem interest is attacked. We must take the changes seriatim, look at their probable results, and determine how India, and then the Mussalmans of India, will be benefited, or otherwise, by each. The change of capital in itself will have the great advantage for Mussalmans of bringing the Government of India nearer to the centres of Moslem intellectual activity and to the most vital portions of the Moslem community in India. It will, in the next place, bring the Viceroy nearer to the Moslem University, an institution in the welfare of which as the Chancellor of the University he is directly interested. For India as a whole it will be a great gain that the seat of Government should be, so to speak, in a neutral and central position, and removed from any great section of people or province that may have interests of its own not identical with or always friendly to those of other equally great and important sections of people or provinces. For Calcutta, with its great commerce, and tapping as it does the richest "Hinterland" of Southern Asia, it cannot be anything more than the loss of the special attractions of Government House.

Then comes the undoing of the Partition. No doubt the Mussalmans were in a distinct majority in the province of Eastern Bengal and Assam, and this unique position is now lost. But looking at the position of Islam in India as a whole, I doubt if it will be found that it was a good thing to be in a clear majority in one province and a minority in almost every other. The disadvantages of such a situation are obvious. Islam in India is one and indivisible. It is the duty of a Moslem to look not only to the immediate interests of his own locality but to those of his co-religionists as a whole. But if we look upon it from a still wider point of view as Indians, we shall find that the old Partition had deeply wounded, and not unnaturally, the sentiments of the great Bengali-speaking millions of India. Anything that permanently alienates and offends the sentiments or interests of millions of Indians, be they Moslem or Hindu, is undoubtedly in itself an undesirable thing and should not only be avoided by the Government but also opposed by all communities of India. Viewed in this light, the undoing of the Partition which has satisfied the great Bengali-speaking people ought to be in itself a cause of congratulation for all Indians, whether Hindus or Mussalmans, and I think we should all be deeply grateful to His Excellency Lord Hardinge for this great act of statesmanship which has removed a grievance from one important section of His Majesty's Indian subjects. From the point of view of the greater good of India and the Empire, the removal of the capital and the undoing of the Partition, or, rather, the creation of two new Provinces, have been masterstrokes of statesmanship.

But there still remains the question of the real needs of the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal and Assam. These needs can all be summed up in one word,—"Education." However, since Lord Hardinge's Government has promised a University for Dacca—a University that we most sincerely hope will be a teaching and residential one—I doubt if there is left unredressed any real grievance of the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal, provided, of course, that the new Government of Bengal sees to it that the recommendations of the Education Commission of 1882 are carried out both in the spirit and the letter. For with facilities for education provided in that province, the Mussalmans can raise themselves to a position in which it will be impossible for anyone to deprive them of what is rightly their due. Some have no doubt asserted that the new University will perhaps compete with the great Moslem University at Aligarh. Nothing could be more absurd. For the great Moslem University is to be a central residential institution for the élite of the community, while the other is to help forward all those who might be left behind in the race of life by the supersession of Dacca by Calcutta. Competition between two such different institutions would be as absurd as a race between a bird and a fish. Calcutta and India as a whole will also gain educationally, for no university can be really efficient that has to cater for a population of over 100 millions and rush through more than 8,000 examinations. It must necessarily become mechanical.

So resuming the facts, we can put the gains as a neutral and central capital, the satisfaction of the sentimental grievance of the great Bengali nation, and the protection of the only real interest of the Moslems of Eastern Bengal. The loss comes to be limited to the loss of the social importance of Calcutta, but neither the loss of its trade nor of its prosperity.

Under these circumstances, I feel it my undoubted duty to advise my co-religionists to welcome the changes and be grateful to the Government that has initiated them. The need for this is all the greater since the Mussalmans will thus show their real and sincere sympathy with their Hindu brethren of Bengal and their readiness to respect Hindu and Bengali sentiment. Are not the feelings animating the promoters of the Hindu and Moslem University schemes those of fraternal and healthy rivalry? And above all, by working for the success of these great changes loyally, wholeheartedly and without any arrière pensées, Moslems will best prove their loyal devotion to their gracious and beloved Sovereign, the King-Emperor, and their loyal appreciation of the sympathetic Government of Lord Hardinge that has removed the great sentimental grievance of the Bengalis and has yet protected, by promising a University at Dacca, all the real interests of the Moslems of Eastern Bengal.

The Comrade.

The Future of Islam.

THERE are national and racial temperaments, as there are individual temperaments, which prefer the contemplation of life to living it. To such vague speculation concerning the future has a charm all its own, and while many a dainty rainbow-hued gossamer is spun by the philosophic brain of the optimist, many a dismal nightmare also leaves the pessimist with his chronic fit of "blues" more dejected than ever. Islam never encouraged that depth of contemplation which left the thinker too impotent to act. But, then, no religion has yet attained that universal sovereignty over the feelings and ideas of its believers which could make even occasional excursions into undesirable realms of thought an impossibility. The strange happenings of to-day in the world of Islam must be a great temptation to the pessimist to draw the gloomiest picture of the future of a once world conquering creed and to give way to that dismal contemplation of what may be which paralyzes the power to determine what should be and shall be. But beyond a certain lassitude in the work of collecting funds for the Moslem University, we see no signs of that paralysis in India, and speculation as to the future is not as idle as it might have been expected to be. However, the occasion for speculation has not been allowed to pass away in England, and two bitter opponents of Islam have come forward to enlighten the world about the character of Islam and, incidentally, about its future. In a previous issue we have dealt, though in a general way and far from exhaustively, with the views of Sir Harry Johnston, who seems to voice the hopes and fears of a large section of the Christians and of the British people, and now we have to notice the exposition of Pan-Islamism by Professor Margoliouth.

In noticing the Oxford Arabic Professor's dissertation on the question "Is Pan-Islamism a Power?", read before the Central Asian Society, in its issue of the 3rd instant in a leading article entitled "The Future of Islam," the Pioneer refers to Sir Harry Johnston as "by no means a friend of Islam in general." But its correspondent thinks that Professor Margoliouth's lecture "was in no sense an attack upon Islam as Syed Ameer Ali was inclined to think", and states that "Sir Mortimer Durand, presiding on the occasion, while sympathizing with the Right Honourable gentleman's spirited defence of Islam, emphatically supported Professor Margoliouth as in no sense an adverse critic but a knowledgeable interpreter of Islam."

We do not think that the personality of the interpreter matters very much when we have the interpretation itself to deal with. But when claims are put forward for the interpreter themselves by those who are disposed to agree with them, it is a clear rule of the law of evidence that such claims can be repudiated, and evidence rebutting friendly statements is admissible. As regards Sir Harry Johnston we need say little for the late Governor of British Nigeria has fully established his claim to a description far more forcible than "by no means a friend of Islam in general" by his article in the Nineteenth Century and After, in which the Prophet of Islam has been called the bandit mystic of Arabia. But many Mussalmans in India are still in the dark about the attitude of Professor Margoliouth towards Islam and its Prophet, and for their enlightenment we may mention that the learned Professor is anything but a devotee of "undenominationalism and indifference" which characterize so many eminent Christians in England and specially the saints of the country.

He is, we believe, an ordained clergyman, although he takes, so far as we know, no practical part as such in directing Christian worship. As his name indicates, he is of eastern extraction, and the knowledge of Arabic and other Semitic languages comes naturally to him. Besides other works, he is the author of a treatise on Islam which is not likely to commend itself to Moslem readers, and of a life of Muhammad published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons in their well known series of "Heroes of the Nations." The latter is perhaps the subject of attacks on the Apostle of Islam, for the Professor has studiously avoided the too apparent fanaticism and virulence which characterize most of the Christian indictments of Muhammad. But although he refers to the "confessedly Christian bias" of Sir William Muir, who wrote so skilful a life of the Prophet that Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was compelled to write a most scholarly refutation thereof and publish it under the title of "Essays on the Life of Muhammad" (خطبات محمدية) in order to save Moslem youths from influences designed to undermine their faith, Professor Margoliouth's own "Life" is far more dangerous. Under the cloak of the appreciation of "Muhammad as a great man, who solved a political problem of appalling difficulty,—the construction of a state and an empire out of the Arab tribes", and of doing justice to "his intellectual ability" and observing towards him "the respectful attitude which his greatness deserves," Professor Margoliouth has hidden, though not always successfully, a worse Christian bias than Sir William Muir's, and in the praise of the hero has sought to kill the prophet. There is an insidious undercurrent running throughout the book and the virus is skilfully mixed in every page. But the following extract, though somewhat long, which relates the events of the last days of the Prophet and his fatal illness, would give a much better idea of the Professor's attitude towards the Apostle of God than any words of our own:—

The journey from Medina to Mecca . . . appears this time to have been more than the Prophet's strength could support; and he is said to have felt signs of ill-health immediately after his return . . . It would appear that his mind became somewhat unhinged because of his illness; at dead of night, it is said, a fit took him to go out to the cemetery called Al-Baki'; and ask forgiveness for the dead who were buried there. This indeed he had done before; Ayesha once followed him like a detective when he started out at night, supposing him to be bent on some amour but his destination she found was the graveyard. There he raised his hand to heaven and interceded for the dead in a lengthy prayer, after which he congratulated them on being better off than those who remained behind. He then returned to Ayesha who complained of a headache; he also complained of one in answer and asked Ayesha whether it would not be better for her if she died first, since she would have the advantage of having her obsequies performed by the Prophet of God; to which she retorted that he would also be able on returning to instal a fresh bride. He then spent the night restlessly wandering over his harem till he collapsed in the chamber of Maimunah; whence he begged to be transferred to the chamber of the favourite Ayesha. Thither he was carried in a high fever, by some of his relations or followers . . . It appears to be certain that he fell ill on a Thursday and died on a Monday . . . The length of time occupied by the fever is uncertain; but probably it was not more than five days. There is nothing surprising in a man of over sixty succumbing to a fever. But his collapse may have been helped by his excesses, or (as many thought) by the poison of the Jews of Khaybar, or by his belief that water could not be contaminated, whence he drank unhesitatingly from a well that served as a sink; or finally by the anxieties of royalty . . . His political work was not left half finished at his death: he had founded an empire with a religious and political capital, he had made a nation of a loose agglomeration of tribes. He had given them a rallying-point in their common religion, and therein discovered a bond more permanent than a dynasty . . . Twenty-three years had transferred him from his shop in Mecca to the throne of an empire which threatened to engulf the world . . . He held that chances must not be thrown away, and while regularly profiting by other men's scruples, allowed no scruples between him and success.

This long extract would at least serve to show how far the Professor—who is more fitted for the task of compiling a Chronique scandaleuse than the life of a Prophet whose faith is the consolation of a sixth, at least, of the whole human race—has observed towards him "the respectful attitude which his greatness deserves," and what sort of justice Islam can expect from its latest "knowledgeable interpreter." What but a perverse mind could give currency to an insinuation so senseless and vicious as the one which contrasts so violently with the solemn and affecting scene in the graveyard?

In dealing with Pan-Islamism Professor Margoliouth turns to Syed Rashid, Editor of Al-Manar, for "a definition of the somewhat difficult word." We should have thought that those who had coined the "difficult word" would also be the persons best able to give it a suitable "definition." But in the topsy-turvydom of modern politics it is the editor of a rather detached literary and ethical magazine of Cairo who is the last refuge of those whose equanimity is disturbed by a bogey of their own creation. As for the "definition," itself, it is the strangest of its kind. According to Syed Rashid, Pan-Islamism "is a phantasm abstracted from the Moslem profession of religious fraternity and magnified by the European imagination, while it is embraced by Moslems owing to their supposed need of it." "The Syed adds," continued Professor Margoliouth, "that both the fears of the Europeans and the hopes of the Moslems on this subject are futile because as a matter of fact phantasms do not materialize." If anything so vague can be called a "definition," then the definition of "definition" itself would have to undergo material alteration. But as the opinion of an enlightened Mussalman about the bogey of Christian Europe, the quotation from Syed Rashid is entitled to respect and consideration. All the same, the strangeness of the so-called definition, which the Professor accepts, is not lessened by the fact that, according to him, "the personage who is credited with originating the Pan-Islamic idea is the Afghan, Muhammad Jamal-ud-din," and that Syed Rashid himself is "the one who may claim to be doing most to carry out Jamal-ud-din's ideas." If the Editor of Al-Manar "has shouted himself hoarse in proclaiming the unity of Moslems," and if "the eminent reformer," according to the Pioneer, is the chief apostle of one kind of Pan-Islamism, "a comparatively sedate and probably impracticable movement for softening differences between Muhammadan sects and creating increased religious unity among Moslems throughout the world," then we may well believe that his utterance about the futility of Moslem hopes and about phantasms never materializing is the pathetic wail of one who ardently believes in that "phantasm" himself, but whose misleading experience in a far finer field would make him dependent.

In India, too, and we believe elsewhere also in the Moslem World, there are similar, though far too few, ardent spirits that are devoted to the pursuit of Syed Rashid's formula of the spiritual unity of Islam. They look forward, possibly more hopefully, to a future when sectarian differences would be so far softened that doctrinal differences such as those of the Shahs and the Sunnis—the believers in the infallibility of a spiritual guide (Imam) and the dissenters that consider all men other than prophets fallible, but permit individual interpretation (Qiyas), while guiding their conduct according to the consensus of opinion among the faithful (Jama'at-ul-Ummat)—would not be a bar to co-operation in working out the temporal salvation of all Mussalmans. Such a desire is far from that "undenominationalism and indifference" by which alone, according to Professor Margoliouth, "the specific differences of Islam can be glossed over." The Professor has a most ingenious argument wherewith to commend to its followers the existing state of affairs in Islam and its sectarian divisions. "It is absurd to suppose," says the Reverend Professor, "that a religious bond can be strengthened by thinning the strand which makes it up. That form of Government is best suited to men's religious needs which permits the greatest exuberance of religious variety, which, so to speak, admits of the exactest accommodation of the spiritual medicine to the individual soul. . . . Co-operation between units is necessary for the existence of a nation, but religion is the concern of the individual mind." According to Sir Harry Johnston, on the other hand, "the only hope of . . . the raising of the peoples now Muhammadan to absolute equality, intellectual and social, with the leading Christian Peoples lies in the 'defecation of Islam to a pure transparency'." It would thus seem that while one physician would kill the Moslem World slowly with the disease, the other would do the same more expeditiously with the remedy.

Whatever the motives of the physicians, one of them, at least, does not seemingly possess true knowledge of the temperament and the constitution of the patient. Islam is not only a creed but also a social polity, and the bond of Islam, however ennobled by narrow schisms, still binds three hundred million people of different races, colours and countries as no other bond in the world's long history has yet done, and the sharp contrast between 'religion' and 'nation' which Professor Margoliouth draws has not the same application to Islam as to Christianity. The young Under Secretary of State for India is, we must admit, a better exponent of its extra-territorial patriotism than the Oxford savant. We can, therefore, take leave of this self-constituted spiritual adviser of the Moslem World with little regret, and commend to the Mussalmans a return to that spiritual unity of which the early days of Islam have given the world an attractive, even if also a far too fleeting glimpse. It was only a couple of months ago that Dr Muhammad Iqbal declared in the strongest possible terms, and in the compelling accents of sincerity, his belief that Islam as a spiritual force would one day dominate the world, and with its simple rationalism purge it of the dross of superstition as well as of godless materialism. And shortly afterwards, our contemporary, the Zamindar, has published his "Prayer," which must be echoed by all Moslems who have the faith that moves mountains.

Who knows that this brilliant young man, Doctor of Philosophy and Poet, may yet prove that the "phantasm" which Syed Rashid has not been able to "materialize" may not still be a reality, that the denizen of the town may not yet achieve the vastness of the desert, that all those who, like the modern Qais of Nejd who lives a recluse in Cairo, cry themselves hoarse in praying for spiritual unity may not yet discover their Leila in the inmost recesses of their hearts? When others are troubled by the strange and disturbing succession of events in the political world, this true Moslem does not forget the real spiritual needs of his co-religionists, and prays that the danger of the morrow may be realized in the unrest of the day. Who knows that the قائمر which Syed Rashid with his college of missionaries has not yet attained may not come to the eloquently persuasive poet for the mere asking?

The Aga Khan on the Recent Changes.

WE HAVE no doubt that the views of His Highness the Aga Khan on the recent changes, which we are happy to publish elsewhere, will be read with that attention and command that respect which his intellectual gifts no less than his unique position have earned for them through a brilliant public career in recent times. Those who come in contact with His Highness cannot fail to be impressed by his breadth of view and intellectual charm which remind one in a manner of Lord Roseberry. They are a good corrective of the narrowing tendencies of party politics and journalistic polemics and it will be difficult to overrate their value.

We would earnestly commend to the Mussalmans his view, that "the gain of India must be the gain of the Mussalmans, provided no direct Moslem interest is attacked." This is, of course, nothing new but in the heat of controversy a truism is only too often neglected as obsolete and old-fashioned. On the other hand, we would like other communities also to remember that the gain of the Mussalmans is not the loss of India unless some great and universal interest of the country is thereby sacrificed. Where people are apt to be misled by party prejudice or ignorance of reality is that what is claimed for the nation so often becomes, when achieved, the privilege of a few or the private perquisite of a caste. We trust the magnanimity of the Aga Khan's view that the satisfaction "of the great Bengali-speaking people ought to be in itself a cause of congratulation for all Indians, whether Hindus or Mussalmans" would be appreciated throughout the country and hasten that unity which every friend of this country must wholeheartedly desire. It may, no doubt, be said that minorities can ill afford to be too magnanimous. But it must also be remembered that it is only the poor that are really charitable, and if the Mussalmans give the first proof of a noble spirit, so much the more creditable to them. But we would insist that there should be no sham charity, no cant of magnanimity, but the genuine article itself. The Mussalmans must show, not once nor twice, but frequently, that they make no virtue of necessity, and are sincerely and without secret reservations prepared to go a long way to meet the Hindus. If they cannot find it in their heart to do so, they shall not only be sacrificing sincerity, but also depriving themselves of the dignity which a community such as theirs must greatly prize.

As regards the recent changes, we have never disguised our strong disapproval of the procedure adopted by Government. Much can undoubtedly be said on behalf of the Government, but more can be said against them. The times are gone when everything could safely be done for the people and nothing by them. With the increase of education the self-confidence of the people has also increased, and the spirit of the Arab saying: لحم رجال وهم رجال (We are men and they are men), is the spirit not only of the non-official European community, but of educated Indians as well. The progress of social and political intercourse, in spite of its snail's pace, has increased the friendliness of the people towards their rulers. But increased familiarity has robbed the latter of much of their superstitious solemnity and public men are no longer content to say with Hafiz:—

(Rulers alone understand the affairs of their dominions). Government is no longer an Isis hid by the veil, although the loss of a dreadful divinity is more than made up by the gain of humanity. We believe that the financial interests of Government could have been protected even otherwise than by the secrecy observed by the authors of the change of Capital, and the argument that a public discussion of the changes would have given rise to endless controversy betrays a disproportionate assessment of the dangers of controversy and of the value of the co-operation of the rulers and the ruled. But whatever may be said for the Government's procedure regarding the changes announced at Delhi, there is not a vestige of argument in favour of the secrecy observed as regards the "boon" announced at Dacca. It is indeed strange that when in England both Liberals and Conservatives are becoming discontented with the secrecy of the Foreign Office, we in India should be expected to reconcile ourselves to the methods of diplomacy in the settlement of the country's internal affairs. It was not an enviable frame of mind in which Macbeth resolved that,

"The slightly purpose never is o'ertook,
Unless the deed go with it, from this moment,
The firstlings of my heart shall be
The firstlings of my hand."

As regards the merits of the changes, we are disposed to agree in the main with the views of H. H. the Aga Khan about the transfer of the Capital, though we shall not minimise the immediate loss that would be suffered by the owners of house property in Calcutta who could have reasonably counted on the prescription of a century and a half. But the gain to India as a whole far exceeds the loss, and so far as the Mussalmans of India are concerned they have everything to gain and nothing to lose.

As regards the undoing of the Partition, however, are we to believe with His Highness that the old Partition was a mere sentimental grievance? The Government of India, at any rate, do not say so, and although they have failed to specify the reasons why the Hindus of Bengal—not all the Bengali-speaking people—opposed it so vehemently, we have reason to believe that Government know them as well as we do. And however natural the opposition, are we sure that it is silenced now, and that the sentiments and interests which were then permanently alienated and offended are now satisfied and placated for ever? In 1905, the old Bengal and Assam were given two Lieutenant-Governors instead of a Lieutenant-Governor and a Chief Commissioner. In 1911, they got a Governor, a Lieutenant-Governor and a Chief Commissioner. In 1905, they still had a single High Court, but after the announcement of 1911, it is certain that they will have two. In 1905, they had a single University, but in 1912 they got two, and there is every hope that in a few more years the loyal and sturdy Beharis, who now happen to be backward also, will ask, and rightly so, for a third. Our opinion of the Hindus of Bengal will certainly be wholly falsified if these "boons" will be received in the spirit of unqualified thankfulness. On the contrary, the fear is and we sincerely wish we may be proved to be a false prophet—that most of the reasons, weighty if also selfish, which masqueraded as "the sentiments of the great Bengali-speaking millions of India" may still remain alienated and offended, and that more deeply even if less openly, while the success achieved in the ripping up of one "settled fact" may encourage their leaders to work for another and a still greater triumph. Should things turn out as His Highness the Aga Khan seems to predict, Lord Hardinge and his colleagues would have earned the gratitude of the whole of India, and we hope and believe the Mussalmans would not then betray a narrowness which is foreign to their traditions. But we must wait and see, and we trust that those who have now decided upon the undoing of the Partition have a good deal of the spirit of those who do good by stealth and blush to find it fame. All the same, in spite of the advice of Polonius to Laertes, "never a borrower or a lender be," we are prepared to give the Government, a fairly long credit of gratitude, and it rests with the Hindus of Bengal rather than with Mussalmans whether our draft will be honoured by the people's bank.

We fully agree with His Highness the Aga Khan that the real needs of the Mussalmans can be summed up in one word—"Education." But it is difficult to believe that the only form which the assistance of the Government to the Mussalmans of Bengal could have taken was the proposed University at Dacca. While we are prepared to judge the gift on its merits, we are surprised that if this is the sole panacea for all the ills of Eastern Bengal, it did not occur to the Government during the six years when Eastern Bengal had a separate Local Government, and that it should have been carried out so suddenly just at the time when the costly buildings erected at Dacca needed an occupant. Is it so easy to get rid of the feeling which underlies the verse of Ghazal?

مسجد ہو مدرسہ ہو کوئی خانقاہ ہو

(When the tavern is deserted, what matters the place? It may be a mosque, a school, or the abode of the saints.) We are ready to accept that Eastern Bengal is not always fairly treated by the University of Calcutta and that Moslem educational interests would be better safeguarded by a University at Dacca and by the retention of the post of its Director of Public Instruction. But what guarantee is there that when the Government did not safeguard these interests in the Calcutta University in spite of the plenary powers which they possess under the Universities Act, they would adequately safeguard them in the Dacca University? What the Mussalmans need is more liberal State assistance for poor but deserving Mussalman students and larger grants-in-aid to such institutions as attract Mussalman boys and girls. Another University does not necessarily guarantee all this, and even a Director at Dacca is not free from influences to which the Director at Calcutta has only too often succumbed.

But beggars cannot be choosers. The gift horse must not be examined too closely and the most serviceable animal is one's own shanks' mare. The Hon. Chaudhri Mohamed Ismail Khan has set an excellent example to his co-religionists, and we hope that instead of grumbling the Mussalmans would emulate his praiseworthy policy of self-help and self-reliance. We still believe that neither the Mussalmans of Western Bengal nor those of Eastern Bengal are so poor that they cannot found and maintain a first grade residential college at Calcutta and another at Dacca, and if they do so they will be better able to give to the Government an opportunity of proving in an unmistakeable manner their desire to give adequate encouragement to Moslem education. Had the Government at this juncture followed the policy to which the Sanskrit College owes its existence and prosperity, and reformed and enlarged the Madrasahs at Calcutta and Dacca, all would have been well. Since they have not done so, the Mussalmans should themselves attempt the more difficult task which we have suggested, and urge the Government to devote half the expenditure incurred by it on higher education out of public revenues as grants-in-aid to the proposed Moslem Colleges. In the meantime, the Mussalmans are too hungry to spurn half a loaf because a full loaf is denied to them, and they must accept the Dacca University and the Dacca Director with the gratitude that is really shown only by the meek in spirit.

As regards the effect of this "boon" on the proposed Moslem University—alas! still "proposed"—if the Dacca University cannot be a rival, it can much less be a substitute. The Mussalmans must have the direction of their secondary and higher education in their own hands, and this can only be effected by a University at Aligarh controlled by the Mussalmans themselves—though subject to the general supervision of Government—and with ramifications throughout India. So far as the Government have hitherto spoken out their mind, they do not seem to relish the idea of the Moslem University affiliating even efficient residential institutions outside Aligarh though conducted on Aligarh lines. Would the creation of a University at Dacca directly controlled by Government make it any easier for the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal to affiliate a College of their own to the University at Aligarh? Again, is there no fear that local Moslem charity, which Mussalmans cannot afford to make a local or provincial monopoly, may be altogether diverted from Aligarh to Dacca? Moreover, would not the favourite argument of the opponents of the Moslem University, that across their system it would cut its own deep rut, and that it would break up or injure the territorial University, be repeated with still greater bitterness when Bengal has two Universities than when it has only one? And then, if Dacca, thanks to its untenanted Secretariat, is to have a residential and teaching University, will not the Moslem University be depreciated in value because one of its distinguishing features will cease to be part of its differentia? These are questions that must be considered carefully before the sceptics can be convinced that Aligarh has nothing to fear from Dacca. The race between the bird and the fish of His Highness the Aga Khan's simile no doubt appears absurd. But if instead of a race we think of a meal, the appetite satiated by the chingers may not be whetted even at the sight of roast towl.

Aligarh cannot certainly satisfy all the educational needs of Moslem India, specially on account of the tremendous distances. But Aligarh cannot rigidly be confined to the élite, nor should we attach too much importance to mere distance. All roads at one time led to Baghdad, as they did to Rome, and there were no mail trains annihilating distances in those days, nor was the Imperialistic ticket-collector the only bit of nuisance on the roadside. And many a doctor and divine of Islam was the poor man's son who studied borrowed manuscripts under the lamp of a mosque or the passing torches of aristocratic cavalcades. Practical difficulties are bound to make Aligarh in the main the centre of the élite of Islam, but hitherto Aligarh has done more to help the indigent Moslems even in outlying provinces than local State assistance, and it will indeed be an evil day if Aligarh, when it attains its full stature, forgets its past traditions and betrays the fair promise of its childhood. We are sure that H. H. the Aga Khan would be the last person to suggest anything of the kind, and that is why we felt it necessary to correct a possible misapprehension. So much for education.

But although education, more education, and better education is the ultimate remedy for all Moslem ills, Mussalmans have their immediate needs no less than other communities, and these cannot be ignored. While the root malady that has undermined the constitution of the patient has got to be attacked, and none but a quack would neglect it, at a time when the patient appears to be sinking, immediate remedies, restoratives, and even artificial respiration, cannot be dispensed with. It is true that a Moslem majority in one province could not avail the Moslem minority of other provinces very much. But a majority even in one province is not a valueless possession, and if it has got to be acquired even for public purposes and is readily relinquished, it is by no means necessary that a present should be made of the compensation as well.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, January 9.

THE Times in an article on Mr. Shuster admits that the situation in Persia could not have become so deplorable and dangerous, had the British and Russian Governments and officials been co-operating frankly and intimately, or realized that the state of public opinion recommended that Russians should adapt the conduct of their officials in Persia rather more closely to the British interpretation of the Anglo-Russian Agreement.

Reuter learns that the report that it is intended to ask the Persian Government to recognise British and Russian Protectorates in Persia is totally unfounded. Russia and Great Britain are exchanging views with reference to the proposal for assisting Persia in establishing a more stable Government.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 2nd.—The resignation of the Cabinet is reported to be imminent. It is believed that care will be taken to provide successors who are friendly to Anglo-Russian policy.

Colonel Hjalmarsen, the Swedish instructor of Gendarmerie has drawn up a scheme involving the recruitment of 3,500 men who will be distributed in Kars, Khamesh, Chilan, and Teheran. 1,400 of them will undertake the policing of the road between Bushire and Isfahan.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 2nd.—While some confiscated Persian shells were being handed over in the Citadel of Tabriz an explosion occurred as the result of which an officer and fifteen men were killed and seven men wounded.

Reuter learns that negotiations are proceeding for a joint Anglo-Russian advance to Persia probably of £200,000 each. The Persian Treasury is practically empty, the whole of the last loan having been expended partly in resisting the ex-Shah. The question of the latter's residence is occupying the British and Russian Governments. Russia will not agree to his being in Persia while any Russian troops remain there.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg that the Russian Consul at Astrabad has asked for reinforcements owing to the murders and robberies in Mazandaran, which is in a state of anarchy, owing to want of discipline among the troops of the ex-Shah. Accordingly, two companies of infantry with two machine guns and mountain guns are under orders for Astrabad, one company with machine guns for Bartrush, another for Meshed.

The Teheran Government is willing to grant the ex-Shah a pension of fifty thousand tomans and to restore the property of the Shua-es-Sultaneh.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 6th.—British and Russian Ministers have suggested to the Persian Government that a pension be granted to the ex-Shah and an amnesty to his partisans on condition that they leave Persia without delay.

Reports from Meshed show that the Russians have increased the consular guard in that city by a full regiment of Cossacks. The people seem to be indifferent to this proof of Russia's intentions to keep the peace in Eastern Khorasan.

Teheran, January 9.

There seems a possibility that the Government will agree to pension the ex-Shah Shuaes-Sultaneh, and Salar-ed-Dowleh on condition that they never again return to Persia; also that Russia will agree to intern the ex-Shah in strict confinement. Some 700 Russian troops are proceeding to Meshed, where the Consular Guard number 209.

Teheran, January 8.

One of the four Persian members of the Commission under M. Mornard, the Belgian Director of Customs, which has been appointed by the Government to take over the duties of Mr. Shuster, has already resigned. The three others to-day visited Mr. Shuster, by whom they were presented to Mr. Cairns as the Acting Treasurer-General. Mr. Shuster will leave here on Thursday morning.

The Regent's decree appointing M. Mornard, Provisional Treasurer-General states that hence-forward all orders and documents of the Treasury must bear M. Mornard's signature, without which they will be invalid. No reference is made in the decree to the law passed by the Mejlis which conferred on Mr. Shuster the sole right to sign cheques on behalf of the Government. The decree also appears to confer new powers on the Minister of Finance which might be considered to conflict with the provisions of that law, but the wording of the decree is obscure. From the language employed, it would appear to indicate that the Government does not intend M. Mornard's appointment to be permanent.

Reuter.

The report from St. Petersburg that M. Mornard's candidature has been abandoned is premature, as it is still being pressed by the Legations here whose influence secured his appointment as Acting Treasurer-General. Some ambiguity regarding the position, however, exists, as the Cabinet Order states that a Persian Commission is to take over the accounts, whereas the Regent's Decree says that M. Mornard is to do so. It is likewise separately stated that the Minister of Finance has temporary powers as Treasurer-General.

The Treasury Gendarmerie has been transferred to Swedish officers. Nothing has yet been settled regarding the position of the American officers, whose departure is probable.

It is reported that the Russians have appointed as Governor of Azerbaijan Shuja-ed Dowleh, otherwise known as Samad Khan, who besieged Tabriz in 1909, and lately again invested it in the ex-Shah's interest.

Teheran, January 11.

Mr. Shuster left to-day. The Persian Commission has resigned. Apparently it has now no raison d'être, as originally it was designed to act as a go between in the transfer of the books from Mr. Shuster to M. Mornard.

Since the notification of Mr. Shuster's dismissal on December 24th not a penny has been paid of the general revenue, exclusive of the Customs. Clerical disturbances are reported from Isfahan.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, January 12.

M. Mornard to-day took possession of Mr. Shuster's office and books. He declined Mr. Cairns's request for a quitance and receipts similar to those given to Mr. Shuster by Mr. Cairns on the grounds that the Government had ordered him simply to take possession, and had not authorized him to recognize Mr. Cairns as Acting Treasurer-General. He also read a letter from the Cabinet stating that any delay on the part of the Americans in handing over the books would involve their immediate dismissal and "punishment." The letter appears to have incensed the Americans, who have for some time past been anxious to be relieved of their responsibilities, but have not hitherto received any intimation as to who would relieve them.

Washington, January 12.

Mr. Sulzer, chairman of the House Committee of Foreign Relations, has received a cable from Mr. Cairns, one of the fourteen American accountants left in Teheran by M. Shuster, complaining that they are all equally affected with Mr. Shuster by the Russian ultimatum, and that they desire to be released from their contracts with full pay for the unexpired portion of their engagement. Mr. Sulzer declares that he will take up the matter with Mr. Knox, Secretary of State.

—Reuter.

(FROM THE "NEW YORK HERALD" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, January 14.

Mr. Cairns to-day wrote to the Cabinet a letter wherein he says "I regret exceedingly that your excellencies have deemed it necessary to take such arbitrary measures in the dispossession of representative Shuster. This regret is unengendered by any feeling of personal resentment, but because of the evident lack of confidence in American officials of this Government. I wish to inform you in the name of all American officials that I have been furnished with a certified translation of your letter of yesterday to M. Mornard, wherein you deemed it necessary and advisable to threaten us with dismissal and punishment. The cause for such action is absolutely incomprehensible unless you have been misinformed as to our attitude towards this Government, or that you seek to compel us to a breach of contract. Your attention is invited to the fact that such threat, especially the use of the word 'punishment,' can have but one interpretation in this country. I beg to state your threat and our interpretation of it have been communicated to our Government in Washington, and also to the English and Russian legations. Notwithstanding this you are hereby officially advised that the Americans will continue their posts for the present."

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, January 14.

In his communication to the British and Russian Legations, Mr. Cairns addresses them as representing the present de facto sovereignty in Persia.

The Americans, with the possible exception of the Gendarmerie officers, whose relations with the Swedes are very cordial, are desirous to go, and contend that Article 2 of the ultimatum constitutes a violation of their contract, as they only contracted to serve Persia, whereas they are now dependent on Great Britain and Russia, and are, therefore, entitled to receive the balance of their three years' pay, since this was the period of their contract.

The British and Russian Legations are ready to support this claim and have informed the Americans accordingly.

Teheran, January 14.

The Cabinet appears already to have repented of its inconsiderate language, for Mr. Cairns today received an official communication politely urging him and the other American functionaries, in the interests of the financial administration, not to refuse to lend M. Mornard their assistance, and for the present the tension between the Americans and the new acting Treasurer-General appears to be somewhat relaxed.—Reuter.

Teheran, January 18.

The Government is now engaged in a lively controversy with Mr. Cairns, who was left in charge of the Treasury by Mr. Shuster. He has been reprimanded for his letter to the Cabinet protesting against the manner in which Mr. Shuster's office was taken over. The Government alleges that its letter to M. Mornard, of which M. Mornard retains the original, referred to the discharge and punishment of Persian officials only, and has sent Mr. Cairns what profess to be a copy and a translation of the original. Unfortunately, the supposed copy varies in many respects and is signed only by an Under-Secretary, whereas the letter shown by M. Mornard and translated before him and Mr. Cairns was signed by four Ministers. The intention of the Foreign Minister in drafting the second letter appears to have been excellent, but [the execution leaves something to be desired.

AS BETWEEN FRIENDS.

British Lion (to Russian Bear): "If we hadn't such a thorough understanding I might almost be tempted to ask what you are doing there with our little Playfellow."

Teheran, January 15

Mr. Bruce, an American Gendarmette officer, was fired on today while proceeding from the barracks to his residence. The miscreant was concealed in a house and is unknown.

St. Petersburg, January 14.

Duly authenticated photographs have been received here from Tabriz showing the abominable mutilation of Russian soldiers by the Fedais. Of the 40 soldiers who lost their lives at Tabriz only 17 bodies have been discovered. Many had been buried alive, after undergoing horrible tortures.

When it is remembered that these soldiers, as testified by the British Consul, behaved with the greatest humanity in succouring the Persian women and children, the effect upon Russian minds may be easily imagined.

Copies of the photographs have been sent to Count Benckendorff, and will, presumably, be submitted to English eyes. Russians are at a loss to understand the partiality displayed by a section of public opinion in England towards the authors or instigators of such atrocities.

The Situation in Southern Persia.

The "Times,"

13th January.

The departure of Mr. Shuster, who left Teheran on Thursday cannot fail to ease the situation in the capital. M. Mornard will, at any rate temporarily, take over the duties of Treasurer-General. We cannot profess to regard his appointment, should it be made permanent, with any satisfaction. We expressed our opinion some time ago that Mr. Shuster's successor should be acceptable to both Russia and England, but not unacceptable to Persia; and that he should not have been already in the Persian service or have taken sides in recent controversies. M. Mornard, as an official who has already been for some time in Persian employ, and has been inevitably mixed up in some of the conflicts which have led to the present unfortunate situation, cannot, we fear, be said to fulfil those conditions. Yet practically the same conditions were formulated in the Namoe Vremya and we may therefore presume that Russian Ministers would not see anything unreasonable in them. We hope, therefore, that, before Mr. Shuster's post is definitely filled up, the Russian and British Governments will look for a more suitable nominee, and we feel persuaded that if they look for him they will find him. For a satisfactory issue to the present crisis so much depends upon the personality of the new Treasurer-General that we feel bound to lay special stress on this point.

THE HELPERS' LEAGUE.

British Lion (to Russian Bear): "I join you, though under Protest. After all, we undertook to act together."

Persian Cat (diminuendo): "If I may quote from the Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907, this understanding can only serve to further and promote Persian interests, for henceforth Persia, aided and assisted by these two powerful neighbouring States, can employ all her strength in internal reforms."

[Prepares to expire.

Of more immediate concern to this country is the situation in the South, which the recent attack upon Mr. Smart and his escort of Indian sowars has so unpleasantly illuminated. Ever since the new regime in Teheran the Southern tribes have relapsed into absolute lawlessness, which the Central Government has been more powerless than ever to restrain; and there are apparently very definite indications that when the winter snows have ceased to impede their movements their activities may be directed against the small British force, of which their presence at Shiraz has not only hitherto protected British lives and property in that city, but has substantially tended to check the turbulent forces of disorder. For instance, one of the strangest counts in Mr. Shuster's indictment of British and Russian policy was that the British Consulate at Shiraz had given sanctuary to one of the Kavam brothers who had, in fact, thus alone been saved from sharing the fate of his brother, foully murdered by Kashgai tribesmen with the connivance, there is good reason to believe, of the Persian Governor-General, from whom they had received a safe conduct to the coast at our instance. That GOVERNOR-GENERAL has since then fallen out with his Kashgai allies and been recalled, but the temper of the tribes has not improved, and anarchy is spreading throughout the Southern Provinces. The articles we published some months ago from our Special Correspondent in the Persian Gulf showed how little the South cared about what was going on in the North, and how slender was the hold of Persian nationalism upon tribesmen who possess, at any rate, qualities of virility which the Persian townsmen too often lack. But if we are inclined to doubt whether the movements of Russian troops in the North have per se had much influence upon the trend of events in Southern Persia, we are quite ready to believe that the appeal which has lately been made to fanatical religious sentiment by the Teheran demagogues, who did not themselves hesitate to hang mujtahids and other holymen in the first flush of Nationalist victories, may have found in the South a response which was denied to mere Constitutional platitudes. The proclamation of a Holy War would not only afford as good an excuse for loot as any other, but it would undoubtedly mobilize forces of which it would be unwise to underrate the depth and strength, especially at a moment when Mahomedan feeling is not unnaturally moved by the many unfortunate complications which have arisen in other parts of the Islamic world.

From this point of view we should strongly deprecate any hasty action being taken at this juncture by the British Government. We have repeatedly stated our own confidence in the sincerity of the Russian Government's declaration that it has no wish to occupy permanently any part of Northern Persia, and in the withdrawal of a portion of its forces from Kazvin and the postponement of any further advance towards Teheran it has given an undeniable earnest of its sincerity. But a British advance into Southern Persia would give a very dangerous handle to the more adventurous elements in Russia; and we hold strongly that in present circumstances a military occupation of Southern Persia outside possibly one or two points of the Gulf littoral, should be avoided, save in the last resort. It must not be forgotten that, when the Anglo-Russian Agreement was being negotiated and the British zone of influence defined, its relatively exiguous proportions, for which the authors of the Agreement have been frequently criticized, were determined mainly by the advice of our own military experts, chief amongst them Lord Kitchen, then Commander-in-Chief in India, who held, very rightly, that it would be unwise to extend our responsibilities into the interior of Persia beyond an area which we could, if necessary, defend by force of arms. Moreover, the state of Indian finances, threatened by a serious loss of revenue imposed upon India by British sentiment, and Indian feeling would alike render anything in the shape of a large and costly expedition into Southern Persia singularly inopportune and impolitic. But the paramount consideration which weighs with us is that, by holding our hand, even at the cost of a temporary sacrifice of obvious material interests, we should give the Mahomedan world a very striking and definite proof that we are determined not to take advantage of political complications in a Mahomedan country for any purposes of self-aggrandisement, and that, in the discharge of our international obligations, wherever they may appear to conflict with Mahomedan interests, our influence will always be exerted to mitigate any injury that may appear to be inflicted upon them. These are the chief objects towards which British policy, based on a broad conception of the interest of the Empire as a whole, should now be directed in Persia. Such a policy would, moreover, bring home, as no mere threats could to the Persian Government the necessity of placing the restoration of order in Southern Persia in the forefront of its programme. In the Swedish officers who have entered the Persian service it has at its command an excellent body of men capable of organizing an efficient Gendarmerie; and if in the loan which will be a necessary part of the settlement, soon, we hope, to be reached in Teheran, due provision is made for the financial requirements of such a service we do not altogether despair of Persia being able to turn to useful account the mercenaries for which we plead for the discharge of her responsibilities in the South.

"Manchester Guardian."

We are accustomed to look to a Conservative newspaper when we wish to learn what policy the Foreign Office has in mind, and we therefore note with apprehension that the Times twice last week hinted at the possible occupation of the chief harbours on the Persian Gulf, or at least some of them; on Tuesday it suggested that the "immediate occupation of the harbours" might be necessary and on Saturday it declared that a military occupation of Southern Persia should at present be avoided "outside possibly one or two points of the Gulf littoral." We hope very strongly that we are wrong in assuming that the Foreign Office has any such step in mind. The reason that the Times offers is, that the disorder in Southern Persia has recently increased, and it admits that this is probably due to the action of Russia in the north, for which, of course, Great Britain is held jointly responsible throughout Persia. But if we assume that the disorder has increased, and for this reason, the remedy suggested is utterly wrong. The remedy is the re-organisation of Persian finances, the appointment of a competent Treasurer-General who will be a tool of neither Russia nor England, permission to Persia to obtain a loan on terms which she can reasonably accept, and the formation of a strong police. What Russia has done in the north and it is suggested we should do in the south is to make it impossible for Persia to keep order and then to make disorder a pretext for seizing territory. The real remedy therefore is, as it has always been, to act up to our professions, to respect Persian independence and integrity, and to insist that Russia, if we are any longer to act with her, shall do the same. Surely it is obvious that we must do our best still to get the Russian force of occupation out of Northern Persia. And is it not equally obvious that to seize the Gulf Ports would be, in effect, to establish the Russians even more firmly in the north, and almost certainly to lead to an extension of their grip? Finally, what is the use of pretending that if a further expedition is sent to Southern Persia its object will be to occupy "possibly one or two points of the Gulf littoral"? Its arrival will accentuate the unrest and arouse the tribes to still greater bitterness against this country, and the greater unrest will be made the pretext for the extended occupation which the advocates of a limited expedition now profess to deprecate. If the Foreign Office wishes to set things right in Southern Persia, let it begin by doing its duty at Teheran.

British Liberals and Russia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

Sir,—Can you solve a mystery for me, which the more I think of it the more it puzzles me? When we had no Duma in Russia the English Liberal papers were the best friends and advocates of an Entente with Russia.

In good old days, when Mr Gladstone made his great fight for the Slavs, the advocacy of a cordial friendship with Russia was for many years the distinctive note of the English Liberals, and their leading organs did splendid service to the cause of Anglo-Russian understanding.

Now that we have—wisely or otherwise—established a kind of Parliament called "the Duma"—which was, I always understood an object greatly cherished by English Liberals—what do we see to-day?

We have set up the Duma, and lo! we seem to have lost the friends whose enthusiasm, in the pro-Duma days, knew no bounds.

If an Anglo-Russian Entente were such a good thing when we had no Duma, why has it become a bad thing to-day, since we have a Duma? Is it a case of post hoc, propter hoc? If so, it gives me an altogether new and unexpected reason for disliking that new-fangled institution.

When I read—as I sometimes do as a penance for my sins—some of the many angry articles published in the old pro-Russia Liberal papers against Russia to-day I am still more mystified.

In concert with England we are attempting the very difficult task of saving Persia from dissolving into a chaos of anarchy and brigandage; we are at once accused of trying to bring about the very evil which we dread.

On Monday next, in the magnificent Jew's Harp that has recently been erected in Kingsway, as the house of music and harmony, a meeting is summoned to foment discord and to excite hatred against Russia. It is very deplorable, but there is no need for me to add a word to the unanswerable statement of Sir Edward Grey in defence of the common policy of our two Governments.

But a new grievance has arisen, and Russia, of course, is again the culprit. The Manchu Empire is breaking up. The Southern Chinese, with the ardent patronage of the English Liberals and the American people, have declared themselves a Republic. In the North, at Peking, the Manchus are defending the Empire and the dynasty. Close to the Russian frontier live some three million Mongols, who have been, more or less oppressed for generations by Manchu officials. Seeing that the Southern Chinese have thrown off the Manchu yoke, the Northern Mongolians have driven out the Manchu officials and have declared that they wish in future to govern themselves under their native Princes.

It is most important to Russia that these near neighbours of ours should live in peace and that Mongolia should not be the scene of a bloody war. So, at their urgent request, we have recognized the autonomy of the Mongolian Princes, to the great satisfaction of the Mongolian people, and intimated to the Manchus of Peking that the Mongolians are not to be attacked.

What can be more admirable and more in accordance with the traditional policy of Russia, which has secured the liberation of all the Balkan Slavs? But to the jaundiced eyes of our apostate friends Russia's conduct in Mongolia is worse than Italy's attack on Tripoli. Really, some statements are so funny they make one laugh! Italy, in defiance of European treaties, attacks an independent Power without notice, sends an army to seize two provinces belonging to the Ottoman Empire, and wage a ruthless war of extermination against the native inhabitants.

provide for our Empire a flat, open frontier continuous with Russian territory. Such a frontier would lead immediately to an immense increase in our Indian armaments, and ultimately, in all human probability, to a war with Russia—a war which would be fought, not to establish the independence of Persia long dead, nor on behalf of any valuable British interest, but to enable us to police the deserts contiguous to the Persian Gulf."

Sir Thomas Barclay disclaimed the notion that the meeting was anti-Russian. "There is a great difference," he remarked, "between an anti-Russian meeting and a pro-Persian meeting." (Hear, hear.) Only in so far as the independence or territorial integrity of Persia was threatened, he said, could the meeting be considered in any way anti-Russian. "If," he added, "it is anti-Russian to insist on Russia's respecting her treaty engagements towards Great Britain, then we must frankly admit we are as anti-Russian as we can be." (Hear, hear.)

"The object of this meeting," he concluded, "is to strengthen the hand of our Government in the efforts it is bound to make in carrying out the agreement of 1907."

"I have known the Persian for 25 years or more," said Professor E. G. Browne, who rose to propose a resolution. "I know their language and literature, and I love them, after my own nation, better than any other nation in the world. They have been most cruelly treated in this matter. (Applause.) I have seen the growth of a new spirit of true patriotism, a desire to work for the welfare of the country among the Persian people—young Persians studying in England that they might return and serve their country. And what do we find now? That fair promise blasted apparently."

Professor Browne went on to criticise official explanations of our attitude. "When," he cried, "black can be explained as white, bondage as liberty, then the time has come to ask ourselves if our diplomats are worth the money they cost us." (Cheers.)

Professor Browne concluded by proposing the following resolution:—

"That this meeting expresses its deep concern at the continued disregard of the undertaking jointly given by the Governments of Great Britain and Russia in 1907 to preserve Persian integrity and independence, and urges His Majesty's Government to pursue a policy so directed as to give full effect to our pledges to Persia, and thus to safeguard our national honour and vital interests."

Mr. H. D. Lynch, in seconding the resolution, set out clearly the commercial aspect of the situation (our interests in which, as he pointed out, were far transcended by our political interest). Our exports to Persia represented three millions sterling, mainly the products of Lancashire. If Persia became absorbed by Russia, he argued, the Russian frontier would march with the British frontier for hundreds and hundreds of miles. We should be bound to put men behind that frontier and to impose immense additional burdens of militarism and taxation upon India and this country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., Chairman of the Labour Party, said they could not refrain from remembering that the Persian question had now become an English question as well.

"When I think of Great Britain in connection with Persia to-day," Mr. MacDonald went on, "I think of a country that had a great reputation as a lover of liberty and of righteousness. I think of a country the most inspiring chapters of whose history were written by men who religiously kept the lamp of liberty burning in front of them, so as to guide every step they took in the world. Therefore, I offer no apology, because in my heart I have none to give, for coming here to-night, taking the attitude of an English citizen, and expressing my detestation and opposition to the foreign policy that is pursued in my name and your name. (Cheers.) These inheritances that nations get from the past can only be built up by many generations walking in wisdom. But they can be destroyed, they can be violated, they can be desecrated by one Foreign Minister pursuing the path of folly." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. MacDonald went on to deal with the attitude with Russia, and said that they must be very careful to divine why it exists.

"It is not a political instrument," he proceeded. "Do you think that that partition of Persia would have been accepted as a political partition? It was a very bad commercial partition. Nevertheless, it was a commercial partition. It had no political significance at all—we were told that over and over again in the House of Commons—for, at any rate, tradition compels us to believe what we hear." (Laughter.)

"At this moment," Mr. MacDonald went on, "there are actually 11,000 Russian troops over the Persian border, counting the escorts of the Consulates. What are they doing there? For peace? (Laughter.) They demonstrated their peaceful methods when they hung an eminent ecclesiastic the other day. Supposing the Archbishop of York, or a high ecclesiastic respected by every Englishman, a very learned and reverend man—supposing somebody came along and hung him, say, on Good Friday or Easter Sunday. That atrocious crime, I am told by a gentleman who knows the situation, would be the parallel in English life of what the Russians did the other day in Persia. (Shame.)"

"These 11,000 troops want a few riots. They want a little disorder, and they are taking the very steps that will secure what they want. And when that disorder takes place, then the 11,000 men are going to be reinforced, and the political partition of Persia becomes an accomplished fact. And then our wise Ministers and our wise citizens will say 'What an iniquitous thing!' And those of us who are a little wiser than they were will say, 'What big fools other sections of the world are!' For it is our folly, our blindness, our shortsightedness that is the cause of the trouble in Persia to-day. (Hear, hear.)"

"Of all the fruits of Sir Edward Grey's administration," Mr. MacDonald concluded, "the one that is most precious to us is the treaty of arbitration with America. (Hear, hear.) But even that laurel is going to have a very doubtful resting time on Sir Edward Grey's brow, because America is beginning to say, 'Ah, you profess to desire justice in your international relations. Are you only going to make that profession when the nation with which you are dealing is a strong and powerful nation like ourselves? Are you going to enter into agreements with only strong nations, in order that they may be free to crush out the weak nationalities?' (Hear, hear.) I am not so sure about the fate of the arbitration treaty now. I hope it is going through. I shall work night and day for its going through. But the Minister who is responsible for the Persian policy has been the greatest enemy that the Arbitration Treaty with America has had. (Cheers.)"

"Because our Persian policy to-day, because the conduct of our Foreign Minister in Persia threatens that good name of ours at every opportunity, on every occasion, inside and outside the House of Commons, we shall challenge his right to pursue that policy, in the name of the people who, we are convinced, are opposed to it." (Cheers.)

"If a Conservative Government were in power and pursuing this policy," said Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, M.P., "the theatres of the United Kingdom would be filled to overflowing with protest meetings." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Philip Morrell, M.P., protested against the forthcoming visit of British M.P.'s to Russia, and described it not as a Parliamentary visit, but as a mysterious and bogus kind of visit which had for its object the condoning of Russian policy and the arranging of a loan.

Mr. Silvester Horne, M.P., said that the events of the last few months had made our people begin to think of foreign politics, and they had come to three conclusions. That they were allowed to know very little, far too little, about the foreign policy, that England was being put in an impossible and untenable position, and that as a consequence of this we had been dragged to the very verge of war with our closest kinsfolk and our best customers. He ventured to say as a loyal Liberal—loyal within its limits—(laughter)—that Sir E. Grey and the Government underrated altogether the tremendous force of public opinion, and that there was ripening in this country an opinion that will undoubtedly destroy the Government's power and authority unless they altered their policy. (Applause.)

The resolution was carried with great acclamation.

Dr. Clifford, in proposing a vote of thanks to the chairman, said what we wanted most was that the democracy should be represented in our foreign policy. (Hear, hear.) That day had just been inaugurated by the vote given by the Socialists in Germany. (Applause.)

Anecdote.

Mr. Lloyd George was speaking at a Liberal Meeting not a hundred miles from Redhill, Surrey, of the unfulfilled prophecies and promises of a certain statesman, and quite accidentally he stretched his arm right over the head of Sir Jeremiah Colman, one of the local pillars of Liberalism, who was sitting close to him on the platform. "We have had enough of those Political Jeremiahs," he cried out. The audience rose to the joke and laughed and clapped vociferously. And, perhaps for the first time in his life, the little Welshman stood completely non-plussed, for it was not until the meeting was over that he found out where the humour had come in.

Mr. Lloyd George once concluded his speech with these words: "The Almighty does with you just as a good gardener does with his flowers. He plants geraniums and chrysanthemums in the sunshine because he knows they will grow better there, but he looks out for a shady nook for the fuchsias." On leaving the chapel the statesman was effusively greeted by an old lady. "Oh, Mr. George," she cried, "I want to thank you for your address. It was so practical and so wise." "I am delighted to hear it," Mr. Lloyd George replied, "and I hope it will prove a help to you." "Yes, indeed," said the old lady, "it has helped me already, for never before have I been able to tell what was the matter with those datted fuchsias!"

Mr. Hogarth of the British Museum, lecturing before the Central Asian Society on Arabia said that Turkey's loss of the western province would go near to involving a crash of the whole Empire. The immediate result would be anarchy all down the Red Sea shore. Great Britain, he said, would be compelled to take possession of the province or allow Germany to do so. Mr. Hogarth urged that Great Britain should render any aid, direct or indirect, that it could towards the maintenance of Ottoman Power in its present provincial possessions in Western Arabia. Sir Henry Durand, presiding, said it was devoutly to be hoped that Turkey would retain its hold. "The alternative was the enlargement of British responsibilities which could not be safely extended from that point of view." He regarded with misgiving the danger of our recent action in southern Persia.

Constantinople, January 7.

A Protocol was recently finally signed at Teheran by the Ottoman Ambassador and the Persian Foreign Minister agreeing to submit the long-pending question of frontier delimitation to a Turco-Persian Commission to meet in Constantinople, and in the event of disagreement on any point, to have recourse to arbitration by The Hague Tribunal with the proviso that such arbitration is to be completed within six months.—(Reuter.)

Rome, January 8.

An Arab village in the oasis of Gargaresh was rushed on Friday night by a party of Arab raiders, who not only pillaged the houses, but massacred a great many of the inhabitants, including women and children. To judge from the official report, this incident has been greatly exaggerated in to-night's newspapers. Steps are being taken to give more protection to friendly Arabs, but the oasis of Gargaresh has a bad reputation for similar raids.

The rumours of peace negotiations published in some foreign newspapers seem to have no foundation whatever. No initiative in this direction has been taken in Italy, and nothing is officially known of any such initiative elsewhere.

Rome, January 3.

If the published list of the new Turkish Ministry raises no hopes in Italy, at least it disappoints no expectations. Said Pasha had so manifestly become the prisoner of the Salonika Committee that no surprise is felt at his choice of colleagues among the most uncompromising representatives of the Young Turk Party. On the whole, as the Popolo Romano remarks this morning, such an issue from the crisis is perhaps to be welcomed, as the Committee may now be regarded as playing their last card. Their final credit in the eyes of Europe is now at stake, and they cannot escape the verdict which will be passed upon their policy according to the failure or success of this incantation. It is now a question of either the dissolution of the Young Turk Party or the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire. While protesting that the fate of the new Government matters little to Italy, the Popolo Romano sees some significance in the appointment as Sheikhul-Islam of Nesrib, the Grand Cadi of Egypt, whose influence over his Egyptian co-religionists is beyond dispute. Thanks to the loyalty of British neutrality the Mussalman population of Egypt has abstained from taking any part in the war in Tripoli. It remains to be seen whether the new Sheikhul-Islam may not attempt to interest the sympathies of his coreligionists in some practical fashion, and the Roman journal warns the Italian Government to be on its guard against surprise.

Vienna, January 5.

There is much comment here on the news that attempts are being made to bring about peace between Italy and Turkey. The Press expresses itself somewhat sceptically, and semi-official announcements show a determination to prevent Austro-Hungarian diplomacy from being connected with any possible negotiations. It is declared that the report that the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador in Berlin, Count Sögyeny, has had conversations with the German Chancellor in connexion with mediation is false, as well as the news from Constantinople that the Ambassador there, Marquess Pallavicini, has opened negotiations. A communiqué to the highly official Politische Correspondenz states that the idea that Italy has expressed any wish for the conclusion of peace is erroneous. Public opinion in Italy is actually averse to the idea. The Communiqué finally declares that the demand of the Italian Cabinet, according to which Turkey must acknowledge the annexation of Tripoli and Cyrenaisia, must remain beyond any possibility of discussion. The Neues Wiener Tagblatt, which is in touch with the Italian Government, has received the following intimation from a competent Italian source:—

It is true that for some time proposals have been made from various quarters to put an end to the war, but it is not true that either Italy or her representatives have entered into negotiations either of an official or semi-official kind on the basis of these propositions. Italy does not think of opening the negotiations, but she is prepared to consider proposals of peace. Her demands have been known to all the Powers as well as to Turkey for some time. If pressure is spoken of, it cannot be exercised in Rome.

Berlin, January 7.

The North-German Gazette this morning says:—

Rumours suggesting an impending conclusion of peace have been circulated for some days past without it being easy to detect what background of fact they contain. In all probability they are to be traced to a circular of the Grand Vizier sent to the Valls and reported on Thursday last, which contains the statement that a peace with Italy securing the prestige and honour of the Ottoman Empire will within a short time be concluded.

The German Government organ remarks that the military situation has not undergone any change of importance since the New Year, but adds:—

The position of the Turks is likely to be made more difficult by the circumstance that the Egyptian coast on the Mediterranean and Suez Canal is being subjected to a more rigorous control by the presence of a British man-of-war and a British coastal corps with the object of preventing the landing of contraband.

Vienna, January 11.

A despatch from Podgoritz to the Reichspost states that several leaders of last year's Malissori revolt have informed the Austro-Hungarian Consul-General at Skutari that in consequence of Turkish tactics and of the non-fulfilment of Turkish promises a new rising will take place in the spring and have asked for information as to how Vienna would behave. The Malissori chiefs are alleged to have pointed out that their situation will be better this year than last and that they can rely not only on Montenegro but also on the Great Powers. They therefore wish to know whether Austria would be favourably disposed towards them.

A telegram from Salonika reports that the state of siege has been proclaimed at Ishtib and Kuprili, apparently in consequence of fresh Bulgar revolutionary menaces.

Rome, Jan. 12

An official statement published in this morning's newspapers affirms the entire confidence of the Government in the conduct of the war in Tripoli, a confidence based on the fullest possible knowledge of circumstances and facts. It also warns the Italian public against listening to incompetent and irresponsible critics who seek to discredit the military authorities while pretending that the struggle can be brought to a more speedy conclusion by following some other line of tactics.

The newspapers express their approval of this communication whose moral each of them considers is applicable to a contemporary and not to itself, though as a matter of fact there are few that do not merit the rebuke.

Cairo, Jan. 18

According to trustworthy information the reports published in the native Press of impending action by the Senussi are much exaggerated. The facts appear to be that the proclamation, which was issued, not by El Senussi himself but by his brother, does not call upon the members of the sect to join in a Holy War or to make a general rising, but merely encourages the Arabs as a whole in resisting the Christians. The heads of the various Zamias (Senussi settlements) are instructed to read an exhortation which contains the usual promises of spiritual blessing on the Beduin in the vicinity. Until the actual text is known it is difficult to gauge the probable effect of the exhortation, but in view of the general terms in which it appears to be couched, and seeing that it emanates only from the brother of El Senussi, it is not thought that very great importance need be attached to the proclamation.

Information has been received in London, that on the morning of the 17th instant some Italian troops who were engaged in repairing the water supply at Derna were attacked by a number of the enemy who had crept up unobserved during the night. General Trombi sent up support of infantry and mountain guns, which repulsed the Turkish attack and took by assault a small Turkish fort. A Turkish non-commissioned officer was taken prisoner, and several dead Turks and Beduin were found near the fort. Later on, while the Italians were pursuing the Turks, a second column of the enemy appeared, but was repulsed by artillery fire. At 1 o'clock in the afternoon the Turks, who numbered perhaps over 3,000 men, were in full retreat all along the line. The Italian losses were three killed and seven wounded; those of the Turks were much more numerous. No fewer than 100 dead were left on the field.

Rome, Jan. 18.

Long details of the fighting at Konfuda, which have been received here, show that the principal trophies, besides the yacht Fauvette, were seven flags and four pennants, one 6.5 gun, one 5.7 gun, four 4.7 guns, three 3.7 guns, one Maxim, three Nordenfeldts, all with mountings, etc., some compasses, signal code-books and books of tactics, a complete electric searchlight apparatus, and 33 cases of ammunition.

Soon after quitting Konfuda the warship Piemonte met two sambuks with coal for the Turkish fleet and a spare wheel and rudder for the Fauvette. The cargo of the sambuks was seized. At Konfuda the Piemonte captured two other sambuks. According to information derived from an excellent source, the fighting at Konfuda and its outcome have made a deep impression all along the Arabian coast as making it plain that the Turkish troops are scattered about in isolated positions and exposed to attack.

A Tripoli message received here says that yesterday an aeroplane threw into the Arab encampment a manifesto with the news of the battle of Konfuda.—Reuter.

Berlin, Jan. 16

In reply to a press inquiry, the German Foreign Secretary, Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter, who has been absent from his post for some weeks on leave of absence, telegraphs this evening that he is going for some time to Upper Italy and perhaps for a day to Rome "in order to make the acquaintance of the Marquess di San Giuliano."

News from Turkish Sources.

IT APPEARS from a communication received by the Minister of War that on the 6th January an Italian regiment which had marched out of Homs was attacked by the Turkish forces about one kilometre from the town and was obliged to retire in consequence of an onslaught on its left wing, leaving on the field 50 dead and a quantity of ammunition. The rearguard, composed of 150 men, was entirely exterminated. The Turkish losses consisted of one officer, two soldiers, and 15 natives killed, and 37 wounded, among whom were two women and a child.

Al Iwa, January 10.

All the correspondence that had taken place between the Ottoman, Egyptian and British governments about Saloum together with all other documents relating to this question has suddenly disappeared from the Foreign Office of the Sublime Porte. It appears from Constantinople newspapers, that although active search is proceeding, no satisfactory and reliable clue has yet been found. Generally a European who is an officer of a European Embassy is suspected and the Government has even arrested two such Europeans on a charge of being concerned in the crime. The Tanin writes that the theft took place last week and even hints at a house where the plot was hatched and the thief was paid his remuneration.

This theft is very strange and is certainly a political affair. The inferences of Constantinople journals in this connection are clear and easy of belief. They state that whoever the thief it is certain he had buyers of the stolen property at hand to whom the question of Saloum was of some importance and that these were ready to pay considerable price for these documents. On this theory the buyers could have been none other but Italy or Germany and that not only for the sake of the Saloum question itself but also because it was desirable to learn prematurely what communication had taken place between the Porte and Britain. It is still more strange that the European Press Agencies which were exporting the world for some weeks past with unnecessary and unreliable news should have forgotten to mention such an important matter. In fact we have learnt of this only to day from Constantinople papers. It is evident that this affair has considerable political importance and the silence of the two European agencies was wilful.

Al Haqiqat, January 14.

It is reported on good authority that the Ottoman Government has sent an army and has occupied the province of Urumiah on the Persian frontier. The Persian Government is pleased at this occupation by Turkey as they think that this is a sort of help to them against Russia. As long as the Russians do not evacuate Persia completely Turkey proposes to keep her forces in Urumiah.

Dr. Kareem Sibati Bey, President of the Red Crescent Society in Tripoli, has wired to the Minister of War that on the occasion of the battle of Am Zara the enemy poured a constant fire from its guns on the Red Crescent Society's tents, although they bore in a most marked and visible way the banner and signs of the Red Crescent Society. Besides this on several occasions it has happened that the enemy has left off fighting the soldiers and opened fire on the tents used as hospitals. The fighters in Tripoli request the Sublime Porte to bring the matter to the notice of the European Powers and make the strongest possible protest.

Al Haqiqat, January 11.

The Turkish Red Crescent Society has received Rs. 1,500 from the inhabitants of Mauritius.

A Turk's Letters from Tripoli.

[Specially translated for the "Comrade"]

(FROM THE SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF THE "TANIN").

CAMP AZIZIA,

November 23 1911.

WE LEFT Constantinople on the 19th October, and stayed for ten days in Marseilles. The delay in this town occurred on account of our having had to wait for Kareem Sabati Bey and for making purchases for the Red Crescent party. We left Marseilles on the 4th November and having visited Bizerta and Tunis on our way arrived at Sfax. Nine officers who had come by the same steamer with me were detained by the Sfax police and had to return. The Red Crescent Mission was also subjected to a good deal of inspection and investigation, and a number of "precautionary measures" were adopted, so much so that our physicians, surgeons, and male nurses were subjected to a searching examination in their art by the French military doctors.

To be fair I must say that the French Government was not altogether unjustified in adopting these measures. For many of our officers who attempted to pass through Tunis were not very careful in their ways. They tried to cross the frontier in groups! Some of the officers just when they crossed the frontier, are said to have changed their clothes and put on their uniforms in the sight of the frontier guards. All this could not escape the observation of Italians in Tunis, whose number, if anything, exceeds that of the French. The Italians were very watchful; they kept their men to observe in every place, on board every ship and were ready to make complaints and kick up rows. At this time too the riot at Tunis took place, and the French were placed in a very awkward position. We passed only two nights in Sfax. As in Tunis, so also here, there was great excitement among the Arabs. They gave every assistance to us and showed they our anxiety. Here, however, we could not free ourselves for one moment from being shadowed by the Italians. They even went so far as to insult us once or twice, their object obviously being to provoke an incident and thus prevent our crossing the frontier.

Karcm Sabati Bey and a few doctors remained in Sfax to get things for the Red Crescent Mission, while we, fourteen in number, passed on to Bankardan in a day in motor cars. We passed two nights in this little place also, which is about six hours' journey from the frontier. We were to wait here for our friends left behind in Sfax and then go on together, but on receipt of a telegram from Karcm Sabati Bey that they would not be able to leave Sfax for some time longer, I, in company with Husamuddin, Shauki, Mazhar and Abdullah Effendi, mounted our animals and took the road. As we had received a written permit in our capacity of members of the Red Crescent party we passed the frontier at night without any incident or trouble. Before we reached the frontier a halt was made for rest in the little village of Shousa. The ruler and commander of this point was an indigenous Arab Sergeant. This officer in his zeal out-Frenched the French themselves. He had before this turned back some of our officers, and interrogated us too with great vehemence, but in the face of the permits we possessed he could not do anything. We crossed the frontier at night openly and without any difficulty.

We heaved a sigh of relief as soon as we put our foot on our own ground. We felt as if we had stepped into our own home. The road followed the coast. The waters of the Mediterranean were kissing the sands. As we had to take ourselves to Zawara by the evening in any case, we were making a forced march. We could reach the Furuwa (فروورا) outpost at about 4. This appeared to us one of the prettiest natural harbours of the world. There was only one soldier with five Arab guards in this outpost. Two days earlier the monarchs of Italy had come to this harbour and bombarded the outpost! The soldiers said that hundreds of rounds were fired by the enemy, but we could see that the effect had almost been nil as only one or two stones had fallen out of the outpost. We also saw the cannon balls fired by the enemy. Here we recognised that we were fighting a nation which had lost all nerve and morale.

We proceeded slowly on the monotonous sands but under the clear sky of Northern Africa. We sometimes came across camels, but nothing else was met with, only here and there a solitary date tree which seemed in the bush to sigh, not sing, a dirge of the illimitable desert.

We entered Zawara after the prayer call of Maghrib. The front of Zawara was enclosed by sand mounds looking on the sea, and its rear by thick groves of palm. Barracks only could be the place of shelter for wayfarers like us, and we lived thither and passed a night that did something to lessen the fatigue natural after a continuous ride of 30 hours. Some houses had tumbled down and some places destroyed. Two or three days ago a cruiser of the enemy had visited and bombarded the fort. People said that two or three hundred rounds were fired from the cruiser.

There was a company of regulars not up to full strength. The enemy tried its best to come on land, but could not do anything owing to the heroic resistance offered by the soldiers and the people, specially by the Commandant, Major Muhammad Musa Effendi, who continued his work undaunted by the stream of fire emanating from the guns of the vessel which seemed to have run amok through fear; they left after having succeeded by desperate cannonading to demolish a few houses.

The Yememite commander of Zawara is an extraordinary man. He appeared to me a personification of courage and strength of character. Under a veritable hail of cannon fire from the enemy, it is a sight to see him going about with supreme nonchalance among his soldiers, smoking his cigarette, ordering them to take cover and exhorting them.

From Zawara began our camel journey. My companions and myself had this experience for the first time in our life. It is not a luxury, I can tell you. The stupid camel does not care at all about your pains or about your wishes. You have to submit yourself entirely to his whims. However, there is no other way but to throw yourself on his back. Walking and riding by turns, we reached Ajilat (عجيلات) at midnight. Passing the night under a sort of cover—I might just as well say passing the night in the open—we took the road at dawn, and reached Surman (سورمن) before noon. Here we began to meet sights which reminded us in grim earnest that we were in a state of war. There were quite a number of our wounded here. We attended as best we could to five or six of them.

It was apparent that our wounded were in a pitiable condition. Mujahids from the people gathered together here in Surman and were despatched to the front. We travelled from here with a contingent of these. The spirit of all of them was excellent. They all of them thought very poorly of the Italians whose cowardice and want of experience had amply been proved. We came to Zawia (زاوية) in the evening and passed the night in the military barracks.

Got on camel back again in the morning and resumed the journey. To-day, as we had to keep near the coast and were getting to the scene of war, our road was not free from danger. Indeed a little after we had started we saw very near the coast a cruiser of the enemy, trailing its smoke in the air. We were going on shore parallel to the steamer and heard sounds of cannon at a distance. In order to keep away from the coast as much as possible we made a detour to our left, yet we were always within the reach of the enemy's guns. This danger increased after we had passed Zan'ur (ظانور). An hour before sunset we saw the enemy on the shore to the left of Tripoli with its fleet in front of the redoubts of Qarq-qarash (قارق قارش) which was now in its possession. The town of Tripoli could also be seen behind the date trees. At sunset we reached Findaq-ut-Toghar (فندق الطوغار) where there was a company of our gunners. This was at some distance behind the fortifications of Qarq-qarash and was surrounded by hillocks of sands not easy to cross.

The distance from Findaq-ut-Toghar to Ainara, the headquarters of our division, was said to be about three and a half hours' journey. The greater part of the road to-day we traversed on foot. At last on the 27th day of my start from Constantinople we arrived near Ferablas-ul-gharb, and put our heads under canvas.

Getting up early next morning, we observed an aeroplane passing over our heads, and afterwards became accustomed to see a balloon hanging in the air. The non-moving balloon would stop in the air and from there make signs to the warships which would train their guns to the locality it pointed out. There was incessant fighting for the six days we were in Ainara. No appreciable change, however, took place in the general situation. It is difficult to write a complete record of the events of these days. But the first thing that forced itself on our knowledge was the complete want of proportion between the enemy's strength and ours. To oppose its powerful fleet, quickfiring batteries, mitrailleuses, aeroplanes, and an army of at least 40,000 men equipped with arms and ammunition of every description, we have got—almost nothing!

But a handful of our hero-soldiers, and a few of the brave Arabs have, it is now two months, brought the Italians to their wit's end. They do not know what to do up to now, and the number of their casualties has gone up to thousands. In the battle of Sunday, the 13th November, alone, the whole regiment of the Bersaglieri—their best and most efficient regiment—was destroyed, and its arms and ammunition fell into our hands. That day the Italians attempted a sortie from their left out of the redoubts of Qarq-qarash (قارق قارش) but were routed. However, that day's desperate fighting did not leave us unaffected. We, who were up to then on the offensive, have had since to change our tactics, and aggressive tactics have passed on to the enemy. This situation continued up to the 21st November. Conflicts took place every day, resulting in heavy losses to the enemy who rained fire from the sea as well as from the shore. But of their shells, one in a hundred had any effect. The accounts of the last day are very confused. One thing, however, stands out in relief and it is the display of glorious heroism, and sacrifice that will never fade in brilliance in the pages of Ottoman history.

I am writing this letter in very great hurry. My ears are still tingling with that memorable day's cannonade, and my thoughts are not quite collected. That veritable rain of fire from Italian guns was diabolical. I must, however, give an account.

On Monday morning, the 21st November, we rose from our beds with—as usual—the sounds of the enemy's guns. We were accustomed to their every-day practice. However, there was some variation each day. To-day's firing looked desperate. This indicated that to-day something unusual was in store for us. Every moment the firing was getting hotter. To this our poor six Mantell slow-firing guns mounted on sand Tabias (تعبية) were replying. The ammunition of guns being limited, a very economic use was made of it, for example, to their hundred shells we replied with one, (one or two were presented every day to the city). The fighting was getting warmer. They began to move from the Qarq-qareh fortifications from their left with a Division, in any case with more than 20,000 men under the protection of the fearful fire of their cannon.

On our left there were about a 100 or 150 soldiers with a proportionate number of Arab volunteers. (I afterwards learnt that in that day's battle our right and left together did not boast of more than 3,000). The Italians came on advancing, their mountain batteries and mitrailleuses working continuously, their shrapnel bursting all round, their cavalry hiding themselves in deep ditches and then suddenly appearing when our men were at a distance of a few metres and enveloping them. To all this our men offered a most stubborn resistance; in fact some extraordinary feats were performed. The Italians had, however, come out in an immeasurably superior force. The spirits of our men were getting low, ammunition was running out. The mechanism of their old Mauser rifles was clogged with sand, so much so that out of every 20 rifles only one or two worked properly. At about two in the afternoon we were entirely surrounded by the enemy; and no way seemed to be open other than surrender or retreat.

Excitement began to prevail in the camp at Ainara. Stores and provisions were promptly loaded on camels. I left on foot with a caravan at about 3 o'clock. The place we had to retire to is called Findaq-Ghasheer (فندق غشير), four hours' journey. We walked, exposed on our right to the enemy's fire. We came to Findaq Ghasheer after the Maghrib call to prayer. A few hours later the Commander-in-Chief, Neschat Bey and Fethi Bey, Chief of the Staff, and the combatants arrived. Later on we moved to Azizia at a distance of five or six hours into the interior. We had received a set back and retired in disorder.

It was easy for the enemy to pursue, harass and disperse us, but its cowardice prevented it. This engagement thus resulted in a change of the situation. We are at present at a place which is a good deal removed from the line of our first engagement. Yet some of our troops are still stationed in Sani-at ul-Benayim.

(ثانيته البنايم) which is at a distance of four or five hours in front of us. The enemy occupied the mounds forsaken by us. They have not advanced one step further. But it appears they will develop an offensive movement again.

Our men are not experiencing any difficulty with regard to provisions, but cannot find any means to replenish the ammunition. The thing that affects me most, makes me in fact weep, is the condition of our wounded. There were occasions when we could not get proper cotton wool or bandage linen for dressing, or ordinary instruments for operation. We are experiencing most heat-rending privations with regard to these. It is two days that the Red Crescent Mission has arrived.

After making a general survey of the situation my first and last verdict is this: here combatant and non-combatant everyone is doing his duty with the utmost devotion. Blame attaches only and exclusively to the Government, that Government which, through neglect and want of forethought—my consoling does not allow me to use a stronger expression—has nearly succeeded in severing the big limb of Tripoli from the body politic of our country. With ordinary sacrifices, Tripoli could be defended against an ordinary enemy of the type of Italy. Oh that we should be helpless in face of—Italy!

The situation in any case is full of anxiety. Let us look to the future which may bring us power to rise from this slough.

I have got many things to write, but the Posta-chi (the dak carrier) is standing at my head ready to start and I must close.

—AHMED SHAREEF in the Tanin

(FROM THE "TANIN")

We have noticed one or two inaccuracies in our correspondent, Ahmed Shareef Bey's letter from Tripoli which we published yesterday. . . . There is nothing for us to be ashamed of in the fact that the Mujahids in Tripoli do not possess all the arms and the means of war nowadays required. We think we can be proud of the fact that our brave warriors lacking all these have inflicted several defeats on their foe who possess a perfect organisation. The whole nation ought to know and feel that the devoted band in Tripoli has brought into existence an army out of the desert-sea which is performing such feats of valour, and it ought to rejoice. For nothing could be a more convincing proof of what a well-equipped Turkish army may do. It would have been easy for us to change some lines of our correspondent and substitute expressions of self-laudation. But we think the publication of the letter as it is does not cast any reflection on our national honour, in fact we believe it enhances it. It should also be borne in mind that a correspondent in a country where war is being waged is capable of observing only a very limited area, and it would be wrong to come to any conclusion as to the whole force and its dispositions from the writings of an easily impressed correspondent himself ignorant of the art of war.

We, however, made inquiries yesterday at the Ministry of War in order to give to our readers reliable information, and we learnt that in Tripoli there existed more than enough stores, provisions and ammunition. Further, we should not forget to note that the date of Shareef Bey's letter is more than a month ago. After this letter was written, the Ottoman Mujahids gained the signal victory of Bir Tobras (بئر الطبرس) and compelled the enemy to retreat, and have thus practically proved that they possess ample munitions of war. We can therefore be confident, as Shareef Bey himself is, that our warriors in Tirabilas-ul-Gharb will perform their task most efficiently.

Egyptian Neutrality.

(FROM "AL-LIWA" SPECIALLY TRANSLATED FOR THE "COMRADE")

January 9.

THE proceedings of the Egyptian Government since the beginning of the war are passing strange. In reality Egypt is an integral part of the Ottoman Empire, her army is included in the Ottoman army and her Government is a vassal of the Ottoman Government. It was for this reason that when war broke out between Greece and Turkey, the Egyptian Government cut off all relations with Greece. But the Government of Egypt has changed her garments to-day and the fashion in which she now appears before the world has no semblance of her original raiment.

For some time the Egyptian Government remained quiet, and then proclaimed a policy of neutrality. But the neutrality of Egypt is no less strange than her desertion of the Ottoman Throne. This neutrality is so used that Italians are left without let or hindrance, but the door of all aid and assistance to the Ottoman army is being closed with the harshest of coercive measures. Sometimes poor Beduins and the dwellers of the desert are arrested on the ground of being bound for Tripoli. Sometimes several localities on the frontier are closed to all traffic for fear somebody may leave that way for the Tripolitaine. Sometimes men are arrested without cause or reason on the mere supposition that they might go and join the Turkish forces as volunteers. Some days back a man named Abdullah Yusuf, an inhabitant of Tripoli, was arrested at one of the outpost stations on the frontier with his 1,320 camels, simply because he wanted to enter the Tripolitaine which was his native country. It is now reported that this innocent man has been exiled and shipped by force to Constantinople. Several instances of this nature have occurred, and although it is announced publicly that nobody would be exiled, it seems these professions are not acted upon. Over and above these there are many other coercive measures of the Egyptian Government, such as the guarding of the Suez Canal, the reorganisation of outposts on the frontiers, additional reinforcement, total prohibition of immigration and emigration in the neighbourhood of the frontiers and stoppage not only of arms and contraband of war but of all sorts of articles, all of which the Egyptian Government considers as covered by the term "neutrality." Perhaps the French Government understands this better than the Egyptian, but we do not find a single instance of this procedure in Tunis. When Italy made a protest to France that the movements of the Arabs of Tripoli and Tunis were left quite free and unchecked, France plainly replied that it was impossible to stop incoming and outgoing Arabs as they had always come into Tunis to buy and sell.

But has the Egyptian Government become neutral to-day or was it also neutral up to a month and a half after the commencement of the war? If the connotation of neutrality is so vast as to exclude any and every kind of help, then why did the Government not raise an objection when the people of Egypt collected and sent thousands of pounds, when thousands became ready to go and fight as volunteers and no less than twenty thousand of these are actually fighting in Tripoli?

Not a single implement of war has been found in any of the caravans that have been stopped. But the Egyptian Government on the pretext of contraband of war wishes to cut off every connection between Egypt and Tripoli.

The Tripoli Campaign.

(BY THE "TIMES" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.)

January 5.

The situation has remained practically unchanged during the past week. The weather is partly responsible for Italian quiescence.

Aeroplane reconnaissances have been almost impracticable, and the state of the sea has been very unfavourable for landing troops. Thus Bir Tobrak has not been avenged, and the 5th Division has not yet been reported off the coast of North Africa, though it was expected there during the last days of the old year.

Mr Marconi has returned from a tour of inspection of the Italian wireless stations at Tobruk, Derna, Benghazi and Tripoli, and declares himself well satisfied with the efficiency of the system. These garrisons are all in communication with each other, while Cyrenaica communicates with Coltano near Pisa, which in its turn is in touch by wireless with Massowah. Thus the Italians are well placed so far as the communication of news is concerned, while the cruisers have useful transmitting stations for reports. Admiral Faravelli's and Squadron was off Benghazi during the third week in December. Here also were the Marco Polo and Agordat serving as guardships, the former anchored to the north of Benghazi and the latter to the south, ready to use both guns and searchlights as required. There is not much information of the position of other ships, but as the Duke of the Abruzzi reached Rome on December 22, no immediate naval movement seemed at that date to be in the wind.

The Army Corps at Tripoli has remained on the defensive, completing the defences of Ain Zara. General Rocchi of the Engineers, a distinguished soldier and author, has arrived to organize the defensive works, while two companies of the 7th and 8th Fortress Regiments have left their garrisons in North Italy and will no doubt be landed when the weather serves. Scouting parties of Arabs led by Turkish officers have come close up to the trenches at Ain Zara. A subsequent reconnaissance by the Florence Lancers on December 27 towards Bir Tobrak and Bir Akara found traces of large camps recently abandoned. The Turkish headquarters are probably at Aziziah, but may be at Zebea. Strong reinforcements have come up, and as the Sultan's forces are united and determined the Italian advance on Ghurub is likely to be hotly opposed. Upon Zanzur the Arabs descended after the Italians had retired, and made things unpleasant for the inhabitants who had been civil to the invaders. Thus on this side there is little doing for the moment and 40,000 Italians are rating the polenta of idleness.

The Turco-Arabs in Cyrenaica have been enterprising and have delivered several attacks against the Italians at Benghazi, Derna and Tobruk. Among the dead in some of these attacks have been found black warriors from the Sudan. Enver Bey's camp is 7 miles east of Benghazi, and his tents are said to cover a front of four miles. Here is the main force, but the Italians believe that there are two strong detachments wide on the wings, at Leghien and Haun-Segui respectively, and that Enver Bey's plan is to hold an Italian attack in front and to assail its flanks. As Enver Bey is a disciple of Marshal von der Goltz, the plan is not inherently improbable. Enver Bey was present at the German manoeuvres last September, on which occasion von der Goltz twice made the double enveloping attack with which the Italians now credit the Turkish commander. But in vain is the net spread in the sight of the aviator, and Enver Bey's flank columns appear to have been marked down by the airmen before the stormy weather began. On Christmas Day the Turkish commander made a demonstration and moved out towards Benghazi, showing several thousand—'alcune migliaia,' says the official report—of his men and some guns. The Italians manned their trenches, but were not to be tempted into the open, so the Turks pulled up a mile off and the affair resolved itself into an artillery combat, in which all the advantage was naturally with the Italians.

The objective of most of the Turkish attacks is the oasis of Fohad, near Benghazi, where are the best wells in the district. It is not quite clear from the reports whether the Italian trenches enclose this oasis or not. The water-supply of the troops is drawn mainly from cistern ships which are anchored off the shore. Here, as elsewhere, the water supply is a serious matter. As for the other attacks, some very bravely made, against Italian fortified posts, it cannot be credited that a man of Enver Bey's attainments can hope to make any lasting impression upon the Italian bases with their naval backing. It must be supposed that the Turkish commander has to keep his Arabs in play, and lets them go against the forts when he cannot ensure their patience by any other means. The last fight at Derna on December 26 was a different affair, for on this occasion the Italians were in the open. A smart skirmish ensued, and the Italians retired to their works with 80 casualties after a successful counterattack. On this occasion, as at Benghazi, the Turks brought some field artillery into action. To Benghazi has come the 4th Regiment of Bersaglieri, consisting of the 26th, 29th and 31st Battalions from Turin. The arrival of other Italian reinforcements possibly the 5th Division, is expected at Benghazi, for which place a native battalion from Eritrea is also under orders. The Italians have four native battalions in Eritrea, each 750 strong, and reported to be useful troops. The 5th Division consists of the 34th, 35th and 39th Regiments of Infantry, besides two Alpine battalions. The 19th Guides and the 30th and 61st Regiments of Infantry are also mobilized.

It is too early to say whether the reconstruction of Said Pasha's Ministry will affect the general situation, but it may be recalled that Enver Bey has declared in the most categorical manner that he will not make peace even if the Turkish Government consents to it, and that the Arabs under his orders cannot be induced to lay down their arms.

In a letter to the Nene Frese Fresse Marshal von der Goltz thinks the Turks have gained an inestimable advantage from the war, since it has cemented a confraternity of arms between Turks and Arabs and has created a union which will not easily be broken. The German Marshal highly approves of the tactics of enticing the Italians into the interior, and believes that we are only at the beginning of a long and obstinate war.

In replying to some observations by the writer on the subject of desert warfare, the Tribuna of December 26 admits without any reserve the justice of the greater part of these observations, but considers that penetration into the interior is not an immediate necessity, and that the invaders, having mastered the coast towns, can wait in patience and security until the tribes of the interior, driven by commercial necessity, come to terms. Therefore, urges the Tribuna, we are not caught by the pincers of the dilemma or the trilemma which The Times critic holds out to us. But, almost in the same breath, the patience and security argument is thrown overboard, and the Ministerial journal proceeds to advocate the first of the three courses which the writer referred to, namely, the construction of railways, as the best to follow. It asks that these Railways shall not be improvised for military necessities, but shall be planned for the development of the country and for the subjugation of the tribes of the interior. The Tribuna must, surely, see that it speaks with two voices, and that foreign critics must be forgiven if they continue to find some difficulty in deciding upon the plan of campaign which commends itself to the Italian Government.

There is a great deal to be said for the patience and security argument if both factors could be counted on, but 80,000 conscripts, largely made up of men withdrawn from civil avocations, will not be patient for ever, and the security of the five or six coast towns which the Italians hold is only relative, and requires vigilance and strength for its affirmation. We can only talk at present, as we used to talk of the Spanish holdings in Morocco, of the Italian presidios in North Africa. Conquest there is none, yet there stands the Decree of Annexation, and there also is the declaration of the Italian Government that the war would be prosecuted with the utmost rigour.

In the Corriere della Sera of December 29, Signor Giorgio Bompiani, who writes lucidly and with measure, has also examined at some length the considerations which the writer set out in The Times of December 26. Not relying on the otium cum dignitate argument, the correspondent of the Corriere declares that the advance will be made, as the writer admitted, by a combination of the three means suggested, namely, railway construction, occupation of intermediate posts, and camel transport; and Signor Bompiani not obscurely hints that the advance will begin some time in January or February, and that it will be "a classic example of the manner in which a desert expedition should be carried out."

That is good news for our soldiers, who are studying the campaign at a distance with the sympathy for both sides which the British declaration of neutrality imposes upon them. The Corriere's statement is, in fact, quite interesting, for failing it we might have complained that there was no clear indication of a plan of campaign based on a reasoned judgment of the general situation and upon a clear and unbroken view of the ways and means necessary for meeting it.

It is difficult to place much confidence in the current rumours regarding peace. Italy sincerely desires peace, and has good cause to do so, but her Decree of Annexation is a bar to the suggestion of any terms which Turkey can honourably accept. On the Turkish side there is no sign of giving way. The new Ministry is purely Young Turk and the Salonika Committee stands for war to the bitter end. A Turkish Minister declared in last week's debate at Constantinople that it was false to say that the Government desired a dissolution in order to make peace with Italy. He added that it was impossible to surrender an inch of Turkish soil, and that such cessation was absolutely forbidden by the Constitution. Skilled indeed will be the diplomacy which discovers a formula to reconcile the conflicting claims of the belligerents.

Meanwhile the war goes on. The weather up to December 31 continued bad. No aviators could scout, and all operations of landing troops and stores had to be suspended. In Cyrenaica not even the post has been able to enter or leave the occupied towns. Serious disadvantages have, no doubt, been entailed by these circumstances, but we cannot tell how great they are without knowing the reserve of water, stores, and supplies which the Italian staff have accumulated. The Vita has reported—and the report has been printed in Ministerial papers without contradiction—that just before Christmas, the Tenth Brigade of the Expeditionary Force, consisting of the 35th and 39th Regiments of Infantry, with auxiliary services left Naples in four transports, escorted by the Pisa and torpedoc raft with the intention of occupying Suara, but that the weather was so bad that no boat could be launched to communicate with Tripoli and that the convoy was compelled to put back to Augusta, in Sicily.

It is probable that the occupation of Suara and of one or two other points on the coast between Tripoli and the Tunis frontier is contemplated in order to check the contraband trade, but the belief of the Messaggero that this action will definitely arrest the trade between Tripolitania and Tunis is sanguine, for all that will happen will be that the caravans will be deflected to the south. Suara is a small town without importance, and the anchorage is much exposed, but a fair caravan road unites the village with Gharian via El Ogh, and some of Neshet Bey's supplies have reached him by this route.

Except for an attack at Homs, some night alarms at Ain Zara and some cavalry reconnaissances, little has been doing on the Tripoli front. The position of the Turks remained uncertain until December 31 when the aviators were able to resume work and reported scattered parties of the enemy at Suani, Beni Iden, Ben Gaschi, and Sidi Saiah with reserves at Azizah and Gharian. Neshet Bey is apparently strengthening his position at Gharian, where he has been joined by Arabs from the interior, and as Gharian has the best water supply in all this district, the main body of the Turco-Arabs will probably remain here until the Italians move, worrying the enemy with feints by scouting parties.

The plan of the Italian staff originally was to link up Italian posts in Tripoli by a Decauville line of 80-centimetre gauge. This plan has been now abandoned in favour of another which adopts the 95-centimetre gauge, and consequently renders it possible to utilize the rolling stock of the Sicilian ferrovie complementari which are of similar gauge. On January 3 the Official Gazette published a Decree authorizing the Direction of State Railways to proceed with this undertaking and already ships have been taken up to carry the necessary materials from Venice and Syracuse. Sufficient rolling stock for construction is at disposal; the locomotives are of Mark 202 of Italian design, and a few passenger wagons will be sent out at once. The first lines to be made will be from Tripoli to Ain Zara, Tajurah, and Zanzur. The survey of the lines is now being made by Signor Gullini, while Signor Cavenago has the direction of the construction, and will have under him heads of technical branches to superintend the works of the Army engineers and native labourers.

It is to be expected that the rest of the 5th Division will be sent to Bengazi or Derna for the more active prosecution of the war on this side. At Bengazi, Derna and Tobruk reiterated attacks have been made on the Italian redoubts and block houses and although these attacks have all been repulsed it must be very embarrassing to the Italian command to be restricted for so long to defensive and to be wearied by continual alarms which deprive the troops of their rest. The moral ascendancy in Cyrenaica is on the side of the Turks, and it must be the desire of the Italian command to break the spell at the earliest available opportunity. There are 20,000 Italians at Bengazi, 16,000 at Derna, and 6,000 at Tobruk. Fethi Bey holds a central position between Bengazi and Derna, and can throw his Arabs against either column if the Italians advance from both places, but the Italian control at sea enables troops to be moved from one point to another, as may be required, when the weather serves.

The Duke of the Arbuzi returned to Taranto on January 3 on which date there was reported a large fleet of ships of all classes at this port. The Bey of Tobruk or Mersa Tebruk as we call it, continues to serve as the advanced base of the Navy in Africa. The guardships at Bengazi, Derna and Homs, the cruising squadrons, the flotillas, and the auxiliary cruisers, all use this base in turn. Here also is the centre of the war against contraband. The war is waged partly by destroyers and partly by auxiliary cruisers. The destroyer flotilla, under Captain Genta, for example, includes the Leucini, Garibaldi, Cirazzetti, and Artigliere, and has been active of late. Among the auxiliary cruisers are the C. di Catania, C. di Messina, C. di Palermo and C. di Siracusa ships averaging 3,000 tons, with armaments of 12 c.m. and 76 m. guns, and speed of 20 knots.

The Tobruk inlet extends two miles north-west by west. It is three-quarters of a mile broad and from five to eight fathoms deep, except for half a mile at the head of the bay where the water is shallow. It affords excellent shelter in all winds except those from east and south-east, which are more prevalent in summer than in winter. Tobruk itself is a wretched hamlet totally devoid of resources, and not more than 100 Arabs remain in the place. The water supply is so bad that the troops first landed had to be supplied with water distilled by the Evma. Iron cisterns have since been landed on the beach and are refilled from time to time by the cistern ship Ardena. This is the port which England is supposed to covet. Many millions must be laid out before Tobruk becomes the Spina of North Africa. On the hills to the south of the bay the Italians have built three small forts which are connected by trenches and covered by strong lines of wire entanglement, as are all the other Italian fortifications. On the promontory which forms the north side of the bay another fort has been built above the old Saracen citadel and it is being armed with 149 m.m. guns. A few nights ago this work was attacked, but thanks to a steady garrison and to a searchlight which was not turned on until the Arabs were within 400 yards, the attack was beaten back.

Thus after three months of war there are 92,000 Italians in North Africa, in occupation of five points on a coastline 1,100 miles long, restricted to the defensive, and without the means for penetrating far into the interior. On the other side, in practical control of the entire country annexed to Italy by decree, are a few thousand Turks, leading and forming the cadres of large forces of Arab irregulars, untrained and short of many resources which an army needs, but drawing from religion and their native valour a strength of resistance which remains intact and awaits the favourable moment for asserting itself.

It is necessary to say a few words, in conclusion, upon the subject of the neutrality of Egypt. An Italian agency has supplied the French Press with a note affirming that English troops have "definitely occupied all the Sinai Peninsula" and that "everything is ready to commence works of fortification." Nothing of the sort has taken place. Proper steps have been taken in Egypt to fulfil the obligations of neutrality, and precautions have been extended to the Suez Canal because the collection of large herds of camels at Gaza in Syria, and other episodes, pointed to an intention to run contraband goods across the Sinai desert into Egypt. Patrols of infantry, camelry, irregulars, and Customs guards are consequently posted to prevent this traffic, but no idea of occupying the Sinai desert has ever been entertained. Apart from all questions of neutrality, the importation of arms and ammunition into Egypt is forbidden by a municipal law and consequently it is the duty of the constituted authorities in Egypt to prevent this traffic. The duties of neutrality have been exercised in an absolutely impartial spirit, and neither belligerent has any just cause of complaint.

Lieut. Montagu on Italian Atrocities.

We publish below by special arrangement with the Central News Agency, in account of the Italian atrocities at Tripoli by Mr. Herbert G. Montagu, late Lieutenant in the 5th Royal Fusiliers, the British officer who joined the Turks outside Tripoli. Writing of the fighting immediately after his arrival at the Turkish camp, he says—

It is my purpose to set forth in full detail what I myself know of the atrocities perpetrated by the Italians in the oasis of Tripoli and to explain the circumstances under which it came about that I cabled to the Central News Agency a signed protest against these horrible barbarities. Attacks on the Italian lines were delivered by us day after day, generally, indeed, we made two attacks a day. This kind of warfare was particularly galling to the enemy. We never let them sleep, and the effect on their nerves was such that they soon by all accounts became utterly demoralised and frightened. They had not the pluck to make a determined advance upon the oasis, but they were maddened by the so-called "revolt" of the Arabs in Tripoli and by the discovery that they had placed too great reliance on the protestations of friendship which the Tripoli Arab had very naturally made to them at the time of the invasion. The love of the Italians for the down-trodden Arabs changed in a moment to frenzied hatred.

The war had been in progress just about a month when orders were given by Fethi Bey for an attack on a small scale. The direction of the attack was entrusted to four officers operating in different districts, and each officer had under him about 500 or 600 Arabs and one or two companies of Turkish regulars. My men and I had been fighting from about eight in the morning until about four in afternoon (though with an interval for a decent meal, since we could do pretty well what we liked, the Italians remaining in the position to which we drove them), and at the latter hour I decided that we had done enough. As I passed the order to the troops I noticed a number of apparently infuriated soldiers gathered together in groups, shouting and gesticulating and all pointing in one direction, so I ordered them off and rode forward with an escort and an interpreter to reconnoitre. I should mention here that the dwellings in the oasis are, or were, picturesquely situated, with beautiful walled-off gardens very much like those to be found in the suburbs of an English town. Coming to one of these houses I came across the dead body of a woman and at first I feared that we had ourselves accidentally shot her. I accordingly dismounted and entered the house, when to my horror I found that inside the building there were the bodies of perhaps 20 women, some of them with babies. All had been thrown into the house after having been outraged and mutilated in the most frightful manner. Some of the women had both breasts cut off, others had been ripped open, Jack-the-Ripper fashion, and some of the little babies had been spiked in a filthy way. It was especially noticeable that the hands and feet of the victims were tied. I went on to another house. Here there was the same sort of thing to be seen and the yard was full of bodies. I set two orderlies counting them, and they brought me the report that there were about 120. By now the other officers had finished their attacks, and I went right along the lines where the Italians had previously been, looking for further evidence of outrages. In this way I reached Hena [Henni?] and here I made the most appalling discovery of all. I made my way to the mosque, and the door being shut I pushed it open. The mosque was absolutely running red. With my foot I touched the body of a little girl who had been thrown on top of a heap of women, and she slipped down to the floor in a way that made me feel faint and sick. In this case the women had been tied together in batches, bayoneted, spiked, and otherwise mutilated.

Now I am fully alive to the great importance of every word that can be written about this horrible matter, and so I shall proceed to give a number of facts the significance of which will be apparent to everyone. There can be no doubt that bayonets were used by the murderers. In one case I found a portion of a bayonet fixed fast in a woman's skull. There were one or two Italian hats lying about—hats of the pith helmet type, green inside—which being swamped in blood, had been left behind as useless by their owners. On the faces and other parts of many of the bodies were the marks of boots, and in the mouth of one woman was the heel of an Italian soldier's boot, ripped away from the other portion. Some soldier had trodden on this unfortunate creature, had put his foot on her face, and, perhaps in her death agony, she had bitten deep into the heel of his boot, which had remained between her teeth.

I reeled out of the mosque in a hot sweat. The ghastly things I had just seen swam in front of me, and the only thought I could frame was that it was my duty to cause these crimes to be known everywhere. Having come part of the way to Tripoli with Seppings Wright, I determined to cable to the agency he was representing, knowing that my telegram would then be distributed broadcast; and I divulged the fact that I was a British officer, and gave my name and regiment, so that it should not be said that this story was only a sensational press report. Seppings Wright was then at Zwarra, and I obtained permission to send for him specially that he might photograph the scenes I have described. Incidentally, I may point out that my telegram was mutilated rather badly in transmission, and that it was deciphered at the London end as stating that I was sending on behalf of Mr Seppings Wright instead of sending for him, which, of course, was not the case. Unfortunately, Wright was a very long time in joining us, and the Arabs insisted upon burying their womenfolk, so that he took no photographs of the actual scenes above referred to. I believe, however, he photographed the place of burial. Here the desert wind had blown the sand away from some of the bodies and the limbs were showing above the surface.

It has been suggested that the bodies which I saw were those of cholera victims, torn and mutilated by pariah dogs. In answer to this suggestion, I can only say that I have never heard even of a circus dog that could tie a knot, much less lash women and little girls together in gangs. Nor do pariah dogs wear European boots that leave marks upon the faces of those upon whose bodies they prey. Nor do they wear helmets. If the bodies had in fact been those of cholera victims the Arabs would never have defiled a mosque by placing them therein. Moreover, only Italians had previously been in this locality. There had been some very heavy fighting there, in which we ourselves had sustained severe losses, and when we had driven the Italians out we had killed our own men away, so that there had as yet been no investigation ever for stores.

It has been said again that the Italians were compelled to take drastic action against the Arab women, because the latter fought against them like their men. This is a ridiculous statement. There is nothing more timid than an Arab woman, who would no more dream of letting off a rifle than of jumping out of window. The women are as timid as the men are fierce and would certainly not take part in the fighting. It is possible that where there was shooting going on round about detached houses the women in the house may have loaded their husbands' rifles, but they would have done nothing more, and with the army they were separated from the men. The women of the oasis hung about their homes, and that is how they fell into the hands of the Italians.

I have had my attention called to reports, seemingly well authenticated, of Arab atrocities in Cyrenaica on Italian captives. Not having been in Cyrenaica, I cannot speak about them, but it seems quite probable that they have actually occurred. The Arabs were maddened beyond all restraint by the outrages in the oasis, and to my mind, anything they and their brethren may have done to Italian men finds plenty of excuse in what the Italians did to their women.

I have seen something of the temper of the Arabs towards the Italians since the day we found those bodies in the mosque. In the course of a reconnaissance, on which I was accompanied by a Turkish escort, an interpreter, and a party of Arabs with a sheikh, I found the bodies of eight Arabs who had been done to death in a manner which I cannot possibly describe in a newspaper. They had all suffered the same fate, injuries of the most revolting nature having been inflicted, apparently with hammers. We had only journeyed about 500 yards further when some Italians opened fire on us from a house, and the Arabs, who were frantic with rage, broke away and rushed the house, which they succeeded in taking. Some of the Italians got away, but two of them, who had been wounded, were captured and dragged outside by the Arabs. They were exceedingly frightened, and begged and implored for mercy, but mercy was just then far from the minds of their captors, who hoisted them up against a wall and prepared to drive nails into them and crucify them. The Arabs were absolutely mad. The sheikh whom I mentioned was, as I know, a most humane man when ordinary fighting was the order of the day and as tender as anybody could be with the wounded, but he, too, was given over to blind fury at what he had just seen. After a great deal of exhortation which was not without its peril to myself and to my escort, I managed to put my Turks around the two prisoners. We dared not take them prisoner, because there would have been no holding the Arabs for long, so we let them go. These possibly were the two men who, returning to their camp, gave out that they had been terribly tortured. They had both been wounded by splinters of woodwork, and one had a bullet through his forearm. If these men are honest men and are still alive they are able to confirm the story I have just narrated.

—Manchester Guardian.

Lieut. Montagu With the Turks.

WE WERE early astir on the morning following my arrival at Souk-el-Youghma, for we were to deliver an attack on the left of the Italian line, which then lay about half a mile away. We set out in column of route along a sandy road, Captain Huni, an Arab officer, and I leading the way. We had half a battalion of Turkish regulars and about fifteen hundred Arabs with us, all the men, Turks and Arabs alike, being armed with Mauser rifles. Huni and I carried Mauser repeating pistols, and I by this time had adopted the uniform of the 38th Turkish Cavalry Regiment.

Our Turkish troops were excellently disciplined, but the Arabs were, of course, only partly trained. Before the march began the Arabs clustered around their respective Sheikhs, who exhorted them to kill as many Italians as they could in the name of Allah. Each fresh exhortation was the signal for a wild, fanatical shout of "Allah!"

After marching for about five minutes we caught sight, among the palms, of large numbers of bodies of Italians, Turks, and Arabs killed in the fighting of the preceding few days. All the bodies, irrespective of nationality, had been stripped naked by the Arabs. The latter, as a matter of habit, refuse to leave anything on the field to waste. The property of their comrades killed in action is collected and carefully sent to the relatives; loot from the enemy's killed is looked upon as the property of the killers.

Some of the corpses bore the marks of brutal ill-usage. For example, I noticed some Arab corpses the faces of which had been shockingly disfigured by burning. Apparently some sort of oil had been poured on them and then fired. In some instances the fingers of dead Italian soldiers had been cut off for the sake of the rings upon them, but at that time I saw no other mutilation.

We were advancing steadily, and I can assure you I was feeling terribly sick, when, without the slightest warning, we found ourselves under fire at a range not greater than fifty yards or so from four Maxims posted behind the bank at a bend in the road ahead of us. We all threw ourselves flat on the ground, and secured some little shelter from the hedges, but an Arab was killed and a Turk wounded, while a bullet tore a hole in my coat. The shock of the unexpected attack reduced me for the moment to an absolutely childish state. The noise was deafening, and one felt utterly helpless. I was profoundly thankful that for a few minutes we did not get the order to move. Captain Huni quickly recovered his self-possession, and we attempted an enveloping movement. In doing so we ran full on the Italian lines, and for one solid hour we were engaged in sharp fighting amidst a frightful din. It is curious how in the uproar of battle, above the rattle of machine guns, and even above the heavy artillery and bursting shells, one can distinguish the characteristic reports of the various rifles.

There was no shell fire, but the machine guns maintained an endless row amidst which it was quite easy to note the difference between the "pom" of the Mauser and the "C-r-r-rack" of the Italian rifles. The Italians, by the way, used a thin, pencilly, nickel-coated bullet, which could snick a particularly neat hole. Wounds from these bullets caused the Arabs little concern. They would pick up a lump of dirt, put some oil on it, clap it on the wound, and go on as before. Our bullets were the regular fat bullets of the Mauser weapon, made of soft lead.

In that hour's fighting I lost all sense of nervousness, and came to the conclusion that one stood as much chance of being hit behind a rock as out in the open. At the end of the hour we noticed that the Italians were slowly withdrawing. I decided that a charge was about the best thing to decide upon, and passed the word to the Arabs to get ready. Their preparations did not take long. They cast aside their ordinary clothing, some throwing their rifles down as well and drawing daggers and knives of curious shapes.

There was among them a giant, standing some 6 feet 8 inches high, who carried with him a huge two-handed Crusader's sword almost as tall as himself. He threw away his rifle and his burnous, and stood waiting the signal, wearing nothing but a cloth around his waist. Knowing something of the Arabs' reputation for swiftness of foot, I started first with about half-a-dozen Turks, but before we had covered twenty yards the whole place became alive with demonic howls and yells, and the Arabs were flashing past us like hares. I got there fairly to the front and emptied my Mauser at short range, but I did not stop to refill the magazine, for the feverish excitement of the moment had communicated itself to me.

The affair only lasted a couple of minutes. At the end of that time all the Italians who were able to make good their escape were out of sight, having fled incontinently. At our end of the line they left twenty-three dead, including one officer who had fallen before a prodigious blow delivered by the giant already mentioned. With his two-handed sword, so I was assured—and I was shown the corpse—he had at one blow shorn off the head, shoulder, and left arm of his foe.

The Turkish success was complete, for the fleeing Italians had sought to cross a road held by Captain Hunt, and had been picked off like rabbits. We captured about 67 Italian rifles, and I estimate the Italian killed at 60. We lost some 10 killed.

This success immediately preceded the so-called Arab "revolt" in the town, which was brought about by a number of Arabs, who not being disposed to yield any strict obedience to orders from me, persisted in making towards the town, with the result that they got behind the Italians and had to fight for it. Fourteen of them were badly wounded, and these were bestowed in a place of hiding by their comrades, who being unable to retreat made their way into the town and stirred up the town Arabs. Altogether about 150 of them got through into Tripoli.

It chanced that a Jew got to know about the fourteen wounded men in hiding, and he sold his information to the Italian General, who ordered a raid and secured the wounded men as prisoners. They were taken into the town and placed in hospital, where they practically recovered from their wounds. And a fortnight afterwards they were all executed as "rebels," though not one of them had moved a finger in connection with the "revolt" in Tripoli.

Christmas in the Gharian.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT)

TURKISH HEADQUARTERS, TRIPOLI,

December 27

IT SEEMED clear that after the crushing disaster near Fonduk Ben Gashir on 19th December the Italians would abandon the idea of any further advance for some time, so I resolved to pay a flying visit to the Turkish base at Gharian. Some twenty miles away across the desert, there rose abruptly from the dead level the long range of the mountains which would naturally form a third line of defence against the invaders if they ever succeeded in making good their advance as far as Azizieh—a barrier of so formidable a kind as to be practically impregnable even if it were possible to drag artillery so far or use it amid the broken surface of the foothills. Fethi Bey most kindly provided me with a horse, and in company with Mr Bethurst, an Englishman who had somehow or other made his way to the Turkish camp, I set off on 22nd December for the mountains. Farewell for the present to Azizieh with its delightful Turks, kindly Englishmen, brave and greedy Arabs, and malignant microbes! When during a brief halt on our way I surveyed through my field-glasses the busy camp we had left behind us, another Arab funeral was slowly ascending the slopes of Jabel Zoweiah towards the little cemetery on the summit.

Riding on the plains of Tripoli means as a general rule a walking pace for the horse, with an occasional trot, galloping or cantering is almost out of the question in deep sand or over rough tracks of loose stones. It took us—Bethurst was mounted on an excellent mule—fully four hours before we reached the little Fonduk among the palm trees where the journey to Gharian can be broken. For the first seventeen miles the road had been—for Tripoli—a passable one, but at the close, when the foothills began, the tracks lay over masses of stones, hollows, and boulders, and to render our course still more arduous darkness had overtaken us. Riding was now quite impossible, and the poor animals, especially the horse, stumbled continually. Amid the holes and hillocks of this rugged track, lit only by the dim radiance of the stars, we walked by faith rather than sight, and good fortune alone saved us from heavy falls or sprained ankles. A Turkish soldier—our escort from headquarters—trudged sturdily along, his Mauser slung over his shoulder, and he seemed as glad as ourselves when at length a twinkling light near a tall palm tree brought us to the end of our tedious march.

The village of Gharian, in the heart of the mountains, possesses an excellent base hospital—formerly the school—and serves as a great dépôt for military supplies, to be subsequently distributed by the camels which are here gathered together in vast numbers and render sleep difficult by their gruntings and gurglings. An enormous konak built by the brigand chief Gouma before the days of the Turkish annexation, and constructed with an amazing disregard for regularity of design or economy of space, rises up like some great mediæval castle on the edge of a plateau and commands a magnificent view of the endless hills and the expanse of desert. We passed Christmas Eve in the harem—Hani sultani qui mal's pense—the fair ladies who had once dwelt behind the barred and latticed windows had long since disappeared.

Two days later I found myself back again in Azizieh, and was met by news of terrible significance. Within 24 hours there had been no less than 14 cases of cholera! Four corpses were dragged out by the heels from the courtyard just in front of the room used as my bedroom! The doctors took instant and drastic action. The dirty denizens of the market were removed with all their stock in trade to another site south of the village. The wells were thoroughly drenched with permanganate of potash and all the water subsequently drawn from them was filtered or boiled. This energy produced excellent results. The scourge ceased as abruptly as it had arisen. No further cases were recorded during my stay at headquarters. Moreover, it was proved later on that after all the muddy water of Azizieh was not the source of the infection. Every one of the fourteen Arabs who had been stricken with cholera had passed a night in a village far out in the desert, and had drunk from the same contaminated well. A load of anxiety was lifted from the minds of all at Azizieh. Hapless, indeed, is the army assailed by this terror that fleeth by night and destroyeth at noonday—the sudden agony, the violent sickness, the sinister blueness of the lips, the merciful coma that ends in death!

On the day of my arrival at Azizieh two Mussalman spies were brought in. These men had been surprised near Ain Zara in company with an Italian by a Turkish patrol. They put up a brief fight, the Italian was killed, and the two Mussalmans were captured and marched off, their hands tied behind their backs, to headquarters. When brought before Nesciat Bey, Fethi Bey, and the other officers composing the court martial the two prisoners exhibited no sign of perturbation. There was no possible doubt as to their guilt. They were both of them Tripolitan Arabs who had served in the Turkish gendarmerie, and when captured they were actually wearing their former blue uniforms with a Roman numeral on the collar in lieu of the original badge of the Sultan's service. After a short trial they were, of course, found guilty and condemned to death by hanging, but before passing sentence the Commander-in-Chief asked them both why they had deserted for service with the enemy and whether they wished to say anything before the Court rose. The elder of the two said that he had committed this crime for the benefit of his family, but as it was proved that the pay received from the Italians was no greater than his ordinary pay as a Turkish gendarme there seemed to be little in this excuse. The younger man simply said, "I am guilty. I deserve death. I throw myself on the mercy of the Court, and for the rest I ask forgiveness and peace from Allah." He had been given a cigarette before the death sentence, and after this was pronounced he continued to smoke with the same absolute indifference. The two prisoners were at once despatched to the lines, and at 7 A.M. next morning one was hung from a palm tree at Senu Bent Adam and the other at Fonduk Ben Gashir as a warning to those who in this supreme crisis of stress and peril might see fit to act as traitors to their faith, their Khalif, and their country. That arch offender Hassouna Bey—Turk by origin, Mussalman by religion, and a former servant of the Ottoman Government—has been discreetly packed off to Italy. His life was not worth an hour's purchase in Tripoli, for Arabs had sworn to kill him. His son, true to his oath and his flag, fought with the Ottoman forces until, alas! his young life was cut short by fever in the Gharian mountains.

Party Politics in Turkey.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, January 12.

A local French journal, the Liberte, publishes an interesting account of an interview which was granted to its representative by Hilmi Pasha. The ex-Grand Vizier expressed regret that the proposals for a compromise had not been accepted by either party. He did not believe that the Government would obtain a two-thirds majority for the proposals of the Chamber. The majority of the Senate also appeared to be opposed to the immediate modification of Article 35 of the Constitution. The creation of new Senators would, in his opinion, have the unfortunate result of lowering the prestige of that body, which should hold the balance of power between the parties. Should Parliament be dissolved a General Election would be inevitable. This was not an opportune moment for electoral struggles, which were certain to cause agitation, and might result in disturbances, which would only increase the malaise from which the whole country was suffering in consequence of Parliamentary rivalries. An understanding between Moslems and Christians and between the Committee and the Opposition was necessary for the welfare of Turkey. The prorogation of the Chamber for three months would be a simple method of putting an end to these polemics, which were having a bad effect everywhere.

Hilmi Pasha added that, in his opinion, the war would last a long while yet, but he did not apprehend any serious danger from the Albanians or from the Balkan States.

An agreement has been signed by the Delegates of the Party of Union and Liberty and by the Greek Party for common Parliamentary action. The agreement will be submitted to the first Congress of the former party for ratification.

Constantinople, January 17.

The proceedings in the Turkish Chamber this afternoon were marked by considerable animation. There was a full attendance. The Minister for Foreign Affairs, Assim Bey, proposed the closure of the debate on the Constitutional Bill, which had lasted ten days, and the continuance of which, he argued, was prejudicing the interests of the country, especially abroad. The motion, which was received with protests and tumult from the Opposition, was adopted by 141 to 89 votes, there being six abstentions. Subsequently the Chamber decided the fate of the Bill: 125 voted in favour of the measure and 105 against. Consequently the Bill was rejected, owing to the absence of the required two-thirds majority of the entire Chamber—namely, 188. The result of the voting was loudly cheered by the Opposition. It constitutes a defeat of the Government, and is what the Union and Progress Party have been striving for in order to provoke a dissolution, to which step they will now proceed, considering the present moment favourable for new elections.

Constantinople, January 17.

The following is the text of the Imperial Khatt, which was transmitted to the Senate this afternoon:—

The necessity having arisen, I have decided to dissolve the present Chamber of Deputies, to order new elections, and the convocation of a new Chamber of Deputies in three months. In conformity with article 7 of the Constitution I await the Senate's reply.

After a secret Session of the Senate, at which most of the members of the Cabinet were present, it was decided to appoint a Commission of nine to report on the advisability of a dissolution. As the majority of the members of the Commission are partisans of the Committee, it would appear that the Senate has decided not to raise difficulties.

Constantinople, January 16.

The report of the Senatorial Commission approves by a majority vote the dissolution of the Chamber.

Constantinople, January 17.

The Senate, after a long debate, has voted by 39 to 5 that the Sultan be advised to dissolve Parliament. The fear of the creation of Senators induced the supporters of the Opposition parties to support the motion.

Constantinople, January 18.

To-day's Imperial Iradeh closed a brief, profitless, and turbulent Session, in which the Chamber quarrelled much and did little. The elections, it is said, begin in a month's time, though a probable estimate is over sanguine in the case of the up-country districts. All prophecies concerning the composition and character of the next Parliament are based on mere surmise and must be accepted with the utmost caution. All that can be said is that while the Committee lost ground there is no proof that the Opposition gained any access of strength save in Albanian and perhaps in some of the Asiatic provinces. The general pessimism in regard to the future is perhaps the most striking feature of the situation.

Yet though the results of four years' Constitutional Parliamentary Government have been in many ways disappointing, though Parliament has shown itself timid and turbulent, submissive and obstructive by turns, it must in fairness be admitted that the Lower House, with all its faults, has done a certain amount of useful legislative work and has more recently developed a laudable taste for "economy," that the Opposition was allowed greater liberty within the Chamber than was to be expected during a period of democratic revolution, and that the representatives of the subject races were generally allowed to criticize the acts of the Government from the standpoint of their constituents, though the criticisms usually fell on deaf ears.

The Senate has done what was required of it with the minimum amount of friction. It is to be hoped that the next Chamber of Deputies will not be too progressive and will take a lesson from the calm moderation which marked its debates.

The "Tanin" and the Dardanelles.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES"]

SIR,—Your Constantinople Correspondent in his letter of 20th December states that the Union and Progress Committee has blamed me on my articles on the relations between Russia and Turkey, and that I had declared myself ready to rectify my declarations on the subject.

All these statements are entirely untrue. The Tanin is neither an official organ of the Union and Progress Committee nor that of the Government. Consequently nobody has the right of demanding such a thing from the editor of the Tanin. Neither am I in the habit of changing my views by order. I have never ceased to believe that a Turco-Russian entente built on solid and lasting basis would be a beneficent policy for my country.

I am sorry that your Constantinople Correspondent, who is not a stranger to the Tanin, did not think of consulting me before sending such groundless information concerning me.

Asking you kindly to publish these few lines in your paper,

I am yours respectfully,

DJAVID,

The Editor of the "Tanin" and the Deputy of Constantinople
CONSTANTINOPLE, 31st December.

[Our Constantinople Correspondent, who has already seen the above letter in the Tanin, writes to point out that the Tanin was not described by him as the official organ of either the Government or the Committee. As regards the other statement, he says that perhaps the phrase "promised to desist from further discussion of the Dardanelles question on these lines" would have been a more accurate account of Hussein Djavid Bey's submission.]

The Balkan Committee.

Constantinople, January 10.

There is reason to believe that the Porte has instructed its Ambassadors to call the attention of the Powers to certain military preparations made by the Montenegrin Government in the vicinity of the frontier.

The Balkan Committee has addressed to the Turkish Government and leading members of the Young Turk Party the following remonstrance on the condition and treatment of the subject populations in the European provinces of the Turkish Empire:—

The Balkan Committee, while recognizing and admitting the special difficulties in which Turkey is now placed, cannot but hold that these difficulties have been increased by the Ottomanizing policy adopted by the Young Turks—a policy which they believe to be fatal to the hopes of a contented and united Empire, and in direct violation of the pledges to give political and religious equality to all the subjects of the Empire without distinction of race or creed.

Holding these views, the Committee have reluctantly come to the conclusion that they can no longer plead for a patient and sympathetic judgment of young and inexperienced administrators faced with problems of government of exceptional difficulty, and that it is now necessary to appeal to the public sentiment of this and other civilized nations to impress on the Turkish Government the absolute and immediate necessity, in their own interests as well as in those of their subjects, of ameliorating the conditions of life in the provinces, of devoting funds—hitherto largely wasted upon wars due to the policy of "Turkification"—to education, justice, and public works; and, above all, of suppressing with vigour the injustices and cruelties from which the people suffer.

The Committee regret that reports which they have recently received from several places and persons in Turkey confirm their fears that the improvement in the administration of the provinces, which they had hoped for and expected from the professions made by the Young Turks at the time of the Revolution, had not been realized, and that lately there has been little, if any, diminution of the evils complained of under the old régime. They fear that the Government of the Porte is still either unable or unwilling to carry out the Constitutional reforms so freely and fully promised by the leaders of the Revolution.

Government could repeal such a law. Religious freedom would be secured. Mr. Churchill emphasised that the military would be under Imperial control. He pointed out that the matter of finance was the most important question of all. He would not ask the views of Mr. Redmond, Sir Edward Carson or others. Each had his own opinion, but it was the Government's duty to decide on the question. Those wishing to wreck Home Rule would doubtless argue that once a National Government was created, the Imperial subsidy must cease and not a farthing of British money go to Ireland. That was not statesmanlike or patriotic.

All those who realised that a prosperous, loyal Ireland, lying like a breakwater over Great Britain in the Atlantic would be worth many divisions of the Fleet and the Army would not grudge the comparatively small sum required to give Ireland a good start and a fair opportunity to carry on her own administration. The Government intended to provide the long delayed social and economic prosperity. Mr. Churchill said that the financial proposals would give a fair start to the Irish Government. Invidious taxes could not be imposed upon Ulster though the Irish Parliament would have real control over finance. The Imperial Government would carry out the Land Purchase and Old Age Pension Acts. The Irish financial system must be consistent with the finances of the United Kingdom. The actual separation of Ireland from Great Britain was impossible. Irish representation in the Imperial Parliament would be reduced. In conclusion, Mr. Churchill declared that the Government was prepared to fight the matter through and asked for fair play from the Unionists.

Mr. Churchill said that the case for Home Rule rested on three main sets of arguments, the Imperial argument, the House of Commons argument, and the Irish argument. He laid special stress on the Imperial argument as the largest and widest. He said that the settlement of a long quarrel between the British Government and the Irish people would be to the British Empire a boon and a blessing, a wonderful reinforcement precious beyond compare. In their own island, the Irish race had dwindled while the populations of Europe overflowed. The population of Ireland ebbed away, but elsewhere all over the world the Irish held their own, and in every country where English was spoken, the Irish were a power, a power for good or for ill, a power to harm us or a power to help us, a power to unite us or a power to keep us asunder. "What can we say of those Irishmen," Mr. Churchill continued, "who, we are assured, are in their own island incapable of managing their own affairs, but who in every other part of the English-speaking world have won their way, out of all proportion to their numbers, to positions of trust, affluence and authority, particularly political authority?" Speaking as an English minister, I must say that on the whole, in varying degrees, no doubt with notable exceptions, they have been our enemies. They have been filled with feelings of resentment and anger against British power and name, and they have worked counter to our interests as the years have passed, especially since Mr. Gladstone rallied half the British nation to the Home Rule cause. Things have got better and a gentler feeling has supervened, but still Irishmen overseas have done us much harm in the past. They have been an adverse force in the Colonies. They have more than once unfavourably deflected the policy of the United States and they are now a very serious obstacle to friendship between England and America. We have got along despite all that. We have got along despite a great many things. I speak not only

The Week.

Home Rule.

MR. CHURCHILL arrived on the ground safely in a motor car, which was blocked for some time by large angry crowds, but the police succeeded in extricating it.

The ground was surrounded by infantry, cavalry and police, while other soldiers were stationed in the adjoining streets and fields with their arms piled. Mr. Churchill met with a roaring reception from a gathering of six thousand persons in the marquee, through which rain was pouring, rendering the ground a black bog.

The Nationalists in the vicinity displayed effigies swinging from ropes labelled "Londonderry and Carson, the Turncoats," while in the Orange quarter youths paraded with sticks and banners bearing the inscription "No Home Rule," and also carrying an effigy of Mr. Churchill.

Mr. Churchill, on rising, was received with cheers and the singing of "For he's a jolly good fellow." Sketching the outlines of the Home Rule Bill, he said it would be a measure harmonious with Imperial interests and creditable to its authors. Parliamentary business must be divided between Imperial and National. That was vital in modern communities. A measure applicable to Scotland and Wales was not applicable to Ireland, but the Government's plan would fit in with a general scheme of devolution and ultimate federation. Protestant fears, Mr. Churchill said, were groundless. The Irish Parliament and Senate would fairly represent minorities as well as majorities and safeguards would be provided in that the Crown could refuse to consent to any unjust law. The Imperial to you but to the great audience in all parts of the Empire, to all those who follow the Home Rule cause, either on one side or the other. Only think if we had their aid instead of their enmity, their help instead of their opposition, how much smoother our path, how much quicker our progress, how much brighter our fortunes, what new possibilities would be opened, what old dangers vanish?

There is no final reason for this antagonism between races or countries. The Irish people are by character and tradition attached to monarchical institutions. The idea of the King not only of Great Britain but of Ireland is familiar and grateful to Irish minds. No natural barriers stand between the Irish people and the Throne. Here as elsewhere throughout the Empire the Crown may become the supreme central link of unity. Since his accession the King has travelled widely and reviewed his fleet and armies. He has been to Scotland and Wales and he has journeyed to the vast provinces of the Indian Empire. Many great and famous cities have rendered him allegiance. But it was Dublin, Catholic, Nationalist Dublin, that gave him the warmest welcome of all. It is this that makes me put my first question to earnest and generous minded Unionists in Ulster. Is it really necessary for your safety and welfare that this natural sentiment of Irish loyalty should be repulsed? Must the Empire be made for all time to stand out of all the advantages of reform? Are British Governments to be condemned to maintain a perpetual quarrel with the Irish nation, for it is a nation? Are British Governments to be compelled to govern them only by force as a subjugated race? Are we to be forbidden, on both sides, to achieve the friendship so full of hope and benefit for all? Surely, at the very least, it is incumbent on Ulster Unionists, if they take that view, to offer very grave and substantial reasons to make it clear to the British public and the Colonies, who are also inquiring, that they are not swayed by obstinacy or partisanship and to justify, if they can, with patience and heartsearchings, the attitude which attempts to bar the path at once to Irish hope and Imperial deeds.

For our part, we look forward to the time which has been long retarded but which we believe now to be near, when this island instead of being a disruptive force within the Empire will be transformed into a new centre of union, when the harsh and lamentable cry of reproach, which has so long jarred the concert of the Empire, will die away, when a cursed machinery by which hatred has been manufactured and preserved will be broken for ever, when from every country where our language and institutions are established, hands will be joined across the seas in peace and cordiality. Then, indeed, will be a victory to stand for ever with Trafalgar and Waterloo. Every part of the Empire would join in our rejoicing, every Parliament within its bounds and in the United States would approve and applaud our decision. Self-governing dominions would draw more trustfully towards the motherland, the difficulties of the federation of the Empire would be sensibly diminished by reconciliation between Great Britain and Ireland, and far wider even than the unity of the Empire, the great dream that could be dreamed of good relations between and the ultimate unity of the English-speaking people all over the world will be realised. Why should it not come? Why cannot this great settlement be made? Why cannot we all make friends? We have done it in Canada and South Africa and much perhaps has been accomplished during the last few months in Bengal. Meet the grievance, heal the quarrel, bury the hatchet, link interests, conciliate, consolidate and unify—thus and thus alone shall we be able to surmount the toils and perils which the future may have in store.

How often have we been reminded that a handful of Irishmen fought against us in the Boer War? Have we forgotten the brave Irishmen that never failed in their duty to the Queen and the Army? Why, in these days, when Irish Catholics are assailed with so much ill nature, are they never to be remembered too? I cannot help thinking of scenes, of which I was a witness, when the heights of Tugela were stormed, when Ladysmith was relieved. On the crest of the hill facing the fire of sixty guns, in a veritable whirlwind of exploding shells stood the valiant Boers and up the Boer slopes marched unflinchingly the Dublin and Inniskilling Fusiliers. That was a struggle of heroes ranged by fate to die on opposite sides. What a tragedy, what a cruel pity, that such noble breeds of men should be locked together in hateful carnage! We have made friends with our enemies. Can we not make friends with our comrades too? Can we not win them both and all within the shelter of the great mother Empire, which, for all the disparagement of modern times, still raises her broad shield against every foe that threatens and still keeps open what is perhaps upon the whole the surest road of human progress? That is the Imperial argument. To those whose minds are darkened with bigotry or to those less excusable, whose hearts are rank with faction, these arguments will not appeal but we believe that there are thousands of Protestants in Ulster, as there are tens of thousands of Unionists in England, to whom the Imperial aspect of the Irish question will be at least as important as the discussions about ne temere et propinqua.

Mr. Redmond said he accepted every word of Mr. Churchill's noble speech. When a Parliament was given to Ireland, there would be a clear understanding that the powers were not to be abused, otherwise the Imperial Government would be justified in interfering and bound to do so. He was confident that the Liberals would never become the instrument of the oppression of the Protestants of Ireland (Applause.) It was the duty of Ulster to help to settle the Irish question. In that sense he accepted Lord Randolph Churchill's words: "Ulster will fight and Ulster will be right." Mr. Redmond protested against the arrogant claim of the Unionists to override the will of Ireland, Great Britain and the Empire.

Sir Edward Carson, in a speech from the balcony of Ulster Club, said there was no knowing what would have happened if the meeting had been held in Ulster Hall. The Unionists had cheerfully let Mr. Churchill go to the Nationalist quarter. Sir Edward declared that Belfast's behaviour had shown that Ulster men were orderly and disciplined which had inspired him with courage to fight.

In an interview Mr. Churchill said it was a splendid meeting. The wicked had digged a pit and had fallen into it themselves.

The Liberals offer congratulations on the triumph of the forces of disorder, which they say is a magnificent and unanswerable plea for Home Rule.

The Conservative papers declare that Mr. Churchill came and saw but did not conquer. They criticise what they describe as his failure to give a clear idea of the Bill and declare that he will not succeed any better than did Mr. Gladstone in carrying Home Rule by rhetoric.

The Master of Elibank, speaking at Edinburgh, complained that the Conservatives never attacked Home Rule on its merits. Home Rule, he said, would be a triumph for the principle of democratic government and would give strength to the Empire where there was no weakness. Mr. Donar Law in his speech of 26th January had not said a word to rebuke the Privy Councillors who had ostentatiously organised the rebellion and had declared their intention of preventing the public meeting in Belfast. The attempt to deny the right of free speech was unparalleled for the arrogance and deliberation with which it was made. The Master of Elibank concluded by declaring that the fight for Home Rule was beginning in immensely improved conditions compared with the campaigns of 1886 and 1893.

At a conference of English Nonconformists on the 12th in London to discuss Home Rule, Sir Edward Carson said Home Rule meant the extinction of Protestantism in Ireland. No so-called guarantees could possibly prevent that. He was confident that Nonconformists in England would never desert their co-religionists.

Anglo-German Relations.

LORD HALDANE, who had an audience of the King on Tuesday, left for Berlin on the 7th, his sudden departure occasioning much speculation.

The Daily Mail says the journey is connected with important political business and associates it with the audiences which Sir Edward Grey and Lord Lansdowne had of the King and with the speech of Mr. Lloyd George on the 3rd instant.

Lord Haldane on the 9th lunched with the German Emperor and Empress, sitting next to the Emperor. The Chancellor, Minister for War and Admirals von Tirpitz and Mueller were present.

The Tatliche Rundschau says that important negotiations between Great Britain and Germany are in progress with a view to an Agreement by defining the two countries' spheres of economic and political interest throughout the world. The statement says: "Diplomats are now determining as a preliminary points where British and German interests clash."

Reuter wires from Paris on the 9th:—The newspapers here are much exercised about the visit of Lord Haldane to Berlin. Some fear that a new turn in British policy is about to take place, while others are confident that France will also benefit by any advantageous results which may accrue as a result of the visit.

Reuter wires from Berlin on the 9th:—The population is agog with an unsatisfied curiosity as to the purpose of Lord Haldane's visit. Interest in the opening of the Reichstag is suspended. Lord Haldane's hotel is besieged by journalists who are not content with the explanation that the object of the visit is private. Lord Haldane yesterday lunched with Dr. Von Bethmann Hollweg at the British Embassy. The Daily Chronicle is convinced that the visit, even if it is private, is a step towards an entente.

The Daily Telegraph is authorised by the Foreign Office to state that Lord Haldane as President of the Royal Commission to enquire into University education, has gone to Berlin to enquire specially into scientific education at the Universities, but as he is well known to many of the leading people in Germany he will doubtless have a general conversation on the political relations of the two countries. The Daily Telegraph has reason to believe that exaggerated importance is being attached to Lord Haldane's visit to Berlin, and says that it is not anticipated that any result will follow except the creation of an atmosphere which will be more favourable to the cultivation of more cordial relations.

The Berliner Tageblatt states that Lord Haldane is authorised to inaugurate negotiations for the settlement of Anglo-German frontier questions in Africa and that it is possible that the cession of Walrusch Bay will be discussed.

It says that England has for some time been endeavouring to improve Anglo-German relations. The Kaiser once remarked "The English would take a different view of things if their Ministers would take the trouble to visit us. My friend Haldane is best fitted for the task." The journal adds that this was reported in London and resulted in Lord Haldane's mission.

Reuter wires from Berlin—Lord Haldane dined with the Kaiser on the 8th. Among the guests were the Chancellor, Herr von Kiderlen-Wachter, Professor Harnack and several Generals.

Baron von Stumm, Director of the British Division of the Foreign Office, conferred with Lord Haldane on the 10th.

Reuter wires from Berlin—Lord Haldane lunched with Baron von Stumm on the 10th. He returns to London on the 11th.

Reuter learns that Great Britain has notified France and Russia that if Lord Haldane discusses political questions while in Berlin, the two countries will be kept informed of such discussions.

The Belgian periodical Le Nouvellon Géographique says that the poussiers stated to be proceeding between Britain and Germany relate largely to the island of Timor, half of which belongs to Portugal, and the neighbouring island of Rambang, which belongs entirely to Portugal, but in which Germany is greatly interested, Portugal receiving compensation.

Reuter wires from Berlin on the 11th—Lord Haldane and his brother left here yesterday. There was nobody at the station but a handful of journalists. The private character of the visit was thus emphasised to the end. More speculation has been aroused in German papers by the fact that Sir Ernest Cassel arrived in Berlin by the same train as Lord Haldane and left on Saturday after prolonged conferences with Lord Haldane.

A message to the Daily Mail says the correspondent has official authority for stating that the subject of naval armaments was not discussed by Lord Haldane with his hosts in any form. It was mutually agreed that the subject could not be debated so far as Germany was concerned. Interviewed by a party of journalists, Lord Haldane stated that he had found the friendliest feeling everywhere in Germany.

It is semi-officially stated at Berlin that Lord Haldane came to ascertain whether anything, and if so what, might be done to mitigate the undoubted tension between the two countries. The statement says it is unlikely that any definite agreements have been reached but it is quite certain that the question of armaments was not raised. Indeed, it was impossible to find any formula upon which a serious discussion on the subject might be based. One must wait and see whether the information which Lord Haldane takes back will materialise into tangible proposals in the course of further diplomatic discussions. Anyhow, the statement concludes, Lord Haldane will do a service by dispelling Mr. Churchill's idea that the German navy is a luxury.

Lord Haldane spent a busy day in London on the 13th and had consultations first with Mr. Harcourt and then with Mr. Churchill, who afterwards conferred with Mr. Lloyd-George. He met the Cabinet in Downing Street in the evening.

Mr. Churchill and afterwards Lord Haldane had exceptionally prolonged audiences of the King on the 13th.

British Politics.

THEIR MAJESTIES were given a splendid ovation as they drove in State from Buckingham Palace to Westminster on the 14th to open Parliament. The weather was dull and dry. The usual brilliant scene in the House of Lords was somewhat dimmed by Court mourning. Peeresses wore black, only relieved by white plumes and veils.

In the Speech from the Throne the King said—

"Relations with foreign Powers continue to be friendly. A state of war between Italy and Turkey unfortunately still exists. My Government is ready, whenever a favourable opportunity occurs, to join other Powers in mediation with a view to terminate hostilities.

"The situation in Persia continues to engage the serious attention of my Ministers, who are in constant communication with the Russian Government regarding the Persian Government and the re-establishment of order and tranquillity. Papers will be laid upon the table as soon as possible.

"I trust that the crisis in China will soon be satisfactorily terminated by the establishment of a stable form of Government in conformity with the views of the Chinese people. My Government will continue to observe an attitude of strict non-intervention while taking all necessary steps to protect British life and property. I fully recognise that the leaders on both sides in China have shown every desire to safeguard the lives and interests of foreigners resident in the Empire. Papers on the subject will be laid upon the table.

"I am glad to announce that the Opium Conference has arrived at an agreement."

The speech dwells on the Delhi Durbar, which, it says, furnished an overwhelming proof of the devotion and loyalty of the Princes, Nobles and People, and upon the spontaneous manifestations of affection and loyalty of all classes in Bombay and Calcutta. His Majesty continued: "We were not less moved by the welcome accorded on our return Home and by the sympathy in the personal sorrow which has overtaken my family."

The speech trusts that the transfer of the Capital to Delhi and other changes will promote the prosperity of India.

I view with grave concern, His Majesty continued, the prospect of disputes between employers and workmen and firmly trust that a reasonable spirit will prevail on both sides and avoid developments which would seriously affect the trade of the country and welfare of the people.

The speech in conclusion mentioned forthcoming legislation in connection with Home Rule, Welsh Disestablishment, electoral reform, and certain social and industrial reforms, and a bill to carry out the recommendation of the Imperial conference for the amendment of a consolidation law relating to British Nationality.

Sir Harry Verney moved the address in the Commons, Mr. Gladstone seconding.

In the House of Lords the address was moved by Lord Sheffield and seconded by Lord Furness.

Mr. Bonar Law rejoiced at the success of Their Majesties' visit to India and dealt with the transfer of the Government to Delhi. Mr. Bonar Law considers that the expenditure would be far greater than was estimated. He emphasised the undesirability of displaying to the Indians lack of continuity of policy. There was much to be said for and against the scheme, but the manner in which it had been carried out, he said, was utterly unconstitutional and indefensible.

Mr. Bonar Law said that under three successive Viceroys, the Partition of Bengal had been accepted as a settled fact, first by those approving and then by those disapproving. If it was necessary to reverse the policy then it should have been done when the Government came into office. He did not say the change was not right but there was a deal to be said on either side.

Mr. Asquith endorsed Mr. Bonar Law's note of personal congratulation of Their Majesties. The Government took full responsibility for the Durbar announcements. They did not involve the reversal of the policy of the Partition of Bengal but re-arrangement in the light of experience, which it was believed would increasingly commend itself. With reference to the charge of unconstitutionality, he asked was the House of Commons consulted to reference to the Partition?

In his speech in the House of Lords, Lord Lansdowne said the success of the King's visit to India exceeded all expectations. It was a wonderful achievement and probably unequalled in the history of the Royal House. Their Majesties had faced risks, particularly real in Eastern countries, which were the homes of fanaticism, with an intrepidity commanding admiration and intensifying Their Majesties' welcome home. The idea that the success of the visit was mainly due to the announcement made at Delhi underestimated the effect made on the people of India by Their Majesties' demeanour and personal character.

Lord Lansdowne went on to say, however, that regarding the policy announced at Delhi, the Opposition would have something to say on a future occasion. Referring to the Government of India Bill, His Lordship said that the House would be placed in an embarrassing position if it were told that the sanction of Parliament were necessary to give effect to that policy and simultaneously told that what it was asked to consider was not a proposal but a policy to which His Majesty's word had been irrevocably pledged from the Throne at Delhi.

Lord Crewe paid an eloquent tribute to Their Majesties, the success of whose tour was mainly due to Their Majesties' own devotion, fearlessness, simplicity and accessibility. They thus rendered a service to the Empire. He also dealt with Lord Haldane's visit to Berlin and with Mr. Asquith's statement.

Lord Crewe said that the King's visit to India was an unalloyed triumph from his landing to his departure. Every one recognised what thanks were due to the Viceroy for the part he took in the preparation for Their Majesties' welcome, to the Durbar Committee and to those in Bombay and Calcutta for the endless pains they took to devise the means of welcoming Their Majesties. "I must also say," Lord Crewe continued, "how much of the success of the visit was due to Their Majesties themselves. Their entire forgetfulness of everything except the performance of their Statutory duties, many involving much physical fatigue, their complete accessibility to all sorts of people in India and, most of all, perhaps the air of fearless and unaffected enjoyment with which they entered into the popular side of the pageant of which they were the chief figures, all contributed more than anything to the marvellous success of the visit. Without in any way impairing that tremendous feeling of awe and reverence, they created about themselves an atmosphere of simple human fearlessness and simplicity and thus rendered a service to the Empire which could have been performed by none of their subjects however distinguished. He believed that the effect on India was no transient one but one which with the love and admiration which Their Majesties had inspired would sink deep into the hearts of the Indian people.

As regards the administrative changes Lord Crewe thought it better to wait and treat the matter as a whole at an early day when there would be an opportunity to discuss them in all their bearings.

Mr. Bonar Law paid a tribute to Mr. Chamberlain's recent speech on the Navy and said that if the same spirit animated his policy, then he could rely on the support of the Unionists. Mr. Bonar Law was of opinion that the insurance scheme would never be carried out and retorted to an interpolation from Mr. Asquith by declaring that the Unionists were prepared to repeal the Insurance Bill. Mr. Bonar Law combated Home Rule and further made a pointed reference to Lord Haldane's "mysterious" mission.

Mr. Asquith said Mr. Bonar Law in referring to Lord Haldane's visit to Germany has used the expression "limelight." As a rule, the charge against Government, and particularly against Sir Edward Grey, had been that of furtiveness and secrecy and of subterranean diplomacy. It was rather a relief to find that the Government was carrying on diplomatic proceedings in the "limelight." This, however, was a most serious matter, and he desired to use the language of seriousness as well as of hope regarding it.

Mr. Asquith said it was undoubtedly a most lamentable fact that the traditional feelings of Anglo-German friendship and good will had been seriously overclouded for the last few months. When the atmosphere of suspicion was once created, fiction readily displaced facts and legends, which at other times had been dismissed as incredible, were accepted and widely believed. He had been told, for instance, that there were masses of people in Germany who firmly believed that at some time in summer or autumn Great Britain had meditated and had even prepared an attack on Germany. Also that Great Britain's armaments had been carefully calculated with that object in view.

He was almost ashamed to have to contradict so wild and extravagant a fiction. (Cheers.) It was pure invention. There was not a shadow of foundation for it nor was there anything anywhere at any time of an aggressive or provocative character in the movement of the fleets. The very fact, however, that such rumours could find credence in the minds of many intelligent and fair-minded people was surely in itself a significant and most regrettable symptom.

Both the British and German Governments had been and were animated by a sincere desire to bring about a better state of understanding, and in the course of the last month Government had indications that the visit of a Minister to Berlin would not only not be unwelcome (Cheers) but might facilitate the attainment of the common object. Lord Haldane was in any case going sooner or later to Germany on business in connection with the London University Commission. In the circumstances, they thought it well that Lord Haldane should hasten his visit and take advantage of the suggestion of friendly confidential communication with those controlling and guiding German policy.

That involved on both sides a departure from conventional methods, but on both sides it was felt that the frankness of statement and communication would be easier if, in the first instance, it was a question of informal, non-committal conversation rather than full-dress diplomatic negotiations. (Cheers.) Those expectations had been completely realised. There was perfect freedom of statement and frankness of explanation over a wide area of discussion. The very fact of such an interchange of views under such conditions ought in itself to dispel suspicion wherever it still prevailed, that Government contemplated aggressive designs, but he was happy to say that that itself was a great gain.

He earnestly hoped, however, that he might go further and say he genuinely believed that the conversations might have more than this negative result. He could not at this stage make any predictions or enter into matters in detail, but he would say this, that in the course of Lord Haldane's visit there was unmistakable evidence of a sincere and resolute desire on both sides for the establishment of a better Anglo-German feeling without either side in any way sacrificing or impairing the special relationships in which each stood to other Powers. (Cheers.) It was in that spirit and in the fresh light that this interchange of views afforded that both Governments were now engaged in a careful survey of practical possibilities. (Cheers.) He heartily endorsed Mr. Bonar Law's remark that in matters of that kind they must possess and exercise the virtue of patience. (Cheers.)

The House of Lords has voted the address.

Lord Lansdowne urged caution in regard to any mediation in the Turko-Italian hostilities. Lord Lansdowne declared that in the efforts to dispel misunderstanding, such as had recently brought us to the eve of a serious quarrel, Government would have the Opposition's support. If Lord Haldane had succeeded in contributing to such an end and had been able to take anything in the nature of an olive branch the Opposition would congratulate him heartily as a friend. Lord Lansdowne, in conclusion, described the programme outlined in the speeches as preposterous.

It is officially stated that an Opposition amendment to the address will be moved on the 19th instant. It amounts to a censure on the Government for proceeding to legislation upon great constitutional questions before carrying out the pledges for the reform of the House of Lords. A member of the back bench will move a tariff amendment, which will be supported by Mr. Bonar Law and his colleagues if there is opportunity for discussion.

In the House of Commons, the debate on the address unexpectedly collapsed following upon a heated passage-at-arms between Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bonar Law, culminating in Mr. Asquith's indignant repudiation of charges of corruption. He said that these were the most serious that could be brought against a democratic Government and Mr. Bonar Law was bound to prosecute them on the floor of the House. Mr. Asquith challenged the Opposition to move an amendment to the address. A long pause ensued, broken by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald moving an adjournment.

There was an excited scene in the lobbies, the discussion chiefly centring round Mr. Bonar Law's attitude to the Insurance Act. His undertaking to repeal it evoked tumultuous cheers from the Liberal benches, which Mr. Asquith emphasised, dramatically exclaiming, "Now we know that to repeal the Insurance Act is the first plank in the platform of New Tory Leader."

Mr. Bonar Law's letter of explanation is described by the Liberals as a case of second thoughts and an attempt to remedy a big blunder.

The Unionist papers deny that the collapse of the debate was due to consternation of the Unionists at the result of the Leader's statement on the Insurance Act. They declare that Unionists were waiting for Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to move the Labour amendment. Moreover, they say, Bonar Law's attitude was in accordance with Mr. Forster's amendment to the Insurance Bill in December.

Mr. Bonar Law has written to the Press explaining that his statement that he was ready to repeal the Insurance Act meant that if there were an opportunity of dealing with it immediately. Once the Act was in operation, it would only be dealt with by means of drastic amendments.

In the House of Commons on the 15th, Mr. Asquith announced that he hoped the Budget would be introduced before Easter.

Lord Crewe will introduce the Government of India Bill at the earliest possible date and Lord Curzon will initiate a general discussion on the changes announced at Delhi next Wednesday.

Dealing with China, Lord Crewe paid a tribute to Sir John Jordan, British Minister, who, he said, throughout the difficult times had shown tact and ability of which it was impossible to speak too highly.

China

RUSSIA wires from Peking on the 13th.—It appears that the recent Edicts were arranged by Yuan-Shi-Kai. They are regarded as a wonderful compromise and have caused profound relief to every one. It is hoped that their contents will satisfy all parties.

The Edict accepting the Republic says: "It is evident that the majority of people are in favour of a Republic, and from preference of the people's hearts and will is heaven discernible. How could we oppose the desires of millions for the glory of one family? Therefore the Dowager-Empress and Emperor vest their sovereignty in the people and order Yuan-Shi-Kai to confer with the Republicans on the methods of forming a great Republic which will unite Manchus and Chinese, Mongols, Muhammaans and Tibetans."

REUTER wires from Nanking on the 13th.—The Republicans insist on the capital being Nanking. Their constitution proposed follows the lines of the American model, except that the President and the Vice-President will be elected by Congress. It provides religious freedom and establishment of conscription.

REUTER wires from Wei-Hai-Wei on the 14th.—That there has been a local insurrection in the neutral territory of Wenteng. It is anti-revolutionary in character. Hundreds are being tortured and killed. Chinese without queues are especially liable to slaughter. Marines from the cruiser Kent are guarding the British boundary pending the arrival of the Inniskillings.

Yuan-Shi-Kai having issued a manifesto announcing his appointment as organiser of the Republic, Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen has telegraphed refusing to recognise the appointment of the Throne and asking Yuan-Shi-Kai to come to Nanking immediately or send a plenipotentiary.

Reuter wires from Tokio on the 14th.—The Chinese revolutionaries have ignored the protest of the Japanese Governor-General of Kwantung against the violation of the neutrality of the Peninsula and a regiment of Infantry has been despatched from Port Arthur to enforce neutrality.

New Governor of Madras.

Official information has reached the Governor-General Lord Pentland has been appointed to that succeed Lord Carmichael as Governor of Madras. The date of his arrival in India will no doubt depend to some extent upon that of the passing of the Bill in Parliament dealing with the administrative changes announced at Delhi, but it may be taken as probable that he will reach India in April.

New L.G. of the United Provinces.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING-EMPEROR has been pleased to approve of the appointment of the Hon Sir James Meston, K C S. I., Secretary to the Government of India, in the Finance Department, to be Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces in succession to the Hon Sir John Hewitt, G C S. I., when the latter retires in July next.

Morocco.

REUTER wires from Paris on the 11th.—The Senate has ratified the Franco-German Treaty by 212 votes to 42.

M. Poincaré, Prime Minister, made the vote a question of confidence in the Government. He said the Treaty was not perfect, but that its ratification was urgent. Its rejection would weaken the prestige of France and do hurt to her alliances, and would especially greatly surprise England, which had greeted the conclusion of the Treaty with marked satisfaction.

M. Clemenceau denounced the Treaty, which he said was concluded "under the guns at Agadir."

Sir Edward Grey.

SIR EDWARD GREY has been appointed a Knight of the Garter. The papers point out that the honour conferred on Sir Edward Grey is a signal mark of Royal confidence, he being the first commoner to be so honoured since Sir Robert Walpole.

TETE À TETE

WE owe to some of our readers an apology and a confession. We were painfully conscious of it, even before some of them mentioned it to us most courteously and after quite a complimentary preface, that during the last few months the Comrade has lost a good deal of its variety. Of course, we never guaranteed that its readers would find in the columns of the Comrade a variety of entertainment, but we had certainly intended to sugarcoat its bitter pills and interlard its thick chunks of dry bread with the help of its purely hedonistic and irresponsible adjunct, Gup. And this intention we have not been able to carry out quite as consistently as we had hoped and still devoutly wish to do. But we are such hardened sinners that we are loth to plead guilty even to the soft impeachment of those who may not unreasonably have been expected to provide for us a dies iræ after our recent outspokenness as our no less outspoken contemporary, the Empire, puts it. Italy has sins enough to answer for, and the Russians are not only deeply in the debt of French money lenders, but have run up a long account in the Hereafter also, which the expulsion of the American Jews cannot wholly wipe away. But if it is a sin to be a kill-joy to thousands of people who have never hurt Italy and who have called the Russians bad names only because all loyal subjects were hitherto expected to do that, then we say that in another and a hotter world, both Italy and Russia would get as warm a reception as the late lamentable capital of India is giving just now to those whose only sin is that they cannot call Delhi a charnel and are not afraid of the serpents in the new Eden of Imperialism. We would not quarrel with such of our readers as have a grievance against us, but we shall only ask them a simple question: "Man to man, can you expect us to chatter and crack jokes, when not so very far away the chatter of rifles and the crack of guns is attuned in a very different key? Can you think that we are capable of rattling off simple provoking pleasantries when the electro-magnetic ear of human sympathy can distinctly hear the death-rattle of that rare being, a twentieth century martyr? Can we be lively when an ancient kingdom is gasping for breath before life is extinct for ever? So much for ourselves, but what of you? Is it nothing to all ye that pass by?" It is sad that a man broken down in spirit and totally shattered in health sought relief from a doctor, who prescribed for the morose patient, an hour or two at a theatre where Crimaldi was splitting with his humour the sides of his hearers. It is related that the unfortunate patient turned round to his physician and quietly announced, "I am Crimaldi." We must confess at once that we are not such consummate actors ourselves. Such a mime is beyond our powers. We cannot even jest and frolic an hour upon the stage when we are so sick at heart, and if our readers cannot share our sorrow they may at least bear a little longer with us. The speech of Mr. Asquith about Persia and the advice of Lord Lansdowne that intervention in Tripoli should not rashly be attempted, give us hope that it will not be for long that we shall suffer this sorrow. After all, which we may very, very freely render as, "Long live the Comrade and long live its liveness!"

IT WAS only a few months ago that we welcomed the appointment of Lord Carmichael as the Governor of Madras, and now comes news of the appointment of his successor Lord Cumichael seems to have won golden opinions everywhere in Madras, so much so that there was some protest that Madras should not be robbed of her new Governor. But we are sure that the good people of Madras would recognise that the task of ruling a re-united Bengal calls for exceptional talent and they would not grudge the gain of

A New Satrap.

Bengal even if it entails some loss to Madras. But the Southern Presidency is not in the least likely to lose. In Baron Pentland they will not get a mere limb of the British aristocracy, disposed to regard his tenure of office as a lengthened picnic, and with little beyond his good breeding to recommend him. Lord Pentland ought to be an educationist, being Vice-President of the Committee on Scottish education. He has also had considerable experience of administration, having been Secretary for Scotland since 1905. What is more, he has been a follower of Lord Rosebery in the matter of recognising his civic no less than his political duties, for he has been for three years a London County Councillor also. Speaking only the other day at Edinburgh, Lord Rosebery had said that any reflecting mind could point out the enormous advantage that there was in local service, where one could live at home and enjoy one's own neighbourhood and the company of one's own lifelong friends in working for results which one saw immediately fulfilled all around one, as compared with political service, which occupied one in a close and often intolerable metropolis, co-operating nominally with many with whom one politically differed, for purposes which one was not always likely to see realized in one's lifetime, and which it was not always certain that one particularly wished to see fulfilled. That he should put comprehensively as the difference between local public service and political service. There were daring and ambitious spirits wishing to mix in the turmoil of the world and raise themselves high above the common herd who would always prefer the last, but the tranquil and contented philosopher would always prefer the first. Only, local service in Lord Pentland's case did occupy him "in a close and often intolerable metropolis"—which, by the way, makes that service all the more creditable to him—and he would have to plead guilty to the charge of being among the "daring ambitious spirits wishing to mix in the turmoil of the world," for in spite of having been unsuccessful in seeking a seat in Parliament in 1886—after which the pursuit of "the tranquil and contented philosopher" attracted him—he sought it successfully in 1892, when he seems to have left the London County Councilorship. For three years he served as Member for Dumfriesshire, and when unseated, he went to Canada as Secretary to the Governor-General for two years, returning after this fresh experience to mix once more in the same "turmoil," and compete successfully for a seat in Parliament, which he held for 12 years as Member for Fife and Perth. While we agree with Lord Rosebery in the praise of local service, and would commend it to the favour of our own educated countrymen who are not disposed to rub shoulders with a class of people that now seem to monopolise civic offices, and to "ride off" the official Chairman—that supremely apocryphal though often very efficient mandarin of the Municipal and District Boards—we must say we rejoice to find that Lord Pentland's experience is not confined to City lamps and sewage, and that he has not remained the contented and tranquil philosopher of Lord Rosebery's idyll. India owes much thanks to the Liberal Ministry that has refused to insult it with sending out amiable nonentities to be its Governors, and though neither Lord Pentland nor Lord Carmichael is the first M.P. to be sent out to rule in India, two such appointments coming so close to each other indicate that the Liberal Government realises that representative institutions must become increasingly important in India, and that it is necessary to send out Governors who are used to "the turmoil of the world," and are not likely to be shocked and have a fit of "blues" the moment there is any strong criticism of Government measures. Parliamentary life may not make a man wiser, but it certainly thickens his cuticle, and that is no small gain in practical politics.

It is no exaggeration to say that the news of Sir James Meston's appointment as the Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces, which had long been wished for and, in view of some keen competition, awaited with much interest, was received with great relief followed by a good deal of rejoicing. We all know how well he is spoken of by his appreciative and liberal-minded chief, the Hon'ble Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson, and everywhere in official circles he is regarded as an ideal Civilian. But what is still more satisfactory, he is universally admired by the non-official members of the Legislative Council, whom he has not only treated with the utmost courtesy but also unsparingly assisted. With a simplicity of character and charm of manner he combines great business shrewdness, and few know how strenuously he has been working. Sir James has been for the greater part of his official career in the Secretariat. But the people of Rohilkhand have not forgotten the unassuming, urbane "Junt" who was known as "Mishton Sahib," and when he is rid of the cartload of files through which a Secretary has to go, he will find himself in the midst of friends who would not need so ardent a courting, nor be so exacting in their demands as those blue devils, the files and despatch boxes labelled "Immediate." But habits once formed are not easily changed, and Sir James's application and industry would only be directed into a new and more human channel. That he will succeed appears as obvious as anything which can best be judged five years later, for apart from his experience in the United Provinces, he has widened his knowledge and sympathies in South Africa, where he successfully laid the foundation of a re-organization of its Civil Service, a task in which a Civilian successor of his, who is himself a Colonial, proved anything but a success. But one thing is certain. The finances of the United Provinces would feel the hand of an expert in finance, and though, like Sir Edward Baker, he may sigh for the lost opportunity of making a more liberal Provincial Settlement for the Province over which he is soon after made to rule, the bloated figures of all spending departments which show reckless expenditure would be dispensed a liberal dose of financial Antipon. But we do wish Sir James may follow the example of Sir Edward, and be equally successful in getting a larger allotment. It is sheer cruelty to a Province which is admittedly backward in education to make it the only exception to the general rule of a four-eighths allotment of Land Revenue. Provincial satraps who have had to fix the Provincial Settlements of their satrapies as Member or Secretary in the Finance Department are, no less than non-officials who join the Government by direct recruitment, in the position of well-meaning ladies with a past. The words and deeds of other days come home to roost, and we fear before very long Sir James Meston's Provincial Settlement would come "to plague the inventor." But for our part, we promise to let him off very lightly if he comes to beg where once he could have commanded.

قسم لو ہم سے کر یہہ ہی کہیں کہوں ہم نہ کہتے تھے
(Take our oath for it if ever we say, "Did we not tell you so!")

It is with great relief that we read the following in our Hare Street contemporary—A representative of the Englishman called upon the Finance Minister yesterday with regard to the strong rumour alluded to by the Statesman that he intended to shortly retire on the ground of ill-health. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson in reply to queries said "I have read the statement to which you allude, and which appears in to-day's Statesman with considerable surprise. Perhaps the marked and uniform courtesy which the English and Indian Press in India has accorded me has spoilt me, but I must say that I think it would have been only courteous of the editor of the Statesman if he had done me the honour to ask me whether there was any foundation for what he calls a 'strong rumour' in regard to myself, before giving prominent publicity to it. The rumour is devoid of all foundation. It is my present intention to complete my term of office in India and to continue to do my best to serve a country and a people to whom I have become deeply attached." It is not only that Sir Guy has become deeply attached to the people of this country, for they claim—and we vouch for the truth thereof—that they have become equally attached to Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson. It will indeed be a sad day when the time comes for him to depart from India, and we have no wish to hasten the sadness of farewell.

Our opinions on the subject of the proposed Dacca University have been hailed by some who seldom agreed with us with such evident jubilation, and read by others who so frequently received approvingly our views on public affairs.

with such painful surprise that we confess we would have seriously begun to think we had said something particularly foolish. But, although we had taken care to explain that under the peculiar circumstances—which were not of our creation—our examination of the Government announcement could only be cursory and would be far from exhaustive, our views were not formed equally hastily, nor, we may now confess, under the stress of even such excitement as the circumstances in which the Government announced its intentions. In the first place, we must explain that our leading articles in the last two issues have not been directed against the proposed University as such, but against its being debited to the long-suffering Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal. In the second place, we must say that we are not without our misgivings that the University at Dacca may help to cut off the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal from the Moslem University, and to choke the channel of Eastern Bengal charity running in the direction of Aligarh after watering the withering crops of that region itself. Aligarh must remain the core of Moslem India and blood must flow to the heart of Islam through the arteries before it can flow back to the various limbs.

(Clouds must pour themselves on the desert. What boots it if they pour on the sea?) It is true that Eastern Bengal, with all its superfluous moisture, is still a howling wilderness in the matter of education and educational endowments, and that it must pour all it can into itself. But the child of to-day hopes to be the adult of to-morrow, and who knows that when education has once fitted the millions of Bengal to take their proper place in the life of the land, they may not rescue Aligarh if need be, even from insolvency, and play the part of the Roman daughter that suckled her own aged sire. All that matters is the recognition of the relationship, and His Excellency will do a service not only to the Mussalmans but to the Government itself if he takes an early opportunity of making it clear to the Constitution Committee of the Moslem University that Aligarh shall have power to affiliate other institutions of like nature, if conducted on the residential lines of Aligarh and in the estimation of the Chancellor qualified to rank as its branches. We understand that the Secretary of State for India has already communicated in a general way his opinion on the Moslem University Constitution, and there should be no difficulty in arresting further uneasiness in Moslem circles. We may also add that little encouragement was given by officials in Eastern Bengal to the Moslem University scheme, and since the Government of India issued a Press communiqué prohibiting official participation in meetings called in aid of the project, an impression unfortunately prevails that Government does not very much favour it. We think we can say that whatever particular Local Governments may think, this impression is extremely unjust to the Government of India. All the same it is there, and its being a mistaken impression makes it all the more necessary that Government should speedily correct it by introducing the Moslem University Bill at an early date, and in the meantime announcing that Government officials could even collect funds for this purpose outside their official jurisdiction. The third important consideration is that although the creation of a teaching University at the very doors of the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal is bound to lessen the value of another teaching University at Aligarh, that is no reason why those who advocate the latter should come in the way of the former. For our part, we wish every University in India was a teaching University, and if the creation of fresh Universities means more education or better education, we shall continue to accord them a warm and a cordial welcome. In the next place, we have already admitted our readiness to admit that the people of Eastern Bengal would receive greater consideration for their special requirements than they have been doing at Calcutta. If Job Charnock could know how this swampy hamlet has acted as the breeding ground of a class of people that are always bent on reducing the vitality of others to the lowest ebb, we have no doubt he would, to some slight extent at least, regret his creation. We are far from ignoring the many aspects of Calcutta that endear it to people and that have made it one of the greatest cities of the British Empire. But it has acted as a Uias tree for all undergrowth, and the figures which His Excellency the Viceroy quoted in his reply to the Anti-Partitionists Ridwan are convincing proof that education would prosper in Eastern Bengal much more if that region was not left to the tender mercies of Calcutta. To-day there are 2,500 College students in Eastern Bengal and Assam as against some 1,700 in 1906, and the annual expenditure on higher education is now much more than 3½ lakhs as compared with a little over a lakh and a half five years ago. Not a single aided College existed when Bengal was partitioned, but when it is re-united it has four such Colleges. Here we may say that a new University does not necessarily mean more Colleges, more scholars, more scholarships and more expenditure. In India we must dissociate from our minds the idea that a University is the chief instrument of promoting higher education. All that the University used to do here was to fix the curricula of studies and to examine candidates in the courses fixed by itself. Since the passing of the Universities Act, the Universities have also begun to send out inspectors to see whether proper provision is also made or not for imparting instruction to its would-be examinees in the courses it has fixed. The promotion of higher as of other education is mainly in the hands of the head of a Government Department, known as the Director of Public Instruction, who is now a subordinate of the Honourable Member of Education also. The creation of another University in India on the same lines would no doubt create hopes of an improvement in the management of examinations when fewer persons are to be examined than before, and it would also raise expectations that in fixing the curricula more attention would be paid to the wishes of the people living in the area to be served by the new University. As for the inspection of Colleges, Government institutions were never likely to arrest the critical gaze of these gentlemen, but it is quite likely that more efficiency would be demanded from aided and unaided private Colleges than before, if not also a hide-bound uniformity. So far as the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal are concerned, the only special benefit that would accrue to them from a University at Dacca—judged merely according to the announcement of His Excellency a fortnight ago—would be an alteration in the Arabic and Persian courses in accordance with their wishes. But, as the Calcutta deputation of yesterday suggested, this could have been done by the exercise of the powers of nomination of Fellows possessed by the Government. Only, the Calcutta gentlemen forget that the new University is a compliment to their prowess, for Governments in these days have a knack of bowing low before the blast of agitators, and the University at Dacca is hoped to be more sheltered from such storms than the one in Calcutta. There is therefore no reason to refuse the University at Dacca, even though a sixth University of the type of the existing five can do little by itself, and although it cannot in any way be accepted as a compensation to the Mussalmans of that sequestered, still-vexed region. This latter point has been made conspicuous by the absence in the resolution of the Eastern Bengal Moslem League of anything indicating that the Mussalmans regard it as a special boon to themselves, and we trust that they will not be asked to give the Government a receipt in full settlement of their account.

A MORE hopeful promise made by H. E. the Viceroy at Dacca was that a special officer would be kept for supervising education in Eastern Bengal and Assam. If that officer is to have the independent powers of a Director, the evil effect of the revocation of the Partition is likely to be felt as little as possible in the matter of education. Apart from the framing of educational courses and schemes with reference to local conditions, the rise in the number of pupils from some seven lakhs to about nine and a half lakhs, the increase of expenditure from provincial revenues from eleven lakhs to twenty-two lakhs and from local sources from about half a crore to about three quarters of crore, show a remarkably rapid rate of progress, and when we consider that private institutions had the grants-in-aid raised from 1½ to 3¼ lakhs, we have reason to declare that the Partition was a blessing to the whole of the new Province which is now to be re-united to the old. The annulment of the Partition endangers this progress, but the least that could be done for Eastern Bengal was to retrain its separate Director. In fact, we think it a great mistake not to have mentioned these figures and given these assurances in the Despatch of the 25th August last which the Government of India sent to the Secretary of State. That would have prevented much uneasiness and many misgivings. But even this is no adequate compensation to the Mussalmans for the loss of their majority. An officer specially held responsible for Eastern Bengal education would have to devote special attention to the education of the Mussalmans there, for the number of Hindu pupils cannot indefinitely be increased, and if an increase has to be shown as an indication of administrative success, the condition of the Mussalmans must be improved. To that extent the Mussalman must indirectly benefit, and it is hard to reconcile a desire to benefit the Mussalmans educationally with the outcry of the Calcutta Deputation that "there would be a general feeling that the heavy sacrifices which Bengal had to make (An enumeration thereof would be an interesting disclosure) for the revocation of the Partition have been unavailing in putting an end to the evils which it had brought into existence." If the evils which the Partition had brought into existence have been increased of 35 per cent. in the number of pupils in schools and 50 per cent. in the colleges, of cent. per cent. in the expenditure on schools from provincial, and 50 per cent. from local sources, of about 150 per cent. in the expenditure on colleges and last, but not least, of 150 per cent. in the grants-in-aid to private institutions, then the patients in Eastern Bengal would not wish to be cured, and healthy people in other parts of India would wish they had half the Blassamese disease. So far as the Mussalmans are concerned, the Government have not explained what they intend to do to meet their special requirements, and Lord Hardinge still seems to leave their case to Lord Carmichael. But one good thing which the fear of a University at Dacca has done is to make the Calcutta gentlemen commit themselves to the doctrine that "the whole province would welcome the grant of special facilities for the spread of education among Muhammadans in the shape of endowments and a more liberal award of scholarships." We hope the Government would take these gentlemen at their word, and do justice to claims of Moslem education both in Western Bengal and Eastern Bengal, and reform, enlarge and endow more liberally the Madrasas at Calcutta, Hooghly, Dacca, and Chittagong. We understand that special allotments for Moslem Education are under contemplation, and when that project materializes, we hope the "growing and visible desire among the Hindu and Moslem populations to live in the old and long standing relations of mutual amity and concord which recent events had tended to upset" would bear the strain of promised Moslem emancipation. We are, however, confident that if the Mussalmans do get such a "boon," they would not only rain but pour their thanks on the Government of India. Hitherto the Government have kept their projects, the best even more than the worst, in the purdah, and when a veiled lady chooses to disclose no more than her henna-tinted finger tips, in the East at least she does not expect to hear rapturous odds on the surpassing loveliness of her carefully muffled face.

WE DESIRE to give prominence to the following letter which the Right Hon'ble Mr. Syed Ameer Ali had addressed on the 11th January to the Pioneer, and which appears in that journal a month later, not only without any expression of contrition but also without any comment:—"My attention has been drawn to an article in the issue of the Pioneer of the 7th December last in which you comment on the views I expressed on the Persian crisis to a representative of The Manchester Guardian. Within certain limits imposed by the law of libel it is open to every newspaper to place its own interpretation on any man's words according to its bent. But even within those limits it is not justified, by the ordinary canons of fair play, to import into them meanings or motives which are utterly baseless. It would now serve no useful purpose to deal with the subject matter of your criticism. I cannot, however, allow it to pass altogether unchallenged, for I consider any publicist seeking by veiled threats or insinuations to deter fellow-subjects from calling attention to the public interest to important considerations is doing a positive disservice to the Empire. Fortunately the intolerant view that only a certain class among His Majesty's subjects is entitled to express opinions on questions of policy affecting the Moslem peoples is not shared by responsible statesmen. So far as I am concerned I feel it my duty to express freely what I know or believe to be to the benefit of the Empire. From this duty I shall not be turned aside either by hope of favour or fear of reproach." We had ourselves written on the subject of the Pioneer's mischievous note in our issue of the 9th December and need say no more about the matter at present. All reasonable men would appreciate Mr. Ameer Ali's point of view and admire the dignified and extremely moderate tone of his letter. In the first place, we must all fight against, and give no quarter to the strange though not unfamiliar doctrine that none but white men have any business to express an opinion on the foreign policy of the Empire to which their attachment is sought, and in the next place, we should expose the conscious fallacy that friendly warnings of danger are hostile threats of revolt. If a Government does not care to hear even friendly warnings, its days must indeed be numbered, and if warnings can only be conveyed in the cool penetralia of official residences, all newspapers at least must shut up shop. Every paper cannot afford to keep a seasoned editor posted in Calcutta and Simla ante-chambers of the great, and some still regard such tactics as below the dignity of journalism.

MR. ASQUITH in the recent debate in the House of Commons while explaining the Government policy in Persia, said that "a not inconsiderable number of Russian troops had already been withdrawn. The Government was given to understand that the withdrawal of the whole was not only contemplated but was in process of being carried out." We are sure the words of the Premier will be received with much satisfaction by all those anxious for the free and ordered development of Persia. Even from the Russian standpoint there exists no plausible pretext for the continued occupation of the Northern provinces. In spite of the massacres and indiscriminate murders, and the wanton and aggressive assaults committed by a brutal soldiery on the life, honour and liberty of civil population, there has been absolute peace and quiet and the people appear to have comported themselves with marvellous self-restraint under such great provocation. There is, therefore, no disorder to be prevented, and we hope the British Government has really strong reasons to believe that the Persian territory will be completely evacuated. But will evacuation leave no trace behind? Will Persia be what she was before? For it there can now be no return to the status quo. With Persia still dependent and not in the actual possession of her sovereign rights, evacuation would mean simply the removal of an outward symbol of foreign domination, while the liberty and independence of the Persian Government has been inwardly fettered and maimed. The Majlis was unceremoniously dismissed by the Regent at the bidding of the Russian Minister at Teheran. We do not know whether the Constitution for which the people fought so long and at so great a sacrifice and which they had won from selfish despots bent on selling their country to the highest bidder in the international market, has also become a dead letter and ceased to be with the Majlis. British Ministers, in addition to the Times, have more than once hinted at the creation of a "stable" Government for Persia. We have so far failed to understand what constitutes the element of stability in these structural processes. Perhaps the British and Russian representatives at Teheran may be called upon to assume new advisory roles, and the Persian Government may be obliged to take their "advice" in all matters of importance. If this is what is meant by stability, if the Persian Government is to be deprived of its sovereignty and made to depend for its existence on foreign advice, if the Persian constitution is to be destroyed and the Majlis to be suppressed as an unlawful and seditious body, surely no Liberal statesman of England can congratulate himself on the Foreign policy of the Government and on Sir Edward Grey's handiwork. The ex-Shah, Mohamed Ali is still hovering on the flanks of the Russian army of occupation. His agents are fraternising freely with the Russian officers. What is even more significant, Samad Khan, the reactionary rebel and outlaw and a follower of Mohamed Ali, has been appointed by the Russians as the Governor of Tabriz. Russia holds Mohamed Ali, that cowardly and nerveless tyrant, and traitor to his religion and his country, as a trump card up her sleeve, and though she cannot use him as freely as she would owing to the decisive British declaration not to recognize Mohamed Ali on any account, she is still employing him and his agents in creating the necessary atmosphere for the growth and execution of her designs. It has even been seriously proposed to the Persian Government to renew the pension which Mohamed Ali has forfeited by his ridiculous attempts to overthrow the constitutional régime. By the terms of the Protocol of 1909, England and Russia were jointly responsible for the actions of Mohamed Ali, and it was more particularly the duty of Russia to maintain a firm hold over his movements and keep him in safe custody. He has lost all claims to the pension by the miscarriage of his ill-planned coup and he alone must bear the consequences. We trust the proposed loan of £200,000 is not to be spent in pensions of all the traitors, rebels and outlaws in the entourage of Mohamed Ali, whose lives would not be worth an hour's purchase if they left the shelter of the Russian camps and Consulates. We do not know what conditions have been imposed upon the Persian Government as a result of the loan, nor do we know of the guarantees that have been demanded. Let us hope the conditions and the guarantees do not infringe Persian sovereignty or limit her freedom of action. By the terms of this loan, the Indian Government will henceforth enter into a more active participation in the affairs of Persia. We have had to criticise the Persian policy of the British Government in no uncertain language; but it would be a bare justice to acknowledge the moderation and self-restraint that has of late characterised British action in Persia. Much of this is due, we believe, to the suggestions and representations of the Indian Government. We trust the Government of India, which has more direct and ample knowledge of the many factors that govern their Persian situation, will try to solve it with foresight, moderation and sympathy. We avoided the mention of the Indian Government in this connection before now for we did not like to involve the Government by law established in British India in the feelings that might have been stirred by any untoward result of Sir Edward Grey's policy. That consideration still exists, but now that the Indian Government's direct participation is proclaimed, we think it only right that the Mussalmans of India should thank Lord Hardinge's Government for so warmly advocating a consideration for their feelings.

BY THE death of Shaikh Ghulam Mohamed Sahab, the Proprietor and Editor of the Vakil, the well-known Urdu bi-weekly of Amritsar, journalism, the Moslem community and the country are alike poorer to day of a singularly rich, upright and fascinating personality. He was one of those who live not for themselves but for faith, ideas, for great and noble causes. Devotion to some overmastering purpose was the need of his ardent temperament. To try to raise as far as he could, his community in the intellectual and moral plane became early for him the master-purpose of life. He chose journalism as his instrument, and though the instrument is far from ideal and has some times driven to despair even men of most steady gaze and nerve of steel, he somehow managed to apply it to his task with patient energy and undiminished vigour of conviction. He was one of the very few Indians of capacity and patriotism who have raised journalism to a vocation. In the grind of petty affairs from day to day in going through the trivial task and the common round as an editor, he was never once adrift of his moorings. This is perhaps saying a good deal when we know that far more pretentious journals are fond of beginning life anew every day. That is why the public trusted him so freely and his opinion carried such a weight in the counsels of the Moslem community. The Vakil has represented the best type of Urdu journalism. Its views have always been broad, wise and dignified. It has exercised an intellectual tolerance and comprehension which is rare even amongst the better class of English journalism in this country. The paper has borne the impress of its editor and has a distinct individuality. We hope it will continue to do the great work it has been doing even after the death of its founder. The disappearance of the Vakil would be a great loss to Urdu journalism and to the Moslem community. Shaikh Ghulam Mohamed Sahab was a man of manifold activities. Amongst other things he had started a trading agency for the promotion and encouragement of Moslem literature and history. Some of the religious, literary and historical tracts for popular instruction and culture issued by the Vakil Agency have had great vogue and success. Shaikh Ghulam Mohamed Sahab was a very simple, unassuming and unpretentious man. His transparent honesty of purpose and earnestness impressed all those who came into contact with him. He had a horror of cliques and factions and always held aloof from the dust and fray of party warfare. Men of his stamp are not many in India. Amongst the Mussalmans they are positively rare. We are sorry for the community and offer our sincere and heartfelt condolences to the bereaved family.

WE ARE asked to state that the All-India Moslem League will hold its annual sessions at Calcutta on the 3rd and 4th of March 1912. His Highness the Aga Khan and other Muhammadan leaders will be present. Members and visitors wishing to attend are requested to communicate at once with Mr. S. M. Sherif, Secretary, of the Reception Committee, All-India Moslem League, 58, Lower Circular Road, Calcutta.

The Comrade.

Turkey and Neutrality.

NEVER since the British seized the Bundesrath in the South African War had any similar incident raised national passions to boiling point until a month ago when French public opinion was stirred to its depth by Italian blundering. We publish elsewhere the French Premier's statement about the Carthage and Manouba incidents which gives an authoritative account of both and explains the law applicable to them. The Russo-Japanese war was quite prolific in seizures of vessels, and neutral Powers which had suffered considerably on that account sought to define the law about contraband more rigidly. It is believed that Sir George Clarke went so far as to recommend "the total abolition of contraband as a matter, from the belligerent's point of view, not worth the trouble, odium, and friction with neutral Powers which the exercise of the right of search and capture inevitably brings about." The controversy recently carried on in England about the Declaration of London, however, made it clear that broadly speaking two opinions existed on the subject. According to one view, contraband must be limited to articles solely used in warfare, while, according to the other, it included "conditional" contraband, that is articles which may be so used, though primarily intended for pacific purposes. According to the view favourable to neutrals, if the destination of a vessel is a neutral port no cargo that it carries on board can be contraband, while according to the other, which favours the belligerents, the destination of the goods, rather than of the vessel which carries them, is the important point, contraband really meant for the enemy being liable to seizure in spite of the neutrality of the port to which it is consigned.

At this juncture it is important to know what "the descendants of the Scipios" thought of the matter. They tried to find a via media between the extremes, and articles primarily intended for war were declared to be absolute contraband, and for these the neutral destination of the ship was not conclusive proof that they were not meant for the enemy's use. If it was proved that they were meant for the enemy they could be seized. Now, an aeroplane is not an article solely used in warfare or primarily intended for such use, and the neutral destination of the Carthage which carried M. Duval and his flying machine for one of the several aviation meetings in Africa for which he had entered, was enough to make the vessel and its innocent cargo immune from interference even on the part of Italians. But although the Declaration of London has not been ratified by Italy, it has been duly signed by her. According to Article 24 of that Declaration, an aeroplane is not absolute contraband, but can be included in "conditional" contraband on previous notice being given thereof. If Italy chose to abide by the Declaration that she has already signed, even the Times admits that Article 24 "would seem fatal to the Italian contention," and that resourceful journal is reduced to hinting discreetly that "it may be that the Italian Government, not having ratified the Declaration, will say that they are not bound by its terms."

But even if she adopted this course,—and she seems to have done that—how could she get over the fact vouched for by the Times' own Paris correspondent that "Italy has supplied herself with aeroplanes and with other material of war from France?" Admiral Bienaimé, who interpellated the French Government, caused a sensation by remarking that he was astonished at the action of the Italians in seizing an aeroplane destined for a neutral port, since at this very moment Italian officers are taking lessons in aviation in France and some of them are now making preparations to join the Italian forces at the front with aeroplanes bought in France. He even named the aerodrome in the neighbourhood of Douai where Italian officers are now completing their training. Although Italians deny this, they admit having ordered from France some guns "as samples," and declare that in making their purchases of grain and camels in Tunis they "merely followed the example of the Turks in replenishing the Italian supplies."

As regards the general question of contraband, it will be within the memory of our readers that in the very first week of the war, Turkey wished to apply the Declaration of London to cargoes of Russian wheat passing through the Dardanelles. To this the Russian Government objected as "a violation of the rights of Russia" and gave Turkey "warning of the heavy responsibility which the Turkish Government would incur in such circumstances." The Times then stated:—

To declare grain contraband "irrespective of destination" is to declare that which is nonsensical. . . . Turkey has rights over her own ports, with due respect always to the rights of neutrals; but she has none over vessels coming from Odessa other than that of stopping and seizing contraband, as generally recognised. . . . Of course, if it appears that they are conveying grain for the use of the Italian expeditionary force or fleet they run the risk of being captured and condemned. . . . Turkey was a party to the Declaration of Paris; that is, to the acceptance of the principle that "the neutral flag covers enemy's goods with the exception of contraband of war," and "that neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag." Accordingly, grain shipped on board English vessels, though belonging to Italian consignees, would be exempt unless its destination rendered it contraband.

Now that the danger (of stoppage of vessels bearing Russian grain through the Dardanelles) is removed there is to be found among shipping firms an undercurrent of sympathy with Turkey in her attempt to describe grain shipped to whatever port as contraband. Italy annually takes large quantities of grain from South Russia, and it is pointed out that there is no insurmountable obstacle in the way of arranging for steamers bound from the Black Sea to Gibraltar for orders to proceed thence to Genoa—a distance of only 850 miles. It is even asserted that such a double voyage has just been completed and will again be attempted in the very near future. Turkish officials, it is suggested, are alive to the possibilities of this trade and, therefore, would have been glad to prevent supplies from leaving the Black Sea for Italy in the only effective way—that of stopping all vessels, under whatever charter, at the Dardanelles. Such general prohibition apparently proved beyond the strength of Turkey, and now since she is powerless in the Mediterranean Sea she must leave the gateway open for Italy to supply herself if she chooses with the assistance of neutral owners.

Let us contrast this view of the Times as expressed on the 11th October, 1911, with the following which appeared on the 23rd January this year —

A belligerent is naturally tempted to press his claims with special vigour in circumstances such as exist in the present war. The interception of contraband can rarely have much effect upon the issue of hostilities when they are waged between two countries with highly developed industries. They can as a rule get at home, though perhaps after some delay and at great expense, supplies which but for the enemy's cruisers would come as contraband from abroad; the only exception in the case of such countries being as to foodstuffs. In the case, however, of a war in which one of the belligerents is a State such as Turkey, excessively dependent upon foreign countries for many appliances in use in war, the condition of things is different. Strict and vigilant enforcement of the rights of search and capture may be an effective agency for terminating a war.

And this is the logic of the Times. The stoppage of the food supplies of Italy by Turkey which was fully authorized by the Declaration of London must not be allowed, and "since she is powerless in the Mediterranean Sea, she must leave the gateway open for Italy to supply herself if she chooses with the assistance of neutral powers." But when Italians have purchased aeroplanes in France and ordered guns "as samples," if a French aviator takes his aeroplane from France to a French port it may be seized by Italy, because "one of the belligerents is a State such as Turkey," and the open breachers of the Declaration duly signed by Italy may be "an effective agency for terminating a war." What is sauce for the Italian goose is evidently no sauce for the Turkish gander.

The Carthage incident and the comment of the Times thereon serve to prove that International Law although it could never do anything to preserve peace, is now unable even to regulate war. It was appealed to by the pacifists and the advocates of arbitration when the Italian raid was first launched, but it could not even man a straw to oppose the dogs of war. When atrocities unparalleled in the history of humanity occurred, and were reported by fair-minded Europeans who have so largely redeemed the name of European Honesty, the response of International Law was "Military Exigencies!" It mattered little if only a week before the same journals were accusing Shevket Pasha of "ruthlessness" in suppressing an internal rebellion in Albania incited by "friendly neighbours." But it is the desire of peace this time which has led the Times to come out as an apologist for Italy's illegal capture of an innocent aeroplane going to Tunis.

Whether M. Duval takes his aeroplane across the Tunisian frontier or not is a matter of little consequence, but the Manouba incident meant life or death to hundreds. We published a translation last week of the letter of Ahmed Sharief Effendi who was a member of the first Red Crescent Mission to Tripoli under Karm Sebati Bey. This party had passed through French territory after having satisfied the French authorities both in France and on the Tunisian frontier. It must be remembered that under the Hague Convention No. X, hospital and ambulance services are immune in time of war, and had the Italians not proved strangely inhumane, such a party would have gone straight to Tripoli under Italian permits instead of going all the way via Tunis. A second party of 29 men followed the first, but, thanks to Italian braggadachio, they were not allowed to reach their destination. According to the Paris correspondent of the Times "They all had their Red Crescent passes in order. Their intended arrival in France was notified by the Turkish Embassy here, and free transit for them via Marseilles and Tunis was formally requested and granted. Twenty-two of them travelled overland from Turkey to Marseilles, the remaining seven arrived there by way of Paris, where they made various purchases which, it is alleged, were confined to articles of medical and surgical equipment. They had a few Browning revolvers for their own personal protection, but nothing is known of any further purchase of arms or ammunition, or of an Italian story to the effect that they first tried to charter a private yacht at Marseilles to convey them across the Mediterranean."

The French Shipowners' Committee also pointed out that even if the Manouba had any contraband, such as arms on board, it could not have been landed in Tunis, for a civilization which rests its claim to superiority on its fighting capacity denies to "barbarism" even a chance of challenging that claim by prohibiting the traffic in arms, among other places, in Tunis.

According to some accounts, the Italian regarded three of these to be doctors, 21 ambulance or hospital attendants, but suspected the remaining five who are administrative officers of the Red Crescent Society. It must, however, be remembered that the semi-official Italian statement issued on the 19th January in Rome asserted that the Italian Government had "sure information that 29 officers and men, whose names were given, of the Turkish army were leaving Marseilles on board S.S. Manouba for Tunis under the guidance of two organisers of the contraband service." "It is singular, however," says the Times correspondent, "that the Italian Government does not publish its information."

But on the 21st January this positive information had transformed itself into a mere suspicion, and the next semi-official communiqué stated that—

"(1) The Turks in question attempted to leave Marseilles secretly by chartering a private yacht with the object of landing unseen at a deserted spot on the coast of Tunis or Tripoli. They were, however, unable to realise this plan because the owner of the yacht found out that they were combatant officers and refused to allow them to charter it.

"(2) They did not buy surgical materials at Marseilles or elsewhere, for all that was found on them was two small cases of surgical instruments and a very small quantity of medicaments. They had no bandages whatever.

"(3) That the doubt as to their being doctors is strengthened by the fact that some of them declare themselves to be accountants and that they have in their possession a cheque for £10,000."

And what was the end of it all, of the "sure information" which was never disclosed? A telegram from Milan stated that the Secolo published an account of how the 29 Turkish prisoners at Cagliari were taken to the hospital there and subjected to severe tests to prove their alleged occupation. The three doctors, Benini, Kianil, and Emin, were asked to diagnose the complaints of several patients, which they did correctly, and the male nurses displayed their proficiency with the exception of three of them. The Daily Telegraph correspondent says that he learned after the interview between the Marquis di San Giuliano and M. Camille Barrère, that the Italian inquiry had just been concluded. "This was a strangely abrupt and timely conclusion, but that is neither here nor there. The Italian examining committee at Cagliari found that four of the 29 Turks are genuine doctors and that the remaining 25 are genuine members of the Red Crescent Mission, ergo, the Italian Government can release them at once. As the Italian Government had precisely found this out within a few hours of the arrival in Rome of the French Ambassador, bearing his own Government's instructions, all is for the best. The French Government will not cavil at the reasons given by the Italian Government, on its own side, for releasing the Turks. It would not only have cavilled, it would have protested vigorously at any disposition on the part of Italy to deter her compliance with the French request to some later date, on the ground that the Italian inquiry was still pending. But if the favourable result of that inquiry happens to come pat just at the right moment to enable Italy to grant the one essential French demand, all is well, and the rest is plain sailing." Also for a "sure information" which ends in plain sailing!

There is one point of special importance regarding the law on the subject. If Italy chooses to abide by the Declaration of London, even then Article 47 permits her to make prisoner of war of any one found on board a neutral vessel only if he is an individual embodied in the armed forces of the enemy. We now know from Italy herself that the 29 men she had arrested really belonged to hospital and ambulance services and were therefore immune from capture. But at the very worst they were only suspects, and not men embodied in the armed forces of the enemy. It is only when men are clearly "embodied in the armed forces of the enemy" that Article 47 applies, and the burden of proof is on the capturing belligerent. It would be intolerable if a desperate belligerent that had had the worst of the fight took to capturing men on board neutral vessels, merely on the off chance of discovering men belonging to the enemy's armed forces by "ploughing" a doctor in bandaging or a male nurse in surgery. All this would, however, apply only if Italy choose to abide by the Declaration of London. But, then, she does not. In that case the old law stands good, and according to that the general rule is that no person can be taken at sea from a neutral vessel under any circumstances. We wonder whether Italian ingenuity can find a way of escape even from this dilemma. She would very much like to apply the old law to the case of the Carthage on the 16th January, and the new law of the unratified Declaration to the case of the Manouba on the 17th. But even then people who have to be examined in surgery and bandaging to test their merits in the peaceful pursuit of the healing art cannot be captured on the strength of "sure information" as men embodied in the armed forces of the enemy."

English sympathies must be on the side of the Turks, for this outrage is very similar to the Trent affair, which in 1861 brought Great Britain to the verge of war with America. In October of that year a Northern warship intercepted at sea the British mail steamer Trent, bound from Havana to St. Thomas, and took off two Confederate Commissioners accredited to France, Messrs Mason and Stedell, who were among her passengers. They were taken to Boston and imprisoned in Fort Warren, but were released on 1st January, 1862, on the peremptory demand of the British Government, and were permitted to proceed on their mission. On this occasion the Washington Government expressly accepted the British demand as a just interpretation of international doctrine.

There are many points of interest involved in this case, such as the assertion of the French Foreign Office that it informed the Italian Embassy of the intended embarkation of the Turkish Red Crescent detachment, and the Embassy's denial, the facts about the undecipherability of the instructions from the French Foreign Office to the Embassy at Rome, and the cause thereof, the treatment meted out to the Captain of the Manouba, and the fact that the Japanese and Russians had travelled to join the armies of their respective countries through neutral countries during the Russo-Japanese War. It may be a matter of "profound surprise," as the Piccolo expresses it, that a representative of France should have taken upon himself "so deplorable an initiative" as ordering from Rome the surrender of the Turkish Mission without consulting his Government, and indignation at the surrender of these Turks may wax hot in Paris. It may even be, as the Times correspondent says, that "it is a difficult position for Italy", and that "it is hard for her in presence of the Italian national feeling which the war has aroused to reverse the action of her naval officers." But the point that is of the utmost importance is that while diplomatists scratched their bald pates for a "formula" which might save the "honour" of Italy (God save the mark!) and while the Hague Tribunal (does it still exist?) investigated the justice of it all, the Turkish Mission had to remain in Italian captivity, and the brave sufferers from this wretched raid, who need the ministrations of the healing hand so badly in Tripoli, continued to suffer simply because the Captain of an Italian cruiser wore out his valour in the capture of a body of doctors and male nurses. As Sadi says,

تا تریانی از عراق آوردند خود مارکیزده مرد خود

While the antidote arrived from Quai d'Orsay and the Quirinal, or the Hague Tribunal, the victims of the Italian viper had to suffer untold torture, and some perhaps expired. This is the view that M. Jaurès, the Socialist leader of France, has taken in his party organ, the Humanité, and as the name of the paper suggests, this is neither a question of deep diplomacy nor of international law so much as of ordinary humanity. But who knows that when, in the words of the Times, "one of the belligerents is a State such as Turkey," this too may be "an effective agency for terminating the war." Verily in these days, Peace hath her "exigencies" no less strange than War!

This affair has had one more unfortunate effect. We are loth to seek comparisons between the action of the French in Tunis and of the British Agent in Egypt to the disparagement of British action. As it is, there is enough to worry the Mussulmans of India, and it would be highly undesirable to add to their existing worries. But comparisons are made by others, and they are read by a large number of Mussulmans in India as elsewhere. The Popolo Romano, an Italian Ministerial journal, "instances the action of Lord Kitchener in sequestering cargo at Alexandria intended for the Turks," and people have not such short memories as to have altogether forgotten that when the war broke out, the Egyptian Government was showing her sympathy for its suzerain and protecting its neutrality by permitting camels to be sold in the Soudan for the Italian Transport Corps. It would thus appear that the Italians expected to find in M. Poincaré another Lord Kitchener. Their comparisons have driven the Times to remind them that "imprudent activity on the part of cruisers might have the effect of raising awkward questions as to whether neutrals ought in Egypt and elsewhere, without departure from their duties, create embarrassment to Italy in more ways than one." Does not this allude to the Hague Convention No. V., Article 7, according to which "a neutral power is not under any obligation to prevent the exportation or transit for one or the other of the belligerents of arms, ammunition or, in general, anything which may be serviceable to an army or a fleet," and to Article 6 which says that "the responsibility of a neutral State is not affected by the fact that individuals separately cross the frontier in order to place themselves at the service of one of the belligerents."

The Italians wanted assurances from France that M. Duval's aeroplane would not eventually go to the Turks, but the French Government refused to give Italy any guarantees, although it took, for its own satisfaction, a formal undertaking from M. Duval not to give either his services or his aeroplane to the Turks. All this presents a disagreeable contrast to the much-advertised activity of Lord Kitchener, and if Egyptian papers are not wilfully misrepresenting the new pharaoh's masterful energy—they have not been all suppressed yet, at any rate—then it is time that our Foreign Office reminded him of the existence of such things as International Law, and the Hague Convention, not to say common sense and common honesty.

The Future of Islam.

II.

WE DEALT last week with "the hopes of the Moslems," and had reserved the discussion of "the fears of the Europeans" for another occasion. Before we close this chapter, however, we should like to refer in passing to the sneer of Professor Margolouth that "it is not as an advocate of the higher morality that Islam has ever filled Europe with apprehension." He added "Hence the Syed's project may arouse curiosity, interest, or even sympathy in Europe, but it is not likely to occasion alarm." We do not know whether even curiosity is aroused by Islam in England, for England knows far less of Islam than Islamic countries know of Christianity. But it certainly gives rise to cheap sneers, and Sir Mortimer Durand's ridicule of Mr. Ameer Ali's reference to the democratic character of Islam is an instance in point. He related how on the conclusion of a mission to Afghanistan, the Amir, having assembled four hundred notables, put to them every point of the agreement, asking their opinion. All agreed, and Sir Mortimer concludes that it was a remarkable instance of democracy. If the opinion of the caste to which Sir Mortimer Durand belongs be taken to be the criterion of the fitness of things, democracy is anything but desirable. And if it is not desirable, and its absence can best be shown by the Jo-Hokam acquiescence of notables, our own Khan Bahadurs could amply vindicate the autocratic, oligarchic or autocratic character of our Empire, whichever it may, after a searching enquiry, be found to be. But in any case we had better not talk of democracy when even with radically ruled England a word put in the mouth of royalty necessarily becomes irrevocable.

It is true that as an advocate of higher morality Islam is not likely to cause alarm to Europe. But that is not because Islam is, as the Prophet tells us, "less exacting" and "starts from a lower level." Some of its first demands are, daily worship at least five times a day, and thirty days' fast every year, and if there is any honesty in modern Christians, they will perhaps tell us how seldom and even then how unwillingly they go to church even on Sundays, and how few relish, and that too how hide, their Lenten repast. Another demand of Islam would be absolute totalitarianism, and the controversies over repeated Licensing Bills in England can tell us something about the rigour of this self-denying ordinance.

Nor is this all. The one "weak point" which Christian critics seem to discover in Islam is the relation of the sexes. But with reference to this it is best to quote Professor Margolouth's own view. Speaking of the old commands of the Prophet's system, he writes:—

For the female sex it certainly achieved much, and therefore it is best to hush the voice of sentiment and treat its rules and innovations as an attempt to grapple with a hopeless problem. For less in the sense that no community of any magnitude has ever found a blanket (to use Isaiah's image) that will cover the whole people. The seclusion and veiling of women were, as Marx has well observed, a direct consequence of polygamy and facility of divorce. Polygamy is itself an attempt at solving a problem which modern-Germans solve by harbouring prostitution. In the latter is an expression of the female population a wholly degraded lot, in the former the whole female population is partially degraded. If the introduction of the veil Muhammad curtailed women's liberty, he undoubtedly secured for them by laws the rights of inheriting and holding property which under the older system were precarious.

Not that we absolutely agree with this view. The normal condition in Islam is monogamy, and the permission to marry up to four wives, hedged round as it is with conditions remarkably stringent which—thanks to the illicit practices of Moslems themselves—Christian critics slur over, gives to the Code of Islam just that elasticity which is necessary for a body of laws universally binding on Moslems of all countries and climes and for all eternity. But while Islam permits—not commands—a limited number of wives, Christianity itself lays down no such restrictions, and for all that a Christian's creed dictates he may marry a million. Monogamy, we repeat, is the normal condition of the Moslem World, and polygamy which disregards the stringent conditions laid down in the Quran is as much a sin as the less obvious polygamy of many Christians. In such cases, too, let the teaching of Christ be the guide of all Christians, and let him first cast a stone at the openly polygamous Moslem that is without sin among the Christians.

As regards seclusion and the veil, far from being the direct consequence of polygamy and facility of divorce, they are practised in order to check polygamy and polyandry, both secret and open, and to lessen the temptation to abuse the Islamic law of divorce. The separation of the two sexes in the daily intercourse of life would prove too exacting a demand for a society which is habituated to the zest which the presence of forbidden fruit provides in its Eden, a society which, satiated with the milder excitement of decoyette, and the short skirt with open lace-work stocking, Directoire costume, or the close-draping, clinging sheath, excites its jaded palate with La Milo and Maud Allan nudities and with Russian dances, or occasionally takes a turn itself with the "Cake Walk," the "Boston Dip" and the "Turkey Trot." But let that be. As for Islam, however it may have curtailed the liberty of a woman's movements, it alone strove to give her economic freedom, which will, we trust, some day cut off her fetters in Europe and America, where she is still the slave of man-made laws and man-made conventions. And however Christian Europe may sneer at the marriage and divorce laws of Islam, it is plain that it is not itself satisfied with the laws made by man that it substitutes for those of God's own making. The novels of Mr. Hubert Wales and Victoria Cross, as much as the proceedings of the Divorce Commission in England, indicate the growing revolt against irrational and all too rigid conventions of modern English society, while the plays of Mr. Alfred Sutro, the essays of "Rita," and the sermons of Father Bernard Vaughan will present the other side of the picture of woman's social freedom. The fact is that Christians for the most part no more "the faiths and morals hold that Milton held." In England the middle of the Seventeenth Century saw in Milton the fine flower of the Reformation as well as of the Renaissance and in Cromwell the Servant of God as well as the protector of British liberties. But the Restoration came all too soon, and the decline of morals was even more marked than the decline of literature and of liberty. The Revolution of 1688 restored British liberties, but more than a century was needed to revive letters, and, although a Protestant Revolution, it could not restore the morals of Puritan England. The only hopeful feature of the present generation is the decline in the Drink Bill of England, but so far as other aspects of morality are concerned—and we say this more in sorrow than in anger, more with a desire to vindicate morality than be vindictive—the countries of Europe do anything but support the view that the life of the civilized people of the West is a triumphant proof of the fact that it is saturated with Christianity and that their morality constitutes as magnificent a paragon of thanksgiving as has ever been sounded in the world since the Day of Bethlehem. But there are signs which show that they are drifting into port, and if this continues, Islam is an advocate of higher morality, though it will not fill Europe with apprehension and dismay, would yet certainly serve to cleanse some of the moral sinks of Christendom. All that it seeks to arouse is "curiosity, interest and sympathy," but all that it seems to have aroused is political alarm, which is more natural to the victim than to the victimiser.

There now remain "the fears of Europeans" to consider before we express our own opinion on the subject of Islam's future. In this connection it is best to remember that Pan-Islamism is not the only logic that frightens or is supposed to frighten Europe. The success of sturdy little Japan and the awakening of the sleeping giant in China have caused more than a passing flutter in the dovecotes of Europe, and whenever the case of a negro or kaffir outrage occurs or a Jack Johnson mercilessly knocks about a Jiffries or is about to castigate a Bombardier Wells, the tremors of Imperialism become tremendous. We are familiar with the Yellow Peril and the Black Peril, but if we paid the same attention to the unexpressed apprehensions of Asia and Africa that we pay to the پیش از مرگ وارثا (mourning before death) of Europe and America, there would seem to be more reality in the White Peril than in either of the other two.

But it is with Pan-Islamism or the Revolt of Islam that we are at this moment concerned. Before we examine it, let us summarise the facts of Islam's temporal history. Islam commenced with Arabia and conquered North Africa and some other portions of Asia in the seventh century. Spain was won, in the eighth, and, so to speak, after scouting early in the eighth century, Moslems invaded the sub-continent of India in the tenth and eleventh, and conquered it finally in the twelfth. The wave of Islamic conquest lapped the shores of Europe as well, for in the same year that Muhammad Qasim invaded Sind, Tariq won the battle of Guadalete, and within five years Spain was conquered. Such was the daring of Moslem conquerors that had America been discovered at the time, the banner of Islam would have been planted there as well. "Iqbal" refers to one of the most picturesque incidents of history in his palpitating verse.

بحر ظلمات میں دورا سے گہرے مے

(What of the desert, when we left not even the flood, and plunged our chargers in the Atlantic Ocean.) Soon after the conquest of Spain a Moslem force was led into France through the pass of Roncesvalles, and according to European historians themselves, were it not for the check at Tours in 732, France and Germany would have fallen into the hands of Moslem conquerors. The Eastern Empire of Byzantium had already felt the prowess of Islam in the seventh century in Arabia Felix, and in the succeeding centuries Islam was rapidly mounting up the rungs of the ladder to Europe from Syria, Mesopotamia and Asia Minor. In the seventh century itself, besides the victories of the first four Caliphs, Armenia had become at first tributary to the Saracens and then part of their territory, the Roman army was defeated at Tripoli, Sicily was attacked, and Constantinople itself was besieged by the Saracen fleet for four years. After the eighth century, the Eastern Empire was forced to purchase peace with a heavy tribute, but Crete was won for a time soon after, and then the conquest of Sicily and Moslem interference in Southern Italy began. Few now remember that Rome herself was threatened in the middle of the ninth century, and even the Mussalmans have to be reminded, in that beautiful line of "Iqbal", that Sicily was for two whole centuries an integral part of Islam's world-embracing Empire.

جسکی تو منزل تھی میں ادس کاروان کی گرد مرون

The conquest of as large a slice of Europe as Spain was reserved for another branch of Moslem conquerors, whose heathen kinsmen weakened the Empire of Islam in Asia while they added to it fresh territories in Europe. The Seljuk Turks took up the work of the Saracens, and when Alp Arslan defeated the Byzantines in 1071 and captured the Roman Emperor, Romanus IV, Europe was seriously threatened in the East and a prophetic ear would have caught the sound of the clattering hoofs of Turkish chargers in the city of Constantine. The successor of Hildebrand organised a Crusade, and Christian nations assembled at Clermont shouted forth the resolve of Christianity to rid the world of Islam, and in the cries of "Deus Vult," announced the only Jihad, in the European sense of the word, that has yet been waged in the world. Jerusalem was captured before the eleventh century had closed and Godfrey of Bouillon made its king. A second Crusade was organised half a century later, but it lacked the flush of enthusiasm and ended in a fiasco. Forty years after, Saladin captured Jerusalem, and after a vigorous struggle, repulsed the forces of Christianity in the third Crusade and enlarged the boundaries of his Empire. But profit and loss were both going up, for if the Turks conquered Armenia and Georgia in the eleventh century, repulsed Europe from Asia in the twelfth and laid the foundation of the Ottoman Empire in the thirteenth, the Moors in Spain slowly declined after the death of Almanzor in 1022, and the Christian chiefs of Navarre and Leon, Castile and Arragon kept up a struggle against them, leaving them only the kingdom of Granada by the middle of the thirteenth century.

The house of Osman prospered and progressed, and the conquest of Constantinople would have come half a century earlier were it not for Timur's capture of the great Bayazid and his death in captivity. Christian chiefs had combined at Marizza in 1389, at Kossova in 1389 and at Nicopolis in 1396, but had in all cases been defeated. The interregnum of a decade between Bayazid's capture and death and Mohammed I's reuniting of the Turkish power gave East in Christendom only a breathing space, and in the crushing defeats at Varna in 1444, and again at Kossova under the Hungarian leader, Hunyadi, in 1458, Turkish power was fully proved. At last in 1453 Mohammed II. reversed the action of the Moslem conqueror of Spain, and with greater success, for although the latter's charger did not gallop across the Atlantic to the shores of America, the galleys of Mohamed the Conqueror sailed on land from the Bosphorus to the Golden Horn, and helped him to realize the prophecy that New Rome would yet be subdued by the Moslem. Thus Islam provided itself with an empire in Europe in the East to compensate it for the loss of that in the West, half a century later. For in 1492 Granada fell, and Ferdinand "the Catholic," who had commenced his reign with setting up the Inquisition at Seville in 1481, celebrated the success of Christian arms by the wholesale expulsion of Jews in 1493. The Moors who had been assured of perfect toleration learnt six years later what to expect when the power to enforce such stipulations is gone, and their persecution which commenced in Ferdinand's reign continued into the reign of his grandson and successor, the Emperor Charles V., who finally expelled them in 1524 from a land which they had ruled for eight hundred years. But the power of Islam had not gone, and the naval triumphs of Khair-ud-din Pasha, known as Barbarossa, who had even attacked Nice in 1543, compelled Charles V. to acknowledge the strength of Turkey, and a year later, make to her, with Ferdinand of Austria, overtures of peace. Ferdinand became a vassal paying tribute, and Charles V. himself subsequently entered into a treaty. The old Caliphates of Baghdad, Cordova and Cairo had passed away, but the Turks and the Moghals were in the zenith of their power. Selim the Gentle, and Suleiman the Magnificent in Turkey, and Bahar, Akbar, Jehangir and Shah Jehan in India, maintained the temporal strength of Islam in an age which contained some of the world's greatest statesmen and rulers. And these Moslem kings could hold their own against the best in Christendom.

But there is nothing more difficult to keep up than an equipoise in political power, and if a nation or race cannot advance, it must go back. Byron sums up the history of all nations in describing that of Rome.

"First conquest, and then glory; when that fails,
"Wealth, vice, corruption, barbarism at last;
"And history with all her volumes vast
"Is but one page."

Glory failed Islam after all these conquests, and the decline of Mussalmans through the stages of wealth, vice and corruption, was bringing them to semi-barbarism. It is curious that the revival should have been attempted about the same time both in Turkey and in India. The Kiuprili, father and son, strove mightily as the Grand Viziers in Turkey, while Aurangzeb, who named himself Mohayyud-din, "the Reviver of the Faith", tried to arrest the decay of the Moghals in India. But in the decade of Qara Mustafa's degenerate Grand Vizierate, the Turks suffered defeats at the hands of Sobieski at Knochim in 1673 and at Lemberg in 1675, and the second siege of Vienna in 1683 was not merely inconclusive like the first under Suleiman the Magnificent, who merely retired disappointed from its walls in 1529, but clearly marked the commencement of the epoch of Turkey's decline. A little before this, a Turkish minister had answered some warnings by saying, "God be praised, such is the strength of Islam, that the union of Russians and Poles matters not to us. Our Empire has increased in might since its origin, nor have all the Christian kings that have leagued against us been able to pluck a hair from our beard. With God's grace it shall ever be so, and our Empire shall endure to the day of judgment." Ahmed Kiuprili himself had told the Polish Ambassador that "If the solution of differences is referred to that keen and decisive judge, called 'The Sword,' the issue of the strife must be pronounced by the God who hath poised upon nothing Heaven and Earth and by whose aid Islam has for one thousand years triumphed over its foes." But his father, Mohamed Kiuprili, had intercepted some time before this a letter of the Greek Patriarch to the Vaivode of Wallachia in which the Patriarch said, "The power of Islam is drawing to an end. The Christian faith will soon be supreme. All their lands will speedily be in the possession of the Christians, and the Lords of the Cross and the Church-bell will be the Lords of the Empire." The prophecy of the Greek Patriarch has only been partially fulfilled in the three intervening centuries, but the Islamic Kingdoms stand to-day on the brink of a greater precipice than the one which yawned for Turkey towards the end of the 17th century, when Ahmad Kiuprili met the danger with a solemn faith in divine aid for the Mussalmans.

Morocco, the extreme western representative of Islam, is feared to sink to the position of a European dependency. Tripoli, the last section of the Moslem Empire in Africa—if we reject the suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt as a useless fiction—was expected by Italy to follow the same fate. In Asia, too, Persia has been in imminent danger—though we hope it has now past away—of partition and annexation, and is still in some danger of becoming a European dependency. Turkey, which was to have been sent back "bag and baggage to Baghdad" by Mr. Gladstone, may possibly lose even Asia Minor to Germany, which seeks "a place in the sun", and, if Mr. Hogarth's prognostications be true, Arabia itself is not immune from falling into the hands of Christendom. And in Europe anything may happen when the snows melt and the spring flowers bloom. Is it strange then that uneasiness should prevail throughout the Islamic World. But it is not the Mussalmans that have begun to cast the horoscope of Islam. A daily paper of Natal has written two leading articles on the subject and in one of these it says:

Europe is at last definitely retaliating on Asia for the alarm into which the Muhammadian arms threw the west from the seventh to the end of the seventeenth century. . . . All this should make it clear . . . how momentous a change it is that is represented by these things that are now marking the commencement of the second decade of the twentieth century. After clearing the Moors from her soil in the south-west at the beginning of the seventeenth century, Europe is now finally rooting out the power of Islam from Northern Africa, and having checked the march of the Turks at the end of the seventeenth century, and steadily weakened the Muhammadian grip on South-Eastern Europe ever since, she is now battering and disintegrating one branch of Muhammadism, in Persia, in the Middle East, and thereby threatening the Turkish Empire itself with isolation and final dissolution. The West has not only beaten back the ancient attack of the East, but is carrying a counter attack into the enemy's quarters. Most assuredly, the world-import of these events in Morocco, Tripoli, and Persia deserves more than a passing attention, at this period of consideration and looking-around, provided by these Christmas and New Year holidays.

In India, the Pioneer writes in the same strain.

At all points the independent dominion of the Moslem is hemmed in and threatened. The future seems dark for its continuance in any part of the world.

That being the case, we can consider Pan-Islamism only as a force for purposes of defence, not of defiance.

CORRESPONDENCE

His Highness Sir Aga Khan.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,—I have read the criticism of H.H. Sir Aga Khan's "pretensions" as it has been headed in the Sind Gazette of the 17th January. The editors of newspapers are privileged to criticise the proceedings and actions of people for the benefit of the public and had the criticism been of that kind I should not have taken the trouble of writing this letter. Every criticism has its proper limitations, but the Editor of the Sind Gazette appears to have descended to personalities and used unmerited invectives against H.H. Sir Aga Khan and the Sind Muhammadan Association which presented the address. He remarked: "The insidious undercurrent of thought discernible behind this expression of a pious sentiment gives colour to the impression which has been steadily growing among the more statesmanlike of the Muhammadan leaders that the Aga Khan is not entirely a true representative of Islamic opinion." The text of the adulatory address of the Sind Muhammadan Association suggests that local Muhammadans have no suspicion as to the state of the Moslem mind elsewhere in this regard. But from Cairo to Bukhara every Muhammadan city can point to religious leaders who in Moslem estimation are greater and more distinguished, and we may add more revered than he. The Aga Khan in fact seems to be presuming without sufficient authority to proclaim a lead in religious politics such as few Muhammadans of the dominant classes exhibit any readiness to follow. The expression "insidious undercurrent of thought . . . the text of the adulatory address of the Sind Muhammadan Association" are most unseemly and objectionable and show that the Editor has not used these words for the benefit of those who read his paper.

I may unhesitatingly say that H.H. Sir Aga Khan never presumed to proclaim a lead in religious politics as the undercurrent of the Editor's thought would suggest, it is impossible that the religious leaders of different communities knowing the religious principles of the Panjebhai Khoja community that is to say, the Ismailia Khojas who are the followers of H.H. Sir Aga Khan, would allow their followers to recognize Sir Aga Khan as their religious leader, nor any Mussalman whose principles differ from those of the Ismailia sect can accept the preachings, principles and precepts followed by the Ismailia Khoja community. He says "from Cairo to Bukhara every Muhammadan city can point out its religious leaders who in Moslem estimation are greater and more distinguished and we may add more revered than he." That there may be many such leaders and may be known in the wide region of the world he mentions, I do not pretend to deny. But it would have been much better and more graceful if he had shown any leaders who would come up to the standard of eminence which H.H. Sir Aga Khan has achieved, in the world, of which we have any knowledge. We are immediately concerned with our own needs and difficulties and in these needs and difficulties we find no other Muhammadan leader to come forward and help us as Sir Aga Khan has been doing without any distinction of the different sects and creeds in India. I do not understand what his object is in saying that "until His Highness makes a clearer avowal of his aims and advances stronger proof that those aims are in no way detrimental to the strength and integrity of Islamic hopes he cannot properly be said without qualification to be either the leader or the exponent of any Muhammadan thought except that of the Khojas." The educational backwardness of Mussalmans generally in India and specially in Hind is too well known to protect them from the reproach which His Highness bestowed upon them. Every Mussalman will tell you that such reproach or rather advice as H.H. conveyed in his speech to the Mussalmans was most welcome, as his intention was for our benefit. According to our religious principles we are bound to accept and respect any good advice which may be conveyed to any Mussalman by any leader of any community, whether Hindu or Christian, as the Commandment is "Appreciate whatever good advice is conveyed to you and do not mind who the leader or person is who conveys it. Appreciate and follow it even if it be written upon a wall." After all Sir Aga Khan is a Mussalman and belongs to a noble family of Syeds whom we are bound to revere and respect whatever may be their individual beliefs and actions.

The Editor observes "why he should urge under colour of promoting inter-racial amity, a fusion of nationalities such as every unrestful non-Muhammadan politician is for ever preaching into Muhammadan ears." I can see that he insinuates that H.H.'s object in impressing upon the minds of Sind Muhammadans the necessity of forming the Moslem League and giving the people that political education which will ultimately be a source of uniting Hindus and Muhammadans into a single nation was that Mussalmans should make a common cause with Hindus in order to harass and weaken the authority of the British Government as some Hindu anarchists have been doing. Such an insinuation is unworthy of the thought of a journalist of his reputation. He appears evidently to be ignorant of the true scope and object of the Moslem League. The idea of forming the Moslem League originated with Nawab Khwaja Sir Salimullah of Dacca and the League was formed for the first time at Dacca in December 1906 at the time the Educational Conference was held there. It was a counter-measure against the Congress and its sole object was to weaken its force and warn Mussalmans not to join and take part at any of its meetings. This was done when it became clear that the extremist party in the Congress preached anarchism and sedition. I do not believe and may say positively that Sir Aga Khan's object in recommending the formation of a Moslem League in Sind was even to the smallest degree or in any way sinister as he seems to imagine and no one who knows Sir Aga Khan would draw such a conclusion from his speech. The League already exists in Sind. It was formed by a meeting of the Bombay Moslem League held at Poona in the end of March last year and the Hon. Mir Allahbakhsh Khan and the Hon. Mr. G. M. Bhurgri were nominated Vice-Presidents with instructions to appoint committees and nominate members. I may safely say that his object clearly was that the Mussalmans should unite with Hindus in order to save themselves from the troubles and inconveniences to which they are subjected, the Hindus being more powerful and invested with all the authority to wield over them. The advice certainly did not mean at all that Mussalmans should also join with seditious Congresswallahs and extremists. There is nothing wrong if Mussalmans unite with law-abiding and peace-loving Hindus and fill up and close the breach which has been widening between the two communities. The recent visit of His Imperial Majesty the King-Emperor to Delhi and Calcutta has clearly demonstrated and proclaimed that the wild and grossly exaggerated accounts of rapid growth of sedition and anarchism in India are purely a myth and we should not be alarmed by such false accounts.

As regards the text of the "adulatory" address, I am proud to say that the praise bestowed by the Sind Muhammadans upon His Highness was not adulatory. It contained expressions of praise and eulogy, which according to our Oriental style were quite allowable and free of unmerited and undeserved adulation. Sir Aga Khan deserves even our adulation, as he is a most worthy son of our era and we recognize in him the greatest and most distinguished Moslem leader of the day, and whether the Editor of the Sind Gazette appreciates our praise of him or not, it makes not the least difference in our mind and estimation.

Yours faithfully,

S. SAHIB ALI,
KHAIRPUR MIRS, } President, Sind Muhammadan Association.

Fish vs. Fowl.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—With reference to Nawab Serajul Islam's letter in the Statesman of 15th February, while I have much sympathy with the views of the Nawab Sahib, I feel he has attributed to His Highness the Aga Khan thoughts which could never have entered the mind of so courteous and liberal-minded a leader. He compares the rivalry between the proposed Universities at Aligarh and Dacca to a race between a bird and a fish; but he could no more have thought of comparing the people of Eastern Bengal to a fish than he could have likened the Aligarh people to a fowl. With due deference to the Nawab, however, we who live in a land uncommonly fond of fish, should like to know why he implies that a fish is any worse than a fowl!

MAHI MARATAP.

* NOTE:—The writer's statement about the genesis and purpose of the League is not accurate. There is no reason why it should be hostile to the Congress or vice versa. In fact there is every reason why there should be a friendly understanding between the two bodies.—Ed., Comrade.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

Persian official advices report that trade routes in the south are receiving the unremitting attention of Government. The organisation of the gendarmerie and other measures which are being taken are expected to produce the best effect.

Four of the assailants of Consul Smart have been captured and will be imprisoned until the remainder are caught when all will be tried.

The Persian Consul General at Calcutta has received official communication from Teheran to the effect that the Government troops reached Karmanshah on the 8th February and fought with the rebels, defeated them and occupied their strongholds. Salar ud Dowleh, Sirdar Muzaffer and the rest of the rebels fled.

Reuter understands that it is practically decided that only £200,000 and not £400,000 will be advanced to Persia by England and Russia. This is regarded as sufficient for immediate purposes. The question of a more substantial loan will probably be discussed afterwards.

A message to the Daily Telegraph from St. Petersburg states that in addition to advances to Persia of £100,000 each from the British and Russian Governments, arrangements have been agreed upon for a loan of five or six million sterling to be provided by an Anglo-French syndicate on behalf of Great Britain and Russia.

There is every reason to believe that the ex-Shah will shortly leave for Europe.

Referring to Persia in his speech in the House of Commons on the 14th instant Mr. Asquith said that the Government's policy in Persia was unchanged. It aimed at a stable native Government and the preservation of the understanding with Russia, which it is believed, was essential for such Government for our interests and those of the world. A not inconsiderable number of Russian troops had already been withdrawn. The Government was given to understand that the withdrawal of the whole was not only contemplated but was in process of being carried out. Mr. Asquith said that of the proposed loan, Russia was providing £100,000, the Government of India £50,000, and the Home Government £50,000. That loan was absolutely essential for the effective administration and maintenance of order. He believed it would be necessary hereafter to supplement it by a much larger measure of financial aid.

Lord Crewe in his speech in the House of Lords on the 14th instant said with regard to the southern roads that the Government was strongly opposed to direct intervention in Persian affairs. From the Indian point of view, anything like direct interference was thoroughly objectionable. They had no desire to send Indian troops to Persia. That was not the purpose for which the Indian army existed and the difficulties confronting our forces there were always likely to be severe. In such circumstances we must always bear in mind the peculiar position Persia held in regard to the Muhammadan community in India. That alone made us adverse to undue interference. The troops now in Persia, added Lord Crewe, were only there to strengthen the Consular Guards.

Teheran, January 19.

ANDRASSIAN, an Armenian Persian subject, the principal member of the Armenian community at Tabriz, will be court-martialled to-morrow on the ground of complicity in the recent fighting. A number of petitions have been addressed to the Russian Minister, and the Armenian Archbishop of Isfahan has implored the British Minister to exercise his good offices. The British Consul is interesting himself to secure that Andrassian may be allowed to call witnesses.

Petros Andrassian, the leader of the Armenian community, was hanged yesterday at Tabriz by order of the Russian Court-martial.

Washington, January 22.

The last chapters in the story of the collapse of the Persian experiment in American-administered finance are, so far as the American public is concerned, losing nothing in the telling. The assertion is made to-day in telegrams from Teheran that a plot has been discovered to kill one of the American officials, so as to draw the United States Government into the controversy. Mr. Cairns in a telegram to the World made the same statement a short time ago, and in a telegram to Mr. Sulzer, Chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, implored Mr. Sulzer to persuade the State Department to use its good offices with the Persian Government to ensure for himself and his colleagues an immediate release from Persian service and a substantial pecuniary recompense. Mr. Shuster, too, has furnished the World from Vienna with a revised edition of his views upon the politics of the Middle East. His statement contains no real addition to his previous expressions of opinion, but as composed not in the heat of the political fray at Teheran but after apparently a restful journey, it is perhaps worthy of partial reproduction. After saying that he lost 35 pounds in weight during his strenuous stay in Persia, but has gained 15 pounds since leaving, he continued:—

The Persian condition is one of absolute anarchy and robbery. The country is in the control of seven Persian officials, who are devoid of character and honesty, and who are despised by their own people, who know that their seizing of the reins of government is illegal and unconstitutional. Their continuance in power is only made possible by the support of the Russian and British Government. All hopes of Persia's self-government at present seem futile. If it had been left to itself, without interference from interested European nations, it might have recovered its prosperity, with its finances placed upon a sound basis and with a proper form of Constitutional Government firmly established.

England made a costly mistake in not holding Russia strictly to the terms of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which would then have checked Russia's action and might have prevented the serious trouble which is probable in the future. Far from being upon a more solid basis of friendship Britain and Russia are now face to face on opposite sides of a disorganized territory.

And Muhammadans are still further aroused against the Christian nations.

Neither Mr. Cairns's telegrams nor Mr. Shuster's interview, nor to-day's Teheran telegrams have so far evoked any comment in the Press. In November, when Mr. Shuster began his campaign in the newspapers, I reported current American opinion. It was, broadly speaking, that Persia was being badly treated, and this may still be considered to stand. It is well understood that the American official attitude is one of complete neutrality. Were one of the Americans to be maltreated in any way, the State Department would presumably take the steps usual in any such case where an American citizen is concerned. The American Minister at Teheran was instructed last week to do what he could unofficially to help Mr. Shuster's subordinates.

Washington, January 23.

In the course of an interview with the Paris correspondent of the Associated Press, Mr. Shuster said:—

Persia's salvation rests with England, and England alone, for only England can check the encroachments of Russia. Only the awakening of the public conscience in England can give to ancient Persia a vestige of respectable self-government.

In a slightly different communication to a representative of the World, Mr. Shuster talked of Russian dishonesty and British cowardice.

We have received from Mr. Shuster, who is still in Paris, the following telegram:—

I am reported in your Washington despatch of 23rd January as using the expression "British cowardice." I have never thought of, much less employed, any such expression.

While welcoming Mr. Shuster's denial, we would point out that our Washington Correspondent quoted the obnoxious expression from an interview published in the New York World. The inaccuracy, therefore, is not ours.

Teheran, January 25.

Slightly over 1,000 Russians have now reached Kushan, or Kabushan, to the north-west of Meshed, and 1,000 have arrived at Meshed with 21 guns. The detachments which were recently withdrawn from Kazvin to Resht are gradually returning to Kazvin. I understand that it is proposed for the present to maintain a minimum of 2,000 Russian troops at Kazvin.

Samad Khan, who is now all-powerful at Tabriz, is in communication with the ex-Shah's agents at Zenjan, Resht, and Mazandaran, with a view to effecting a concentration of their forces at Mianeh, between Tabriz and Kazvin. The Russian Foreign Office would appear to be entirely hostile to such a project, but unfortunately the Russian Consulates, especially at Resht, seem subject to adverse influences. It is stated here, however, that the two Governments are likely to come to an arrangement shortly with Persia for the final removal of the ex-Shah from the scene.

Tripoli, January 18 (delayed by Censor)

AT NOON today the Turks attacked in force the Italian at Gargaresh. Sustained fighting continued for five hours, the Turks being driven off at sunset.

Rome, January 19

There was further fighting all day yesterday in the vicinity of Tripoli, the Italians on advancing towards Gargaresh meeting with determined resistance from a mixed force of Turks and Arabs, which was repulsed with loss. It is believed that the Italians had 50 casualties. The action is described in the following telegram from Tripoli:—

The staff having decided to construct two forts each to contain two companies of infantry, to protect the Gargaresh quarries from which the stone required for the harbour works at Tripoli will be taken, at 7 o'clock yesterday morning a small mixed column under Colonel Amari was moved out from Fort B to begin the necessary works. The cavalry reached the outskirts of the Gargaresh Oasis about 9 o'clock and was fired upon by groups of Arabs and Turks hidden in the oasis. The cavalry, after clearing their front, moved off to the left, unmasking the advancing Grenadier battalion, which took a position a kilometre to the west supported by a battalion of the 52nd Regiment and having the rest of the force in reserve around the tower of Gargaresh.

The covering troops having been thus placed the Engineers began work on the two redoubts to be built. In the meantime the enemy, who had withdrawn under the Italian fire, returned towards 12.30 in remarkable strength and opened a determined attack upon the Grenadiers from the Fonduk-el-Takar and at the same time began an enveloping movement on our right towards the sea. Our artillery, having taken up a position on a height about 500 metres from Gargaresh, opened fire on the attacking and enveloping columns of the enemy, while the Grenadiers and the 52nd Infantry formed up at the western extremity of the oasis to await the assault. Our position extended from the tower of Gargaresh to the western side of the oasis along the rising ground at a height of 20 metres above the level of the sea. The enemy delivered several successive attacks upon this position from the south-west, but all were repulsed by the fire of our infantry and artillery.

Before half-past 3 o'clock the Arabs and Turks were in full retreat towards the Fonduk-el-Takar, our guns continuing to punish them severely as they fled. Two more battalions were brought up and General Fara took command, but as the enemy had abandoned all offensive action, the fighting gradually ceased, and towards 5 o'clock only a few Arabs continued firing at long range but without effect. From the disordered retreat of the enemy it was evident that they had suffered severe losses, whereas the Italian casualties were slight. Towards nightfall the noise of firing ceased altogether. Rome, January 21.

News comes from Benghazi of an attack made on the night of the 17th by a body of some 400 Arabs on a blockhouse near that port. The small garrison of the blockhouse succeeded in keeping off the enemy, who finally retired, leaving 29 dead on the ground. The enemy's total loss is, however, said to be very much heavier, since they were exposed during the attack to a raking artillery fire from two neighbouring redoubts.

Gargaresh has been occupied and the fortification works are being proceeded with.

The newspapers this evening contain long and sensational accounts of the bombardment and destruction of Zuara by Italian ships on the morning of the 19th instant. The bombardment began at 7 in the morning and continued until the town was a heap of ruins. It would appear that some ineffectual attempt was made by riflemen on the shore to return the fire, but their shots could not reach the ships. A correspondent of the Giornale d'Italia says:—

By evening Zuara wore the aspect of a town visited by an earthquake. It seemed a tomb. No smoke showed that any life remained in its house. This proves that the confidence placed by the country in its Navy is well merited by the valour of the men to whom our ships are entrusted.

Rome, January 21.

The following pronouncement was made to all the Embassies and Legations here by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs to night:—

In view of the state of war existing between Italy and Turkey, the Royal Government, acting in conformity with the rules of international law, declares that on and after 22nd January the Ottoman shore of the Red Sea extending from Ras Isa to the north of Hodeida to Ras Goulafar (Ghaleleh?) to the south, that is to say the coast between 15° 11' N. lat. and 14° 30' N. lat., will be kept in a state of effective blockade by the naval forces of the kingdom. Neutral ships will be accorded a period—to be fixed by the commander of the blockading force—wherein freely to leave the blockaded places. Vessels attempting to evade the blockading will be proceeded against in conformity with the rules of international war and the treaties in force with neutral Powers. (Reuter.)

Negotiations have been opened by the Turkish Embassy here with the German Admiralty with a view of securing the services of a highly placed officer in the German Navy. The object is that he should devote his attention to the further organization of the Ottoman Navy.

It is stated here that Rear-Admiral Hugh Pigot Williams, who has acted as Naval Adviser to the Turkish Government since 1910 and who has been at London on leave of absence, is not likely to return. In any case, it is pointed out his term of service will terminate in July.—Exchange.

Vienna, January 24.

It is expedient to record a suggestion put forward this morning by the Anti-Aehrenthalian and pro-German Christian Socialist Reichspost as to the possible conditions of peace between Italy and Turkey. Italy, says the Reichspost, must offer other than pecuniary compensation to Turkey, and, as Italy cannot be expected to revoke the annexation of Tripoli and Cyrenaica, the greater part of her East African possession might be offered to Turkey in exchange. Italy would not lose much nor Turkey gain much beyond a formal satisfaction that would, however, afford her the possibility of making an honourable peace.

The family resemblance between this suggestion and the propaganda of sundry inspired German writers last year for the acquisition of Eritrea and the East African possessions of Italy by Germany is too strong not to be noticed. The appearance of the suggestion so soon after Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter's visit to Rome is also remarkable. For some months prior to the Italian expedition to Tripoli the German Foreign Office was credited with cherishing a plan for the creation of such German interests in Tripoli and Cyrenaica as to form a title to territorial "compensations" whenever Italian claims to Tripoli should be realized. The promptness of Italian action precluded, however, the creation of another Agadir in the South-Eastern Mediterranean. The suggestion that Italy should now favour Turkey with "compensations" must inevitably raise the question whether Turkey would be more than the depository of Italian East African possessions. The question is, however, academic, since there is not the slightest probability that Italy would lend herself to so humiliating a comedy.

News from Turkish Sources.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURK")

[Specially Translated for the "Comrade."]

January 20

THE Italian Journals never admit any fact in connection with the War in Tripoli till the details have been furnished by some independent papers. It seems certain now that they received a sufficiently serious check at Khoms, have had 300 casualties on their side. The concentration of troops continues at Naples, Syracuse and Catania. It appears that 50,000 more men will have to be sent to Tripoli in accordance with the requirements of the situation there.

January 21

It would appear from a telegram received in London from Tripoli the day before yesterday that the attacks of the Turco-Arab troops on Derna continue and are delivered one after another. According to the latest news coming from Rome to London, these attacks have now become more serious.

January 22.

A telegram from Vienna says that in spite of official denials from Rome, it is certain that General Canova will be replaced by General Francini.

January 23.

The French Ambassador presented himself at the Sublime Porte and had an interview with the Minister for Foreign Affairs in connection with the arrest of the 29 members of the Red Crescent Mission who were going to Tripoli via Tunis. M. Bompard, after having received the assurances of Assm Bey that the members were not going to form part of the Army, informed the latter that the French Government had decided to exert itself to secure from the Italian Government the immediate release of the members arrested from the French boat along with their equipment and the money which belonged to the Red Crescent Mission.

January 24

The Minister for War has sent us the following communiqué — "A telegram received from Enver Bey, dated the 16th December 1911, announces the fact that 7,000 Italian reservists mutinied at Derna and have been repatriated."

On 5th January a column of the enemy composed of three arms came near Qarq-Jareh (Gargareth) with the intention of occupying Zanzar. A force composed of Regulars and Arab combatants attacked the Italian column. A violent battle lasting three hours and a half took place, as a result of which the enemy was forced to evacuate one after the other two lines of defence which they were occupying. Towards the evening, protected by darkness, and under the cover of reinforcement which had been sent from Tripoli, the Italian column abandoned its last line of defence and withdrew to the trenches which they had dug round the town of Tripoli. The enemy's forces which consisted of a regiment of infantry, one battery of artillery and one squadron of cavalry, had 150 killed. We captured many men together with a large quantity of arms and ammunition and lost on our side 15 killed and some wounded.

ON the 15th December last, the Italians coming towards Derna with the intention of advancing in a southerly direction, with seven battalions of infantry and eight pieces of mountain battery, reappeared in three columns. An encounter took place six kilometres to the south of Derna in which our regulars and Arab Volunteers took part. The enemy beat a retreat, but the attacks of the Ottoman army changed the retreat into a fight. The chase continued till the evening when the Italians took refuge in the entrenchments which have been made by them round the town, having abandoned 200 fusils, two mitrailleuses, 25 cases of projectiles of mountain batteries, two pieces of cannon, ten camels and a great deal of munitions. The Italian losses were 200 killed, including one Colonel, two Captains, many officers of lesser rank and non-commissioned officers. The number of their wounded has not yet been ascertained, but it is very great. Our losses were 15 killed and 25 wounded. From the declarations of the prisoners it would appear that the Italian soldiers do not desire war any further. The morale of our troops is excellent. The Commander at Benghazi announces that in a few days another tribe will join our forces.

A telegram received from Enver Bey announces the fact that 690 francs found on the persons of the Italian soldiers killed in the fight near Derna have been sent by post to the Italian Minister of War to be remitted to their families. On the other hand, the Italians pride themselves on having taken possession of the money belonging to the Red Crescent Mission which was intended to purchase necessities and supply the other needs of our wounded. This is proof enough of our great humanity. The fact is characteristic and would go a long way in forming public opinion as regards the conduct of the Italian Government and that of Ottoman soldiers.

January 25.

The Paris Humanité publishes the interview of Jean Longuet with a Turkish personage of importance relating to the difficulties of the Italian situation in Tripoli of which they occupy but a twentieth part. The Italians are experiencing great and serious financial embarrassment. They attempted to raise 300 million francs in France, but the French refused to advance the money.

French Neutrality.

Paris, January 22.

THE Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Raymond Poincaré, received an ovation in the Chamber of Deputies to-day, when, in reply to questions by Admiral Bienaimé (Paris), M. Guernier (Saint Malo), and M. Laroche (Sarthe), he informed the Chamber of the steps that had been taken by the French Government to secure reparation for the Italian seizure of French mail boats.

The points upon which the House desired information were the circumstances of the arrest of the Tunis bound mail steamers Carthage and Manoubia on the high seas by Italian destroyers on the 16th and 17th instant, the reasons for the detention of these vessels by the Italian authorities at Cagliari, and, above all, the origin and nature of the representations as a result of which the commander of the Manoubia was induced to surrender a party of 29 accredited members of the Turkish Red Crescent Society bound for Tripoli via Tunis. MM. Guernier and Laroche drew particular attention to the stipulations of the Hague Convention with regard to mail steamers, which, as they pointed out, were fortified in the case of France and Italy by the Franco-Italian Convention of 1875, entitling the mail-boats of the two countries to the same treatment as that accorded to vessels of war. All the speakers were agreed that a serious affront to the French national honour had taken place, and Admiral Bienaimé declared that France would, if necessary, have to "see this business through."

M. Poincaré, who had previously announced that he would return a joint reply to the questions raised by the three speakers, immediately went to the tribune and, amid tense silence, stated the French case. At noon on the 15th instant the regular Tunis mail steamer Carthage of the Compagnie Transatlantique, left Marseilles for Tunis. The steamer carried an aeroplane consigned by the owner, Duval, in his own name, to Tunis. On the 16th instant, on the high seas, 17 miles off Sardinia, the steamer encountered an Italian destroyer, which fired a blank shot and signalled to her to stop and sent a naval officer on board to search the ship. An Italian officer demanded that the aeroplane should be landed at Cagliari, the nearest Italian port, or destroyed on the spot. The French commander refused to comply, and the Carthage was ordered to proceed under escort to Cagliari, where the demand that the aeroplane should be landed was renewed. The French commander again refused, and his ship was placed under arrest.

Already during the evening of the 16th the French Government had been apprised by the French Vice-Consul at Cagliari of the seizure of the Carthage at sea, and the same night the French Charge d'Affaires in Rome was instructed to take steps to secure the immediate release of the vessel. The Italian Government replied that it had received definite information to the effect that the aeroplane shipped in the Carthage was intended for the Turkish forces in Tripoli, but that the ship would be allowed to proceed if the machine were put ashore at Cagliari. Continuing his statement M. Poincaré explained, amid loud cheers, that he had declined to accede to this demand or to the further Italian suggestion that the French Government should give an undertaking that the authorities in Tunis should keep the aeroplane under surveillance and see that it did not reach the Turks. At this point M. Duval, senior, father of the owner of the machine, came to the Quai d'Orsay of his own accord and informed the Foreign Office that his son had entered for competitions at various aviation meetings in Tunis, Egypt, and Greece, that the aeroplane was not intended for any belligerent Power, and that reliance could be placed on his assurances. The French Charge d'Affaires in Rome was instructed to communicate this voluntary declaration to the Italian Government, which accepted it and ordered the Carthage to be released.

The Prime Minister interrupted his narrative in order to explain the view taken by international law as regards the treatment of aeroplanes as contraband. After premising that the French Government could not accept the Italian contentions on the subject M. Poincaré reviewed the difficulties of the question. The Hague Conference of 1907 had not settled the conditional aspect of the contraband character of aeroplanes. The Declaration of London which had not been generally ratified had been more explicit, including aeroplanes as conditional contraband, which might be made absolute if special notice were given by the belligerent, but Italy, who had adhered to this Declaration, had not included aeroplanes in her list of absolute contraband issued at the beginning of last October. Thus being the case, the French Government contended that aeroplanes might lawfully be conveyed from one neutral port to another neutral port. The Carthage, moreover, was a mail boat. Italy had, therefore, committed an error to the detriment both of French rights and of French interests. The late Foreign Minister, M. de Selves, had already made the French position perfectly clear in a communication to the Italian Government, and the French point of view had remained unchanged.

There was, unhappily, a second affair, the case of the Manouba. On the 5th instant M. de Selves, who was still Foreign Minister at that date, was officially informed by the Turkish Embassy in Paris that a second Turkish Red Crescent Mission was being fitted out for Tripoli, and the French Government was requested to grant the usual facilities for the members of the party, a complete list of whose names was duly submitted. On the 12th instant the Turkish Government was informed by M. de Selves that facilities would be granted, and the French authorities in Tunis were notified of the Turkish Mission's impending arrival. At the same time the French Government stipulated that the character of the mission should not be vitiated by the inclusion of any persons who were not members of the Turkish Red Crescent Society. The French Government had, therefore, taken every precaution. Unfortunately, that Government had not been informed of the exact date upon which, or of the particular boat in which, the mission intended to sail from Marseilles. This omission was regrettable, since it had been impossible to communicate with the French Charge d'Affaires in Rome, who would thus have been in possession of all the facts of the case. On the 16th instant the Turkish mission sailed from Marseilles in the Manouba bound for Tunis. On the following day the Italian Ambassador, Signor Tittoni, called at the Foreign Office to oppose the passage across the Tunisian frontier into Tripoli of the 29 Turks in a group who were on board the Manouba, and who, as the Italian Government had reason to believe, were Turkish officers. M. Poincaré, as Foreign Minister, demurred to the Italian stipulation, and replied that every precaution had been taken by the French Government beforehand, but that the Tunisian authorities would be instructed to make doubly sure of the professional character of the members of the mission on their arrival. Instructions in this sense were immediately sent to Tunis. The French assurances ought to have sufficed to preserve the Manouba from seizure and even from search. Unhappily, before Signor Tittoni's account of his conversation at the Quai d'Orsay could reach his Government an Italian warship had taken the deplorable initiative of arresting the Manouba and conducting her to Cagliari. The Vice Consul at that port was immediately instructed that the members of the Turkish mission were not to be surrendered. The French Foreign Office message, however, reached Cagliari in an indecipherable condition and had to be returned to Paris. In the meantime the Italian Government informed the French Charge d'Affaires in Rome that there were 29 Turkish officers on board the Manouba and that they would have to be landed before the vessel could be allowed to proceed.

The Italian Government relied upon Article 47 of the Declaration of London by virtue of which individual members of the armed forces of the enemy found on board a neutral vessel may be made prisoners of war, even though there be no ground for capture of the vessel. The Charge d'Affaires, who did not know that the Turkish passengers in the Manouba were members of the Red Crescent Mission, reflected that grave difficulties might arise over an incident of this kind, and consequently instructed the French Vice Consul at Cagliari to assent to the surrender of the Turkish passengers. The Charge d'Affaire's took this action upon the strength of the Italian assurances that the Turks were officers.

At this point the Prime Minister, with marked deliberation, recalled the principle that neither in international nor in common law could fraudulent intent (fraude) be imputed without proof. M. Poincaré repeated that it was the French Government's duty to inquire into the character of the members of the Turkish mission and that every precaution with regard to the mission had been taken. Representations in this sense were made to the Italian Government, accompanied by an expression of hope that incidents of this kind would not recur. Satisfactory assurances had been obtained from the Italian Government, and a pledge that operations such as the exercise of the right of search necessitated by the war in which Italy was engaged would be conducted with the consideration which one friendly nation was entitled to expect from another. The Italian Government had further undertaken to notify the French authorities of any shipments in French ports which in the Italian view might be open to suspicion.

The Prime Minister concluded his statement by declaring that provided that the captured Turkish passengers were given up by Italy, these assurances might be regarded as an earnest of an early and satisfactory settlement of the recent incidents, which ought not to be allowed to disturb friendly relations between two Powers united by so many common memories and by a great common civilization. The relations of France and Italy rested upon race affinities and upon the identity of a large number of their respective interests. If necessary, resort might be had to the Franco-Italian Arbitration Agreements of 1903 and 1908. In any case, he added, a passing cloud could not darken the horizon.

In order to bring out clearly the Prime Minister's attitude with regard to eventual negotiations I append the text of an essential passage of his speech as given by the official Parliamentary report. After referring to the recent Italian assurances as an earnest of an early settlement of the incidents, M. Poincaré continued—

"I have no doubt that after the Turkish passengers have been given up (loud and continued cheers) a settlement may be reached directly in the course of friendly conversations. If by chance any disputed points should remain in suspense, the Arbitration Agreement of 1903 between France and Italy, which was renewed in 1908, would afford a natural means of settling outstanding differences in an amicable spirit. (Loud cheer.)"

M. Poincaré returned to his seat amid loud and continued cheers from every part of the House, including a number of Socialist benches.

The oldest frequenters of the Chamber say that never in their experience has a French Foreign Minister been so cordially cheered by the whole House after making a statement on an international difficulty.

The seizure of the French mail boats raises points in international law which particularly interest the British Empire, since the vessels were not proceeding to a belligerent port or to a port of a foreign neutral, but were sailing between two French ports. In the case of the Carthage, even if the aeroplane on board had been absolute contraband of war, which it certainly was not failing any Italian declaration to that effect at the beginning of the war, it had not left French territory, but was on board a French vessel and was admittedly being conveyed to a French port. Even the presumption, that an article of absolute contraband would ultimately leave French territory for that of Italy's enemy would not justify Italian action or even Italian representations, since The Hague Convention No. V, Article 7, lays it down that "a neutral Power is not under any obligation to prevent the exportation or transit for one or the other of the belligerents of arms, ammunition, or in general anything which may be serviceable to an army or a fleet."

As regards the Turks on board the Manouba, Article 47 of the Declaration of London certainly says that "any individual embodied in the armed forces of the enemy who is found on board a neutral merchant vessel may be made a prisoner of war, even though there be no ground for the capture of the vessel." It is evident, however, that, even if the Turkish Red Crescent party were ultimately proved to include possible belligerents, the case of a vessel plying between two French ports on its regular service is one which requires special consideration, and may have to be dealt with in general terms in any future revision of international law. There appears to be nothing in the text of the Declaration of London which would secure immunity, for example, for a neutral British merchantman proceeding from one British port to another and carrying nationals of a belligerent Power which naval forces of the other belligerent should seek to capture. The situation in such circumstances would manifestly become intolerable.

Constantinople, January 22.

The Porte has protested to the French Government and other Powers against the arrest of the Red Crescent Mission proceeding to Tripoli on board the Manouba by Italian warships. The Porte has received information leading to the hope that France will insist on their liberation and repatriation. The surrender of the men to the Italian authorities has created a painful impression in Turkish official circles. — Reuter

Geneva, January 22.

M. Gustave Ador, the President of the International Red Cross Committee, has received from the Red Crescent Society in Constantinople a formal protest against the arrest of the Members of the Red Crescent Mission on board the Manouba. The protest was forwarded to the Italian Red Cross Society this evening. — Reuter.

Rome, January 23

The Popolo Romano recognizes the friendly tone of the declarations made by M. Poincaré in the French Chamber, which, it says, cannot fail to produce a good effect on public opinion in Italy. It contests, however, the justice of some of his statements. According to the Ministerial journal, a neutral Power is under an obligation to prevent the transit of arms and munitions of war, and it instances the action of Lord Kitchener in sequestering cargo at Alexandria intended for the Turks, and that of the French Government itself in arresting the Russian ship Odesa at Sfax. The Popolo Romano disregards the assurances received by the French Government that the passengers on board the Manouba belonged to the Red Crescent. If they are recognized by the authorities at Cagliari as really belonging to the medical profession there can be no doubt of their release.

Paris, January 25

According to some accounts, the result of the Italian examination of the Turkish captives at Cagliari is that three were found to be doctors, 21 ambulance or hospital attendants, and the remaining five administrative officers of the Red Crescent Society. Other accounts, however, state that some of the party, probably the "administrative officers of the Red Crescent," are regarded as possible combatants, and that the eventual treatment of these suspected persons forms one of the difficulties in the negotiations that are being assiduously pursued between the French Ambassador, M. Barrère, and the Italian Foreign Minister in Rome.

There is the larger question, however, of the French demand that all the prisoners should be restored to the protection of the French flag before any arrangements are made for arbitration on the Carthage and Manouba incidents. French public opinion, in accordance with the declared attitude of the Government, insists upon the unconditional return of the Turks to France. The Italian Government seems to want certain preliminary assurances as to what France will do with any of the prisoners whom on delivery she may find to be combatants. The solution that Italy herself should simply liberate the captives seems to be regarded as very unsatisfactory from the French point of view. It ought to be added, however, that reticence regarding the negotiations is observed in Paris, with a view, doubtless, to facilitating some arrangement which would be in accordance with the dignity of both Powers and would leave no sting behind.

According to information received from Rome by the Lancet the situation is unchanged, and after an hour's conversation this morning M. Barrère and the Marquis di San Giuliano "had not found a formula for the settlement of the incident to the satisfaction of the public opinion of both countries."

So far as can be made out, two alternatives are offered by Italy — either that France, in the event of the restoration of the captives to her protection, should give assurances as to the destination of any of them whom she may find to be combatants, or that Italy should herself liberate them all without distinction. Neither proposal would be satisfactory to France.

A protest against the detention of the Red Crescent Mission has been addressed from Tunis to Rifaat Pasha, Turkish Ambassador in Paris, by Dr Kerim Sabat, a member of the Red Crescent Society now on duty in Tripoli. He says that it was he who telegraphed to Constantinople for reinforcements for the ambulance staff, and that the detention of the mission is causing serious prejudice to the work of the ambulance corps, which is conducted in the field for the benefit of Turks and Italians alike.

It is noted that a German Red Cross Mission arrived this morning without let or hindrance on board the German steamboat Fria at Goletta. The German Consul presented the mission at the French Residency-General in Tunis, and it will proceed at once in the Fria to Sidi-bou, near the Tripolitan frontier, which it will cross at Bengardane and then be taken in charge by a Turkish escort.

Constantinople, January 22

An Imperial Iradeh appointing Hadji Adil Bey, ex Vali of Adrianople and Secretary-General of the Central Committee of Union and Progress, to be Minister of the Interior, was issued to-day. The new Minister has had considerable administrative experience, especially in the Customs Administration, and is believed to be of a more moderate and conciliatory disposition than some of his colleagues in the Committee. Talat Bey is believed to have been offered the Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs, and the Press hints at the approaching nomination of David Bey as Minister of Public Works.

Prince Said Halim of Egypt, son of Halim Pasha, uncle of the Khedive Ismail, has been appointed President of the Council of State. The appointment, which is presumably a reward for services rendered to the Government in inducing a number of Senators to acquiesce in the dissolution of Parliament, by a reversion to a practice abandoned during the last two years, carries Cabinet rank with it.

The Minister of Marine has resigned and no successor has been appointed. Ayub Sabri Bey, an ex-officer and a prominent member of the Committee of Union and Progress since its formation, has been appointed Secretary to the General Organization in place of Hadji Adil Bey.

January 24

Ahmed Riza Bey, the Speaker of the Turkish Parliament, has been appointed a Senator. He was called to the Speakership by the vote of the Committee Party out of recognition for the integrity and strength of purpose shown by him on behalf of the Constitutional cause, and naturally lacked Parliamentary experience. At first he made several mistakes, both within and without the Chamber, which were criticized more severely than they perhaps deserved. Accusations of partisanship, however, have been much less frequent during the last two Sessions, when he often showed considerable force of character not uncombined with fairness.

Talat Bey has accepted the portfolio of Posts and Telegraphs.

January 25

The Grand Vizier is suffering from a mild form of chickenpox which will compel him to keep his room for some days longer.

January 26

Said Pasha is still confined to his house, and some anxiety has been caused by recent symptoms of more serious trouble than the original bronchial catarrh. Assim Bey has been temporarily entrusted with the signature of State documents on his behalf.

Sofia, January

According to a telegram from Salonika the court-martial at Ishtib, which is sitting with closed doors, has already condemned to death eight Bulgarians, two Jews, three gipsies and six Turks. Another court-martial is sitting at Velos. The Turkish authorities state that a conflict occurred on the 17th instant in the district of Kratovo between a force of 200 Gendarmes and a Bulgarian band numbering 10 men. Four Bulgarians, including the chief of the band, and four Gendarmes were killed. Preparations are being made at Uskub for the arrival of fresh troops.

The Week.

Anglo-German Relations.

REUTER wires from Berlin on the 15th.—Mr. Asquith's speech is greeted with entire sympathy in official circles here, where it is stated that the work begun by Lord Haldane is now being carried on along the usual channels.

Mr. Asquith's speech in the House of Commons is generally welcomed by papers of all shades in England and Germany and the hope is expressed that the statesmen will earnestly press their efforts to a satisfactory settlement.

Reuter wires from Berlin on the 15th.—During the debate on the estimates several members having referred to Mr. Asquith's speech of the 14th Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg expressed himself in harmony with Mr. Asquith and added that Lord Haldane though not authorised to conclude binding agreements was yet acting on behalf of the Cabinet and discussed with the German Ministers the points on which the interests of the two countries came into contact in order to establish the basis of confidential relations. The Chancellor continued: "This exchange of views, which we gladly welcomed, took place in the course of numerous exhaustive and frank conversations and will be continued. (Cheers.) I am unable to say at present, but I wished to acquaint the Reichstag as early as possible with these conversations and their object."

The Tägliche Rundschau states that Baron Von Stuma of the German Foreign Office will probably proceed to London to assist Count Wolff-Metternich, the German Ambassador, in further negotiations, while the King and the Kaiser exchange visits. The paper adds that a British squadron will call at the German ports in the course of the year.

The Frankfurter Zeitung states that negotiations between London and Berlin continue to be carried on and Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, Imperial Chancellor, is personally conducting them from Germany.

Lord Haldane, speaking at Leeds, said he had cause to be thankful for his cosmopolitan University education. When he went to Berlin, he said, he met men of high standing. That training had enabled him to enter into conversations of a highly miscellaneous character and to see things through German spectacles and realize how matters struck them.

Sir Edward Grey, speaking at Manchester, said the year had begun auspiciously. The King's visit to India was a conspicuous example of what a sovereign could render to the Empire, showing, as it did, his sense of public duty and his keen interest in the prosperity of the countries and in the welfare of the people at home and over seas.

Sir Edward Grey pointed out that the language used by Mr. Asquith recently, in connection with Lord Haldane's visit to Germany, was reciprocated in the same tone in Berlin.

In the speeches of Mr. Asquith and Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg there was considerable reticence and reserve. He must also observe the same restraint but this did not imply any lack of cordiality. He trusted that something would be achieved which would remain permanent and which would dispel some of the mists of suspicion and distrust due to unfounded rumours. England and Germany, he said, were great industrial nations and in the interest of their peoples there must be peace. He had no fear of any permanent estrangement of the public opinions of the two countries, provided the truth got a fair chance.

Mr. Asquith, he said, had disposed of one great untruth—that we last year meditated an unprovoked attack on Germany. There was never the least foundation for such a suspicion. There was nothing in the movements of our ships, there was nothing in anything we did to warrant the belief that we ever thought of being ourselves the first to break the peace, or encouraging or provoking anyone else to break it, and if the mephitic vapours generated by such rumours had been dissipated, he trusted there would be no further occasion for suspicion or distrust or diplomatic tension.

Sir Edward Grey, speaking at Manchester said we had special relationships and friendships with certain Powers which we mean to preserve but therein there was nothing being contemplated to an unprovoked aggressive policy towards other Powers. Our naval strength was essential and no other nation ought to be offended if we have a margin of strength against any probable combination likely to be brought against us.

The Government is trustee for the people that the power to defend itself is properly preserved. Our people's interest is peace. We also have to see expressed in our policy the wish of the people that we should not be aggressive ourselves.

Referring to the serious situation in regard to the coal dispute, he said the probability of a universal coal strike is a most serious question in the minds of everybody in this country. If the strike proceeds to worst consequences no one can say how much of national prosperity may be recovered.

Reuter wires from Berlin on the 16th. In the Reichstag to-day—Herr Ledebour, Socialist, said the Socialists wanted a policy of peace and friendship. He thought Kiauchau should be restored to the Chinese Republic. He further attacked the Agreement between England and "barbaric" Russia for plundering Persia.

Herr von Kiderlen Waechter, replying, made a strong protest against an unprecedented attack on a friendly nation. He proceeded to defend the Government's Moroccan policy and asserted that it was never intended that Germany should gain a foothold in Morocco.

Reform of the Lords.

IN THE House of Commons on the 19th Mr. F. E. Smith in moving the opposition amendment to the address recalled various Ministerial pledges and pronouncements on the subject of the Reform of the Lords, including the statement by Mr. Asquith that it would brook no delay. Finally, he quoted Mr. Asquith's declaration that it was an obligation of honour that reform should be carried out within the lifetime of the present Parliament, if time permitted. Mr. Smith said it was necessary to revise our ethical categories. There were, he said, honourable men and dishonourable men, and honourable men if time permitted. No more flagrant shuffling had ever been attempted by a responsible Minister.

Sir J. A. Simon said Mr. Smith was arguing on the unfounded assumption that when the Lords were reconstituted on liberal lines, the difficulty of carrying Home Rule would be increased. The electors at the last election were fully aware that Home Rule would follow the passing of the Parliament Bill.

Sir J. A. Simon asked Mr. Bonar Law if it was intended to repeal the Parliament Act when the Unionists were returned to power. Mr. Bonar Law replied "We shall not repeal the Act except simultaneously with the reform of the Second Chamber."

Mr. Montagu maintained that it was the natural and logical order that Home Rule, Welsh Disestablishment and plural voting be taken before the reform of the Lords.

The debate was adjourned.

In a letter to the press replying to Mr. Bonar Law's charges of corruption the Master of Elibank denies that public money is being spent on the Liberal Insurance propaganda.

Speaking in the House of Commons to-night Mr. Austen Chamberlain denied the moral competence of Parliament to deal with great measures while the Constitution was mutilated and deranged. He asked what moral sanction the laws thus passed would have.

Mr. Asquith replying said that the only definite statement made regarding the time of the Reform of the Lords was that it was proposed to carry it out during the present Parliament. He absolutely adhered to that. Everybody knew that the first use made of the Parliament Act would be to carry Home Rule. In his view Parliament was more competent morally and constitutionally to deal with great measures of Reform than it had ever been in the lifetime of any member. Mr. Asquith went on to say that the proper time to reconstitute the Second Chamber was not before but after Ireland had been given freedom to deal with its own affairs on lines which in the main principles might be followed with regard to the other parts of the kingdom. It was wiser and more expedient in every way to delay specific proposals till those lines had been decided. Replying to an interjection, Mr. Asquith said he did not mean that reconstitution should be delayed till the other parts of the kingdom had been dealt with. Continuing he said that with those lines settled they would be in a far better position to deal with the distribution of local and Imperial business, composition of the Second Chamber and the relative functions of the two chambers in the evergrowing responsibilities of the Empire. There was therefore no task more solemn or more responsible to which legislation could address itself.

Mr. Bonar Law wound up the debate in the House of Commons. His speech was loudly cheered, his supporters intimating that the speech would give Mr. Asquith ample opportunity of defending the Government regarding the charges of corruption. They declare that the absence of any reference to Tariff Reform from the amendment did not mean that the Opposition were weakening on that subject. They point out that the Unionists would not have chosen him as their leader unless they had known that Tariff Reform would be pressed without the smallest hesitation.

On a division, Mr. Smith's amendment to the address was rejected by 324 votes to 241.

Indians in the Transvaal.

IN THE House of Lords on the 19th Lord Ampthill raised a debate on the question of Indians in the Transvaal. He asked regarding the allegations that the Portuguese at Mozambique forcibly detained Indians while the Union Government permits were being examined with the likelihood of their deportation to India in consequence of the expiry of Delagoa Bay permits, whether minors were not allowed to accompany their parents and whether the Government had communicated with the Union on the subject. Lord Ampthill said the Indian question was more than ever of enormous public importance.

Lord Emmott said the Colonial Office had no official information but if representations were made, Mr. Harcourt would consult Lord Gladstone in the matter.

Lord Ampthill replied that he was surprised that the Government had no papers on the subject. It was pitifully disappointing that the matter should be allowed to remain where it stood. It was idle to say that they could not interfere with a self-governing Colony. He pointed out that all the good derived from the momentous Durbar celebrations was being undone by the bitterness and resentment arising from this question.

Lord Emmott said he believed that the relations of the communities in South Africa had improved and would continue to improve. He promised that papers should be laid on the table relating to the working of the Gold Law and Townships Amendment Act. He emphasised that the Union Ministers did honestly try to meet the Government on important points.

Lord Selbourne thought that the complexity and difficulty of the question were not realised in Great Britain and in India. He earnestly desired a settlement for the sake of South Africa quite as much as for India. He did not desire to underrate the strength of the Indian case, but it was necessary to understand the South African side. It was a question of comparative systems of Eastern and Western civilization. He explained the seriousness of the Indian competition and considered that if immigration were unrestricted the European trader would disappear from South Africa.

Lord Selbourne proceeded to draw a picture of English tradesmen in town after town being replaced by Chinamen and the same in Bond Street and Regent Street, and asked if English opinion would then remain as impartial and neutral as now or if land in India were all passing into the hands of Europeans surely the Indian Government and the public in India would legislate to prevent it. It was not a sound basis to say that all the King's subjects had the same rights in all parts of the Empire. It was a truer basis that the special interest of each part should have the first consideration. Surely everyone would agree that in India, what was foremost was the welfare of the people of India, and South Africans asked that the interests of South Africa should have the first consideration. They desired to restrict future immigration while treating the domiciled Indian fairly.

Lord Selbourne went on to sketch the history of the trouble. He showed that South Africans became frightened at the extent of the immigration and therefore introduced legislation. He affirmed that he realised to the fullest the position of Indians and he wished the House to understand that the action of the Transvaal was not gratuitous but was based on great anxiety. There were many reasonable and honourable Indians on the one hand and the Union Government on the other to make a settlement wholly possible, and it would be as disastrous to South Africa if the question remained unsettled as it would to India. (Cheers.)

Lord Crewe said he hoped that he put the position clearly at the Imperial Conference and he thought Lord Ampthill was a little pessimistic in thinking that the conversations at the Conference had no result. He testified to the goodwill of the Union Ministers but was afraid that goodwill was not universal in South Africa, as there had been a good deal of prejudice and jealousy beyond what was justified by trade competition. He deprecated the treatment of educated Indians and said there had been too much loose talk on the question of colour.

Lord Crewe pointed out that there was growing opinion in India against immigration and consequently any attempt to flood South Africa would not be countenanced. His lordship admitted that the action of various Governments had not been taken without provocation. The problem of the passage of Indians through Mozambique was particularly difficult. He asked for specific instances of unfair treatment as it was impossible for Lord Gladstone to go to the Union Ministry with vague complaints. Lord Crewe concluded by saying that undoubtedly any suspicion of public injustice or contemptuous treatment would arouse in India strong indignation. He desired to see the cause of the difficulty cleared away. The matter was then dropped.

[Specially Translated for the "Comrade."]

Official details regarding the engagement near Derna, reported a few days ago by Agence Stefani have been received. The following has been supplied to us by the Ministry of War:

Summary of a report of the Commandant at Benghazi —

On the 15th of December (O.S.) the Italians in Derna came out with seven regiments of Infantry and eight mountain guns with other complements and tried to make an advance in the south from three directions. They were, however, at once engaged by the Ottoman soldiers and Arab mujahids at about 6 kilometres to the south of Derna. They began to retreat, and in consequence of the charge of Osmanli mujahids, the retreat was soon converted into a rout.

As a result of a hot pursuit, extending up to the evening, we captured a considerable amount of stores and ammunition, including two mitrailleuses, two hundred rifles and twenty boxes of mountain gun ammunition and two mountain guns.

They retired behind the fortifications erected by them round Derna.

The loss of the enemy exceeded two hundred, including one major, one captain and a number of officers and petty officers. The number of their wounded is much greater, the exact number could not be ascertained. Our loss comprised 15 shahced and 25 wounded.

From the statements of the prisoners it appears that the Italian soldiers do not want to fight. The prisoners are averse to being sent back and are therefore kept at Headquarters.

Whereas the spirit of the Arab volunteers as well as the soldiers continues to be excellent, a new tribe is expected to join us in a few days.

The following is the Arab manifesto issued in reply to the Italian proclamations. It was considered and unanimously adopted in a large conference composed of all the Sheikhs, leaders and notables of the various Arab tribes, which was held immediately after the receipt of General Canova's proclamation which was dropped in the Arab camp by an Italian aeroplane. —

We read that proclamation of yours, which you gave to your armen that they may drop it in our camp in the presence of our brothers the Turks. We have experienced no difficulty in finding out the object of your proclamation which is simply this that we should throw down our arms and become your loyal and willing subjects. It is a patent fact that the contents of this proclamation are absolutely false and based on misrepresentation. We wish to contradict your impudent assertions in detail. You seem to imagine that the Turks killed and destroyed our ancestors. As far as we can remember, not a single occurrence of the kind has ever happened, that could even partially bear out your false imputation. We have never yet had to complain of any other people having wantonly invaded our country. You are the first to have stained this peaceful and contented land of the Arabs with blood.

You seem to think that the innocent and peace loving inhabitants whom you massacred at "Mesari" were guilty of having made an assault on your troops. The fact is that you took the initiative in killing our innocent people, our children and our women. You not only killed them, but savagely mutilated and hacked them limb by limb. You cut off their noses, ears, hands, feet, eyes, mouths and tongues and threw them about in the public thoroughfares. Thus you gave us an opportunity of acquainting ourselves with your country, your nation, your religion, its civilisation and moral standards. If we had not seen these savage deeds with our own eyes surely we would not have hesitated to believe in your professions.

You tell us that the Italian Government recognises our rights and supports our pre-eminent position. Has the most suitable method of doing this been found in bombarding the mosques just when the people are discharging their religious duties inside them and when the shells burst in their midst? When you wanted to bombard "Nahiba," the minarets and towers of our mosques were in particular made the target of your guns. Is this what is meant by paying legitimate respect to our religious feelings? What proof is there of the allegation that the Turks always keep the Arabs in front of the battle-line, and themselves behind? We the Arabs and the Turks are both the children of the soil of Tripoli. There is no difference and distinction whatever between us. We are like two branches of a single tree which cannot be disunited. The Turks are our instructors and teachers and we appreciate and admire them from the bottom of our hearts. We consider their lives to be more precious than ours, and it is for this reason that we want to constitute ourselves as a sort of shield to them. It is a sufficient proof of their ability and superiority that we gained a decisive victory over you in the "Der Qura" engagement which was the result of the training we had received at their hands. You had a full regiment in the field, while we had not more than 500 men. If it were not for the fact that we obeyed the orders of our Turkish Commanders and stopped from pursuit in obedience to the directions of our officers we would have taken your entire regiment prisoners. Is not this soil our motherland? Is this worthy of your Government which itself belongs to the People of the Book, that it should endeavour, by means of various misrepresentations, machinations and deceptions, by means of savage acts of pillage and slaughter, to injure and exasperate those who are fighting in defence of their dear motherland? We declare it emphatically that we will not abstain from shedding our blood for the sake of these sandy tracts as long as a single individual from amongst us is alive. We have given these solemn and binding injunctions to our children that they may walk in our footsteps and be prepared to defend their country. We advise you simply in your own interest and out of our good will towards you that you should leave our country to us and should not in pursuit of some imaginary glory be the cause of spilling streams of your own blood in a land which is, so to speak, intoxicated with the spirit of valour and self-respect. The bloodshed that you have suffered so far ought to be enough.

The Battle of Gargaresh.

(FROM THE "TANIN.")

[Specially Translated for the "Comrade."]

WE HAD the pleasure of publishing in yesterday's issue well authenticated news of the success of our arms in a recent battle in Qary-Qaresh (Gargaresh) near Tripoli.

Yesterday in the early hours of the morning, too late to be inserted in our yesterday's issue, we received a telegram giving details of the fight from our Special Correspondent Ahmed Shareef Bey. At almost the same time the Ministry of War received official information which completely confirmed our correspondent's telegram and which has already been published by us.

The following is our correspondent's cable. — On Thursday, the 18th January 1912, news having been brought to the Headquarters that the enemy had come out of its defences round the town and was advancing with a very large force composed of all arms (of cavalry, infantry and artillery, with the probable intention of capturing Zanzur. (The Italian reports made out that the advance was made to construct new defences Tannu). A force was at once organised and sent to check the advance of the enemy and other necessary steps were taken. The enemy had come with a brigade including their two crack regiments recently arrived from Italy, supplemented by two batteries of artillery and a number of mitrailleuses.

Our forces much inferior in numbers to the enemy's met them near Qary-Qaresh, and immediately without the least hesitation delivered a vigorous charge. The charge began at about noon and continued without interruption for 3½ hours.

The Italians were twice beaten back each time rallying on a point to offer resistance. In spite of assistance arriving to them in the shape of two fresh batteries of artillery and a regiment of infantry from their base at Tripoli they could not make a stand and retreated for the third time to a point further back. But as a result of an attack of fresh energy and vigour made after sunset combined with a flanking movement of our right against the enemy's left, the enemy's power of resistance was broken and from its third point too it was driven back to the strong defences erected by it in the oasis round the town of Tripoli. The dead left by the Italians on the field of battle numbered more than 150 including ten officers. The number of wounded is proportionately greater. They left behind much munitions of war and arms among which was also found a large quantity of wire entanglements which they use in the construction of their defences.

In this venture the enemy has thoroughly learnt what a conflict with Ottomans in the open, away from the protection of their fleet means.

SHAREEF.

(FROM A "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tripoli, January 20.

THE encounter which took place near Gargaresh the day before yesterday presents some points of special interest, not so much in regard to the actual incidents of the combat as to the circumstances which led up to it and the events which followed. The main

Incidents of the fight will have been in the hands of the public long before this letter can reach England, but a short recapitulation of the events of the day is necessary in order to clear the way for comment.

It had long been obvious that the oasis of Gargaresh ought to be occupied by the Italians, and since the beginning of the year the necessity for occupation had been strengthened by two events—a nocturnal raid on the oasis under the very nose of the Italian Fort B and the decision to proceed at once with the work of constructing the new harbour of Tripoli. The tone for the masonry of the port lay ready to hand in the quarries of Gargaresh and it became imperative to secure the position.

With this object a column was sent out on the morning of the 18th, a stronger column than would have been considered necessary ten days ago, before the reports of the enemy's concentration at Snani beni Aden had been confirmed and the world of Tripoli had been startled by the news of lawless depredations committed upon peaceful Arab citizens living almost under the walls of the city. The column consisted of the 52nd Regiment (three battalions), one battalion of Grenadiers, a battery of mountain guns and two field guns and two squadrons of the Gudi cavalry (in all about 3,000 men). There was a certain amount of critical discussion as to the excessive strength of the force despatched to cover the work of fortifying the position, but events proved that the dispositions of the authorities were based upon information more trustworthy than that which was available for their critics. And in any case, when prudence cost nothing and troops are in actual need of exercise and change, it is hardly fair to condemn the employment of many where few would probably have been sufficient.

The advancing column commanded by Colonel Amari of the 52nd reached the edge of the oasis about 9 A.M. and were received with a sharp fire from the palms, but after a brisk exchange of shots the Arabs occupying the oasis (about 200 in number) were driven out to the west and the work of fortifying the position was begun. Sniping continued for a time, but the bulk of the enemy retreated southwards towards Bir-el-Tocar and a uniformed patrol which had been visible on the rising ground to the left of Fort B disappeared in the same direction. The work progressed apace and most of the spectators rode home to lunch, thinking that the interest was over for the day.

But shortly after midday a force of about 2,000 Turks and Arabs appeared from the south, moving with great rapidity. They advanced with the utmost boldness and a number of cavalry endeavoured to turn the right flank of the Italian protecting line and to cut in between them and the sea. To prevent this manoeuvre the Grenadiers were swung round, with their right resting on the shore, while all the troops fell back a little on the oasis and the forts and the Italian guns fired rapidly and accurately upon the advancing line. The Turks and Arabs advanced in extended order with the utmost resolution and before 3 o'clock they were engaging the whole Italian line very closely. A number of them got within a hundred yards of the Italian position and the right-hand battalion of the 52nd was obliged to fall back a little way in order to keep in close touch with the Grenadiers.

The fighting was very hot for about an hour, but the Italian fire was much too accurate, and the Arab fire, as usual, was too high. About 4 o'clock the enemy began to retreat, slowly and sullenly, and shortly afterwards Major-General Fara (late Colonel of the 11th Bersaglieri) was sent out from Tripoli to take command. His very name has an inspiring influence upon all the troops here, and the news of his arrival had a quite obvious effect upon the soldiers engaged. By sunset the Turks and Arabs were in full retreat and the Italians were left in undisputed occupation of the position they had come to fortify. General Fara disposed his troops for the night and the soldiers began to dig their trenches preparatory to the arrival of a much-needed meal.

Night fell and the order came from Tripoli that the troops were to retire within the Italian lines. It was obeyed with the greatest reluctance on the part of the troops, the half-dug trenches and the wire entanglements were left, and a disheartened body of men returned to the town, bringing with them 10 dead and about 60 wounded.

That is the plain story of the facts, but all next day the town and the trenches were buzzing with questions. Every one was mystified. The enemy had been soundly drubbed, as was only to be expected. Yet the Italian troops had been ordered to retire without completing the work they had set out to do, and they had not been allowed to encamp upon the ground they had won and held, a position, moreover, naturally strong, of moral and strategical advantage to its possessors.

The reason for the retirement, which was ordered by General Frugoni, would seem to be, briefly, as follows. News had come in that the attack of the 18th was only a feint to draw the Italians out of the town, perhaps to lead them on to Zanzur, and that an attack in much greater force was designed. It was decided that the occupation of Gargaresh by General Fara's troops would mask the fire of the guns from Forts Sultanieh, B and C, and that in any case it would be better not to allow them to be out of immediate touch with the supreme command.

Apparently the information was wrong. Probably the Turco-Arab forces had suffered much more severely than they expected, so that the heart had been taken out of them. In any case a reconnaissance of the Lancers, carried out on the afternoon of the 19th, found no trace of hostile movement within a wide radius to the west of Tripoli. Many bodies were found and many arms which had been abandoned in the enemy's hurried flight, but of a living foe, no vestige or sign. In consequence of this reconnaissance Gargaresh was occupied to-day by a strong force under General de Chaurand, consisting of the 82nd and 84th Regiments, one battery field artillery and one battery mountain guns, six squadrons of cavalry and a battalion of sappers. The cavalry, infantry and artillery took position to the west and south of Gargaresh, and the sappers began the construction of three redoubts, which will secure the oasis and quarries from further molestation, and will, further, dominate the approaches to Zanzur, the westernmost redoubt being 2 km. to the west of the oasis.

By this occupation the moral effect which it was feared would result from the retirement on the evening of the 18th will no doubt be cancelled. That is, so far as the Arabs are concerned. But the men who fought on Thursday have naturally felt disheartened, and it remains an open question whether the reasons which influenced General Frugoni should have outweighed the clear moral reasons for remaining on the spot. The oasis of Gargaresh is in such close touch with Tripoli that there was no possible fear of isolation. The troops on the spot were perfectly capable of defending themselves against any possible attack, the more so as they could be supported by naval guns which would have enabled the batteries to concentrate their fire upon the terrain to the south of the oasis. One is forced to the conclusion that prudence may be overdone, and that a greater measure of self-confidence would be more fruitful of early result. Fortunately the mistake, which would seem to have been due to over-caution, has been quickly repaired, but the criticism stands.

A Juridical Protest.

UNDER the auspices of the Peace Society, 124 leading jurists and publicists throughout the world have signed, on purely juridical and legal grounds, a protest against the Italian attack on Tripoli, which the signatories consider inconsistent with national good faith, and calculated to throw discredit on treaties and on the beneficent progress of arrangements for the peaceful settlement of disputes. The protest expresses high appreciation of the great work of Italians for International Law and regrets that it should be counteracted by the recent action of the Italian Government. Among the names attached are those of Lords Avebury, Courtney and Weardale, Sir John Macdonell, Sir J. Gorst, Professors Westlake and Goudy; eight members and associates (Austrian, Dutch, French, German and Spanish) of the Institute of International Law; ten Judges, ex-Judges and ex-law officers (including four from the United States), 38 Professors of International Law and 61 others representing all shades of opinion and schools of political thought, and nearly all the countries of Europe, as well as Egypt, the United States, Canada and Australia.

Turkish Party Politics.

(FROM "THE TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

CONSTANTINOPLE, January 26.

THE rumour that the headquarters of the Committee of Union and Progress are to be transferred to Constantinople is premature. The measure has been discussed, but no decision had been taken, though several of the chiefs of the organization have arrived and will remain here during the electoral campaign.

CONSTANTINOPLE, January 29.

CONCURRENTLY with the improvement in Said Pasha's health, the rumours of further Ministerial changes have begun to die down, although the Tanin continues to demand the appointment of a complete Young Turk Cabinet, containing not only Talaat Bey and Djavid Bey, but "all the leading members of the Committee." The resignation of the Minister of Marine and the withdrawal of his resignation are alike unexplained, but it is believed in some quarters that his action was connected with the question of the Cabinet changes.

Considerable comment has been caused by an exchange of visits between the Bulgarian Minister and the Ecumenical Patriarch, and by a visit paid to the latter by Talaat Bey and Halil Bey. The former is interpreted as a proof of the friendly relations now existing between the Greeks and Bulgars and their respective Churches; the latter as an indication that the Committee is anxious to obtain the support, or at least the neutrality, of the Greeks in the coming elections.

that we were guilty of breach of propriety or of something unconstitutional in advising His Majesty to make the announcement had not entered the mind of the Indian people as a whole or of those who either in British India or the Native States were entitled to speak as their representatives. The debate was then adjourned.

Lord Minto, speaking for the first time since his return from India, resumed the debate on the Durbur announcements and said that he hoped that the King's visit would stamp the relations of the British and Indian peoples with an everlasting friendship. Lord Minto said he had often discussed the possibility of the removal of the capital to Delhi. It was impossible to disregard the advantages of the removal of the enlarged Council from the littoral surroundings of Calcutta. The interests of Calcutta, however, could not be ignored. Throughout the meagre correspondence submitted, there was little trace of the true appreciation of the grave issues affected with regard to the reorganisation of Bengal. The way the repeated declarations to the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal had been disowned was not conducive to the reputation of British administration in India. The reorganisation was only a sop to a political faction as a recompense for the removal of the capital.

Lord Harris said he was in India when the announcement was made and for some time after. He did not find anybody who shared Lord Curzon's "terrible apprehensions." Judging by the results, the action taken might be described as a stroke of genius.

Lord Macdonnell, dealing with the charge of secrecy, said any other procedure would have been inappropriate. His Majesty's announcement changing the current of thought of an entire people from discontent to loyalty was as happy an event as any in India's history.

Lord Amptull deprecated the present discussion and said he admired the courage of those responsible for the new policy. The people of India had cheerfully assented to the change. He declared. Let them share India's acquiescence and hope for their enduring success.

Lord Morley said many were surprised and some were shocked at Lord Curzon bringing up the story of a remark alleged to have been made by an Indian decorated at Delhi. The story was absolutely unfounded. The debate had not helped Lord Curzon, all the speakers, except Lord Minto, having approved the Government's policy. There was no advantage in consulting ex-Viceroy and ex-Governors on a matter not depending on history but on an actual situation. Referring to the partition, His Lordship said that though he and Lord Minto considered it between them, there was never an atom of dissent. He had been blamed for not reversing the partition immediately, but it was all important to do nothing which would lead the people of India to suppose that there was going to be any great reversal of policy. Further, it would have been wrong and rash to reverse something, the effects of which there had been no opportunity to judge. "That would, if you like, have been a concession to clamour. The charge of inconsistency in our abstaining from a reversal of the partition then and modifying the partition now is completely unwarranted."

Lord Morley warmly defended the constitutionality of the procedure. As regards finance, Lord Morley said he had spent half his time remonstrating against the difference between the estimates in India and eventual expenditure. They would be very jealous of expenditure now but it was unnecessary to repeat what Lord Crewe had said.

Lord Curzon explained that he told the story for which he had been rebuked on high authority after receiving permission to use it in the House of Lords with the assurance that it was absolutely true.

Lord Crewe said that Lord Morley had denied it because it had been telegraphed to India in this form that the personage who was actually invested had made the observation at that time. He was sure that was not the story Lord Curzon had meant to tell. In that form it would mean a most offensive insult inflicted by this Indian gentleman on the Order conferred by His Majesty. If such a story were believed in India it would be most unfortunate. It would be a grievous injury to the very loyal gentleman it was obviously pointed at although the latter at Delhi was very ill and was never invested with the decoration.

Lord Curzon said he regretted he had ever told the story.

Lord Lansdowne said it was indisputable that the methods by which the changes had been carried out were entirely unusual. It was indisputable that the changes represented a triumph for a persistent and dangerous agitation. "But now that our protest has been made we will do nothing to interfere with the success of the new policy, and none will be better pleased if our apprehensions prove groundless. None hopes more sincerely that the bright page of history His Majesty has inscribed on the annals of our Empire will be followed by an unbroken record of prosperity, contentment and good government." Lord Crewe, referring to Lord Curzon's and Lord Lansdowne's criticisms of paragraph 3 of the Government of India's despatch, said the paragraph referred simply to the general tendency towards decentralisation in matters of a provincial kind. It was not consonant with fact to believe that the Government or the Government of India contemplated anything in the nature of a federal system of Government.

TETE À TETE

A SENSATION was caused when it was published some time ago that the Chief of Hoti-Mardan, one of the richest and most influential men of the N.-W. F. Province, was charged, along with King, his chauffeur, and Mrs. King, with abducting two girls, Elsie Swannell and Daisy Coutts, and committed to the Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court by the Presidency Magistrate of Bombay. It now appears that the Khan of Hoti-Mardan had authorized the other two accused to secure the services of a governess and a teacher to teach the children and put the ladies of the family in the ways of English society. From the published evidence it is clear that a Mrs. Rogers, who had three children and a husband alive, had agreed to act as governess, but her terms were too high. Other women were considered and Mrs. Glendenning, who was over 50 and was a grandmother, and Mrs. Parsloe, who also had children and had a husband alive, were in the running for these posts. It seems that most of the trouble arose from the fact that the persons who actually reached Hoti-Mardan as the selected candidates were both young and unmarried, a fact about which the Chief says he protested at the station itself where he first saw them, the protest being confirmed in part at least by the prosecution. Miss Coutts, who had been hospital nurse, was a sister of Mrs. Parsloe and was going as a substitute for her elder sister. Miss Swannell, who figures far more prominently in the evidence, had been a shop-girl at Whitcaway's and other places, since 1905. These young ladies reached Hoti on the 25th September last and were met by the Khan at the station waiting room. Two days later the Khan is said to have had an interview with them at the bungalow where they were putting up, and three days after, they were, it is alleged, told to get ready to go to Rawalpindi, and went to a garden as the Chief was going to settle with them and send them off. After the interview with the Chief they were taken to the station and started for Rawalpindi. They were there at the Dak Bungalow for eleven days, and in consequence of communications made to the Bombay police, the police at Rawalpindi were communicated with, and the District Magistrate of Rawalpindi issued a warrant under which the girls were arrested and brought to Bombay. On their arrival in Bombay their statements were taken down by the police and forwarded to the Upper India police. Thereupon the District Magistrate of Peshawar issued a warrant for the arrest of the Chief of Hoti-Mardan, and under this he was arrested. The allegations which were interspersed in the Advocate-General's opening statement were that the Chief had made improper suggestions to the girls and had been unduly familiar with them on the two occasions when he had interviews with them. It appears from Miss Swannell's statement that they had been put up in a bungalow which was in the market; that there was only one bedroom for them both; that the rooms opened out on the verandah; and that when they were on the verandah a great crowd collected and stared at them. It was alleged by the prosecution that it was in such a place that the Chief made an attempt at familiarity which Miss Swannell resented. But it is also stated that it was a day after this interview that Miss Swannell wrote to the Sister Superior of the Foundlings' Home at Bombay—where she had been portress just before she left for Hoti-Mardan, evidently at the recommendation of the Sister Superior—that "the Chief came here yesterday. He brought us a lot of fruits and sweets. He seems a very kind man, but—"; and that the Sister Superior replied that "the Chief must be an honourable man, so you need not be afraid," the Sister evidently not forming an adverse opinion from the dash after the "but." As regards the second interview, apart from the fact that the defence was prepared to prove that the garden and the Museum were open places, it is admitted that the girls had come to bid the Chief good-bye before leaving Hoti-Mardan the same evening. Apart from the suggestion that "the Khan was very kind, but on two occasions he was rather familiar with his hands," which Miss Swannell mentioned in her second letter to the Sister Superior on the 9th October, she never complained to any of her Bombay friends of the Chief's misbehaviour, and told His Lordship that "she would have stayed on had the Khan had a Begum or a Rani"—which he certainly has, although Mr. Farquhar, the Superintendent of the Rawalpindi Police, when telling the girls that they must go back to Bombay, said he had not. As regards the guilt of the accused, the charge of abduction which was so foolishly made against King and the Chief of Hoti-Mardan was withdrawn by the Advocate General in favour of one of abetment only, and they were accordingly discharged and acquitted. But as regards abetment also the charge was subsequently withdrawn, and the judgment of His Lordship itself is the best defence of the Chief. It says—

The two young ladies, Miss Swannell and Miss Coultis, were for eleven days at Rawalpindi; they made no complaint whatever to the police or to anybody. Even assuming that the third accused tried to take liberties with them, those were liberties they did not seem to resent, except by saying that they were not that sort of people. While they were there the police took no action whatever, no complaint was made to them. They on some information received by the police from Bombay, probably of an alarming nature, without any justification whatever, seem to issue a search-warrant, take possession of those girls and send them to Bombay in charge of the police. Miss Swannell's evidence is clear that if the Superintendent of Police, who executed the warrant, had not made a statement which is proved and is admitted to be incorrect, those girls never desired to go down to Bombay. They were perfectly at peace, and were living in content at Rawalpindi, when the police took possession of them, kept them in police custody, and sent them down to Bombay in police custody. I have heard with patience Miss Swannell's evidence for the last three days, and accepting every statement she has made to be true, the only impression that can be produced on one's mind is that there were certain acts of the third accused which she apprehended to be acts of familiarity, but they were acts of the most trifling nature. It must be remembered that the third accused, when the two girls were at Hoti, could have taken advantage of them, but he, beyond being a few minutes with them, did not interfere with their liberty. Under these circumstances I can only say that the course adopted by the Advocate General is an exceedingly proper one, and is in keeping with the usual fairness with which he has conducted the Crown cases. I direct that all the accused be discharged, their discharge amounting to an acquittal. I have no hesitation in saying that the third accused, as well as the humber-sto, (No. 1 and 2) will have the Court's consent a stain on their character.

Had this been all, one would have only regretted that three innocent persons were wrongly accused of an offence of which the Judge, however, declared them to be not guilty. But this is not all, nor nearly so bad as the procedure that was adopted in this case. It appears that no one laid an information against the Khan, and that cognisance was taken after the girls had been brought to Bombay without their own desire and with the aid of an admittedly incorrect statement of the Superintendent of Police, in the wholly unjustifiable custody of the police, and on information sent from Bombay which, according to His Lordship, was probably of an alarming nature. The Chief's name was put down on the charge sheet although the girls had made no complaint against him at Rawalpindi. That, according to the Advocate General's own admission, was the position, and, as His Lordship said without undue severity, it was "a very unsatisfactory position." An old man of 70, for years a cripple, as three eminent medical gentlemen, like Major Gordon-Tucker, Colonel Colley, and Major Novis were prepared to testify, had been arrested under the most humiliating circumstances on a warrant issued by the District Magistrate of Peshawar without a shadow of justification, and thereby brought to a state of health when, on the evidence of Major Gordon-Tucker, which the Court accepted, "it was very probable that he might die in Court if he had any sudden shock or sudden excitement," and "it was unsafe to bring him to Court." His Lordship was compelled to say that "it seems to me that the third accused (the Khan) has been subjected to a great many indignities and the procedure followed there seems to me to be ununderstandable."

THERE are not wanting those that suggest that it was the independence and manliness of this important and extremely rich Chief which actuated the local authorities to humble his pride and shower great indignities upon him. In the absence of accurate data we shall not discuss such suggestions at all. But it does occur to us that if even such a personage, whose social position is admittedly high, who has received a title from the Government and is an Honorary Magistrate, who rendered valuable services to Government in the wars of Malakand and Chitral on the border, assisting the Crown with troops, whose son has the unique distinction of holding a Commission in the Malwa Bhil Corps and had been sent by Government with the Dane Mission to Kabul; and whose wealth is on all accounts tremendous, cannot escape arrest on trumped-up charges based on no sworn information, and has to suffer great indignities, narrowly escaping the fate of a criminal and that too because in Bombay he had a High Court to do him justice, and an eminent Counsel like Mr. Inverarity to plead his cause, what chance is there for a less fortunate, a bumbler and a poorer person who has only a limited number of legal practitioners in the Province to choose his Counsel from, and whose fate is in the lap of the same District Magistrate of Peshawar who ordered his cruel arrest? The Hon. Mr. S. Sinha drew the attention of the Government of India last year to these disabilities, but without any success. The number of legal practitioners is still rigorously kept down by the Judicial Commissioner—a policy the infection of which has now reached the Punjab Chief Court also—and even members of the Inns of Court in England duly called to the Bar have to take out licenses each year from the Judicial Commissioner on payment of a fee as if they were members of a criminal tribe let out on parole. As if this was not enough, the Jirgah system is there, under which, we believe, an accused against whom the Magistrate cannot find enough evidence to sustain a prosecution is thrown to the lions of the Jirgah, who can—and generally do—consign him to perdition without giving him the benefit of defence through a pleader. We shall be told that the Jirgah is better than a jury composed of twelve of the accused's peers, and that it is composed of good men and true who have no likelihood of doing him injustice. But this would be believed only by those who do not know the Afghan and his petty jealousies and internecine quarrels. As for the Jirgah's independence, it could not be better than Sir Mortimer Durand's "democracy" in the land of the Amir, where all the notables consulted about the agreement with the British unanimously approved of the Amir's decision. At a time when the whole of the Moslem world is feeling the tremor of sympathy for Turkey and Persia, and, just across the border, the Amir and his people are among the foremost to share the anxieties of their co-religionists, the North-Western Frontier Province alone is undemonstrative and has made no response. It is busy with raising funds for an Islamia College at Peshawar. For our part, we think that if this College is properly managed, on Moslem lines and by Mussalmans themselves, it would prove in the end far more beneficial to Islam than a few thousands now sent for the relief of Turkish and Persian sufferers. But this matter must be judged according to the psychology of the frontier, and nothing could prove more forcibly the subservience of the Pathans than the absence of any meetings held at Peshawar to protest against Italian and Russian aggression and the utter neglect of the martyrs of Tripoli and Tahrir in contrast with unusual activity in the cause of English education. Judged only as symptoms, these facts disclose a state of affairs that is not without its dangers. Discontent is acute, but as even the few outlets for its coming to the surface have been rigorously closed, it is only sinking deeper underground. This reminds us that while a flood of agitation swept over the land after the Partition of Bengal, and its revocation too has led to a heated controversy, nobody seems to mind in the least another and an earlier Partition carried out by Lord Curzon which is still unrevoked. One would have thought that when the Government of India was in a revoking mood, this Partition too should have been annulled. But, then, there was no agitation against it, for it was the very first consequence of this other Partition that the voice of criticism should be hushed. We refer to the separation of the North-Western Frontier Province from the Punjab, and to the regulations which govern the sturdy, if also unlettered, men of Peshawar and its neighbourhood. Agitation of the familiar type there could be little among such people. But the laws which govern them, and still more the procedure, authorized and unauthorized, which has undisturbed sway in that region, preclude the possibility of frontier grievances providing food for thought at our breakfast tables. If any violence is heard of, it is generally attributed to the temper of the Pathan and the fanaticism characteristic of his faith. And thus we go on believing that all is for the best in the best possible of all frontiers, that God is in heaven, Sir George Knoss-Keppel is on earth, and all is well with that part of the world. Things cannot be allowed to drift in this way, and although we think that the Punjab itself is far too bureaucratic, that its Judiciary has not as judicial a temper as it should have, and is too dependent on the Executive, which is itself too autocratic, and possesses a police which needs considerable reform, we nevertheless believe that the time has come when it should be seriously considered whether it is not desirable to annul this Partition also and re-unite the frontier to the Punjab.

ARMED RIZA BEY, President of the Turkish Chamber of Deputies, has addressed to a correspondent in England a letter from which the following extracts, which, we are sure, will be read with interest, are translated:—"I have no wish to deny or to defend certain acts of injustice committed at places within the Ottoman Empire. There have been—not, as you say, massacres, but—regrettable acts, and there will continue to be such acts for some time yet, because (1) In certain parts of Asia, Arabia and Albania the population has been accustomed to live under a régime of special privileges and finds it difficult to familiarise itself with a régime of equality. This difficulty seems to be shared by Europeans, who shelter themselves behind the Capitulations and refuse to conform to the laws of the country. . . . (ii) The necessary reforms, especially material reforms, have not been promptly carried out.

Still a Man!

The Government has been hindered for several reasons—first of all, because it has had neither money, nor time, nor tranquility. For this lack of tranquillity official Europe is partly responsible, the affairs of Bosnia-Herzegovina, of Rumelia, of Crete, and of the Tripolitaine (not to mention a thousand diplomatic worries) have cruelly hampered the Government.

After all, we are not angels. Like you, we have qualities and defects. You say, Sir, that humanity has no geographic limits. True, but do not be content with enunciating the maxim—apply it to the past as well as to the present. Remember what England in the time of that great man Cromwell did to restore order and ensure progress. Ireland and Scotland swam in blood. Cromwell expelled from Parliament all the agitators who did not agree with his politics. . . . I know that the Committee of Union and Progress is not generally trusted in Europe, but is the object of calumnies and lying accusations. I know why, but that touches on actual politics, on which my position does not allow me to give an opinion. I shall soon reclaim my freedom and shall take an opportunity of speaking frankly on the subject. We hope the Balkans Committee and the Turcophobes will take note of this sober defence of a people to whom so little of angelic virtue is conceded, and yet from whom so much is expected for which even angels could not accept responsibility. The Turk is not an angel, but he has proved that he is still a man!

We learn that Mr Syed Ross Masud, the son of that great jurist, the late Mr. Justice Mahmud, and the grandson of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, has returned by this boat from England, where he stayed for several years, and besides being called to the Bar, graduated with excellent honours from Oxford. Those times are now happily gone when the departure of a Moslem student to England was a sensational event and the general topic of conversation and even controversy. Nor does the return of graduates and barristers excite any comments in these days, unless perhaps the Return of the Prodigal is boomed by himself and his friends. But the Mussalmans of India, and specially the friends and Old Boys of Aligarh, regard the return of Syed Ross Masud very differently. Who that knew the Sage of Aligarh and saw his attachment to little Masud can view his successful return without emotion? It is never a wise thing to overload youth with sermons about "tremendous responsibilities," nor are we qualified to preach. But as friend and comrade, we welcome Syed Ross Masud in our midst, and cannot but express the very high hopes that not only we but all Mussalmans entertain of his future. More than anything else, Aligarh needs able, energetic and liberal minded workers, and although one may not recognise hereditary rights even in the case of Syed Ross Masud, all must realize his hereditary duties. And rights or no rights, while we shudder at the magnitude of his duties, we envy—though only as friend and comrade—his magnificent opportunities. "Will he rise to the height of these opportunities," is the natural question, and Platt says, "Oh, yes, he will!"

THE Cretans had acquired an unenviable notoriety for avoiding the use of truth, but since the end of Italy on Tripoli, the Cretans have had to hide their heads in shame, for their record of seldom digressing into truth has been hopelessly beaten. A wag now classes lies as being of five kinds, a white lie, a black lie, an ally, Italy and Tripoli, and who can now deny that the mixture of the last two is far more exquisite than anything yet heard? The latest instance is the Italian account of their defeat at Qarq-Qaresh (pronounced by the Arabs and therefore spelt by Europeans as Gargaresh). In our issue of 27th January last we had published Reuter's telegram from Rome stating that "another fierce all-day battle was fought at Tripoli on the 19th instant. The Turks attacked the Italians, who were erecting two forts at Gargaresh. The Italians repulsed the Turks, but were themselves compelled to withdraw at nightfall, as their defences had not been completed. The Italian casualties numbered fifty, while those on the Turkish side are reported to have been heavy. Italians re-occupied Gargaresh. They found no traces of the enemy within a radius of five miles. This is regarded as confirming the seriousness of their losses. The enemy admit having had over 150 killed alone." When we read of the repulse of the Turks, coupled with the withdrawal of the Italians—on compulsion, and with 50 casualties—we knew even then that it was the customary euphemism for an Italian defeat. In our last issue, however, we were able to publish from the Jeune Turc of 24th January, specially translated for the Comrade, the Turkish version of the fight and its result. It relates to the battle of the 18th January, though Reuter states that it took place on the 19th and the Jeune Turc, following the "Old Style" which is evidently 13 days behind the dates of the Calendar generally in use, gives the 5th of January as the date of the battle. To-day we reproduce from the Tanin, specially translated for the Comrade, a somewhat fuller account cabled by its correspondent in Tripoli, Ahmed Shareef Bey, and from the Times another account sent by a non-descript panegyrist of the Italians who has been writing under the label of "A Correspondent" from Tripoli. It would appear from a comparison of these accounts that while the Turks believed that the Italians had set out to capture Zanzur, the Italians themselves gave it out that they were constructing two forts at Qarq-Qaresh, and their apologist in the Times now declares that they wanted nothing but stone from the Qarq-Qaresh quarries for the masonry of the port of Tripoli. We are uncertain about the strength of the Italian force, but the account in the Times places the figure at 3,000 men. Now, we know that Italians have sent about 125,000 men to the Tripolitaine, and they could well spare even a larger force for covering their stone-cutters or fort builders whichever they were. But we also know that the soldiers are fed up with such hopeless fighting, and it is no joke to be able to induce a large number to venture out on such an errand. Everything points to Zanzur as their objective, but as Zanzur is still safe with the Turks, the expert is forced to invent a discussion about the "excessive strength of the force dispatched to cover the work" in order to explain away the disproportion. For skilful lying commend us to this correspondent. He turns the damning fact of "excessive strength" to Italian advantage by praising the more "trustworthy" information of the authorities as opposed to that of their critics. Is not the following one of the most exquisite bits of war literature? "And in any case, when prudence costs nothing and troops are in actual need of exercise and change, it is hardly fair to condemn the employment of many where few would probably have been sufficient." We do not know who these critics were. They could not have been the Arabs and the Turks, for these desire nothing better than that more Italians should come out of their safe and snug retreats and leave a good deal of ammunition and stores, besides killed and wounded, on the field of battle. What follows is no less entertaining. "The work progressed apace and most of the spectators rode home to lunch, thinking that the interest was over for the day." But we are at a loss to say whether they were disappointed at losing all the fun or glad that they saved their skins, for the next paragraph of this Gilbertian war correspondence goes to show that the Turks "advanced with the utmost boldness" and "with the utmost resolution," and that "the right-hand Battalion of the 52nd was obliged to fall back a little way in order to keep in close touch with the Grenadiers." We challenge anyone to improve on this charming euphemism for the ungainly fact that the Grenadiers were the first to bolt, and that shortly after the 52nd did likewise. But this is by no means the last that the writer has to offer. "At about 4 o'clock the enemy began to retreat, slowly and sullenly," and in the ordinary course we should have expected that the Italian column won a victory to which its superior strength entitled it. But, then, when did the course of true love, or an Italian success, run smooth? So, in spite of the retreat of the Arabs and the Turks, Major-General Fara (late Colonel of what we should now call the Red Bersaglieri, the hero whose victorious fight from Bu Tobras a month ago could not have been forgotten) was sent out to take command of the Italian column himself. And the Times correspondent, with more justification perhaps than poor old Menenius had, says that General Fara's name is "a spell of much power." "His very name has an inspiring influence upon all the troops here and the news of his arrival had a quite obvious effect upon the soldiers engaged." We presume the "quite obvious effect" was the retreat, for confirming the report of the Jeune Turc Ahmed Shareef Bey says that "the Italians were twice beaten back," that "in spite of assistance arriving to them in the shape of two fresh batteries of artillery and a regiment of infantry from their base at Tripoli, they could not make a stand and retreated for the third time to a point further back," and that "as a result of an attack of fresh energy and vigour made after sunset, combined with a flanking movement of our right against the enemy's left, the enemy's power of resistance was broken, and from its third point too it was driven back to the strong defences erected by it in the oasis round the town of Tripoli." But this is too true an account to commend itself to the Times correspondent, who is, however, this time satisfied merely with reversing the result. But such a big lie, if easy to hit, is not equally easy to chew, and the expert swallows it with another. "Night fell and the order came from Tripoli that the troops were to retire within the Italian lines. It was obeyed with the greatest reluctance on the part of the troops, the half-dug trenches and the wire entanglements were left, and a disheartened body of men returned to the town, bringing with them 10 dead and about 60 wounded." And yet this is called "the plain story of the facts," which, according to Ahmed Shareef Bey, happens to be nothing more than an Italian retreat under cover of the night, in which "they left behind much munitions of war and arms, among which was also found a large quantity of wire entanglements," and that "the dead left behind by the Italians on the field of battle numbered more than 150, including 10 officers." The Times correspondent's "reason for the retirement" is simply this, that the attack of the 18th was feared to be only a feint designed to lead them to Zanzur, and that "it would be better not to allow them to be out of immediate touch with the supreme command." This "over-caution" is "over-cautiously" criticised by the writer, and General Frugoni, who has evidently ousted the sanguinary yet not sanguine Caneva, comes in for some mild reprimand. Could anything be a more appropriate theme for a Gilbert and Sullivan opera than this war and its war literature, in which victories end in "retirement," and cowardice is called "over-caution," unwilling fighters being excused for lack of dash on the plea of not being allowed to be "out of touch with the supreme command"?

The Times correspondent, whose account of the battle of Gargareh we have discussed at some length, would have deserved some credit had he even possessed some originality in his lying. As it is, he is only an imitator of Mr. Belloc's exquisite account of the Battle of Hastings which was published in "The Odd Volume" for 1911, some months before this correspondent began to embellish the unadorned truth. We offer no apology for reproducing here an extract or two from Mr. Belloc's effort as a belated war correspondent. He wrote—"In spite of the determination observable from a great distance upon the faces of the tall Saxon line, William, with characteristic lack of balance, opened the action by ordering a charge uphill with cavalry alone. It was a piece of tactics absurdly incongruous, and one which even he would never have attempted had he understood the foe that was before him, or the fate to which that foe had doomed his soldiers. The lesson dealt him was as immediate as it was severe. But even in the heat of this initial success Harold had the self-command to order a retirement upon the main position, and with troops such as his an order was equivalent to its execution. This blow would have sufficed for any commander less vain than William, but he seems to have lost all judgment in a fit of personal vanity and to have ordered a second charge which could not but prove as futile as the first. . . . William's plan (if plan it may be called) was foredoomed to failure. But Harold had no intention to let the action bear no more fruit than a tactical victory upon this particular field. . . . William with incredible folly was seen preparing to charge again! Another general would have awaited this second charge with all its accompaniment of useless butchery. Not so Harold. . . . By a manoeuvre, as grand in its simplicity as it was bold and majestic in its daring, the Saxon centre which he commanded in person, dully withdrew before the futile gallop of the 'Norman' cavalry, leaving, with that coolness which has ever distinguished our troops, the laggards to their fate. At the same moment, and with marvellous precision the left and the right were withdrawn from the plateau rapidly and as though by magic, and the mounted weight of huddled, shouting knights upon whose mere impact William of Normandy seems seriously to have relied, was spent and wasted upon the now evacuated summit of the hill. What followed is famous in history. Though it was now thick night, by no set road and with no cumbersome machinery of train and rearguard, the whole of the vast assembly masked itself behind the woodlands of the Weald. The Norman horsemen, bewildered and fatigued, gazed hopelessly upon the empty field, and wondered what such happenings might mean. There is perhaps no more difficult task set to soldiers than the quiet execution of such a manoeuvre after the heat of a brave action, and none have performed it more magnificently than the veteran troops of Harold. When (luckily) all the orders had been finally distributed and the retirement assured, an incident of tragic moment marked for the Saxon force, the full joy of victory. Just before the execution of this masterpiece of strategy, and as the autumn sun was sinking, . . . Harold himself, the artist of the great day, fell. But we have no reason to believe that his loss retarded the retreating movement in any degree. Men who create as Harold created have not their creations spoilt by death.

"The shameful history of the close of the campaign is familiar to every schoolboy, and the military historian must be pardoned if he deals with a purely civilian blunder, however deplorable, in but a few brief words. Parliament interfered—as it always does—with what should have been a matter for the army alone, and William of Falaise . . . was astonished to find himself accepted a few weeks later . . . by the politicians. . . . He and England were equally astounded to discover that a broken and defeated invader could actually be received by the intrigues at Court and crowned King of England as the price of some secret bargain." We hope Mr. Belloc would forgive us for making such long extracts from his war correspondence, but we have no hope that the Times' correspondent would forgive him for anticipating his great achievement. As for ourselves, we wish Enver and Feizi Beys no more than the "defeat" of William of Falaise at Senlac and the title of Conqueror in subsequent history.

MANY of the most important facts that govern the Persian situation and present the problem in its true perspective have seen the light mainly through the indefatigable and disinterested labours of some of the members of the Persia Committee. What little sympathy has been aroused in England for the sufferings and misfortunes of Persia is due to the publication of those facts, and we are sure the Persians cannot be sufficiently grateful to the gentlemen who could not see unmoved the weak being trampled remorselessly under foot, and who had the courage to utter the truth and ask for justice. Their voice might well have become a cry in the wilderness, if it were not a voice of truth. However reluctantly, they have at least, been heard. Lord Lamington, the President of the Persia Committee, whose utterances on the Persian question have already created a great impression on account of their earnest, honest and manly note, has set out on a long and arduous journey through Persia to study the whole situation on the spot. We sincerely hope the visit will be fruitful of beneficent results. The knowledge that a traveller can gain of a foreign country is necessarily a matter of luck and opportunities. If those in a position to help him in getting at the facts and on the right track in his work of exploration do not withhold their help or put obstacles in his way, he may speedily grasp the true bearings of the problem and get the right impression. We hope both the Persian Government and the British Legation and Consular authorities will place the necessary facilities at the disposal of Lord Lamington in order that he may form a correct estimate of the condition and requirements of Persia. Sir Valentine Chirol during his travels through the country was very actively assisted by British Officials in every way and the ex-Governor of Bombay should not be refused the same help in his efforts to learn the truth. It is solely for the sake of truth and justice that Lord Lamington has undertaken the journey. This labour of love is creditable to him and no less creditable to the nation to which he belongs. We are sure his progress through Persia will be as pleasant and instructive as the Persian people, the Persian Government and the British Officials can make it. We hope he will be privileged to get a glimpse of the awful image of "Truth" through the courtesy of the gentlemen who guard the portals of its shrine. We are afraid the Persian Government cannot of its own free will unveil the "deity." It must first placate the keepers of its conscience.

We have expressed a hope in our last that the conditions of the Anglo-Russian loan to Persia would not be designed with a view to "infringe Persian sovereignty or limit her freedom of action."

Persia

We had dared, though in vain, to hope, but we had some misgivings, and had reason to be apprehensive in regard to the political possibilities of such financial transactions. In the practical application of the doctrine of Imperialism loans play the most important part and pave with unerring certainty the way to a Protectorate, open or disguised. But it is not exclusively in themselves that the importance of these transactions lies. They only too often represent the price that is cheerfully paid in gold for the acquisition of the eagerly desired political privileges, territorial interests and even sovereign rights. The all-important part of the bargain is the "conditions" that impart to the "loans" their true significance and character. "Conditions" are the real thing. They are imperishable, irrevocable. They settle round the life of the country with the inevitability of doom. The "loans" in the end turn out to be irredeemable because the "conditions" have got to be maintained. In view of this, it is not perhaps very difficult to understand why "loans" are so generously thrust on impecunious governments which begin very soon to be mortally afraid of these lavish manifestations of "friendliness." It was a sure instinct of self-preservation that led the Persian Mejliss on several occasions to refuse all foreign loans and try to raise the money in the country itself. Under the Persian Constitution no government can accept a foreign loan without the sanction of the Mejliss. We do not know how, in view of this constitutional check, the Persian Government can lawfully negotiate a joint Anglo-Russian loan saddled with intolerable stipulations, when it has no authority to enter into any such transactions. But the Mejliss itself has been summarily dismissed at the bidding of a superior and implacable force. That force is law unto itself and can brush aside all constitutional considerations and moral scruples. Persia has got to accept the loan with all the conditions that the lenders may choose to impose. Reuter has wired a brief summary of the Joint Note presented to the Persian Government by the Russian and British representatives at Teheran in which the conditions of the loan have been specified. To put the matter in a nutshell, Persia has been asked to renounce all claims to independent sovereignty and to accept a sort of veiled Protectorate exercised jointly by Russia and England. The first condition lays it down that Persia should undertake "to conform with the principles of the Anglo-Russian Agreement." But what is this Agreement and what are its principles? Hitherto this notorious but nebulous document has been known to mean nothing in particular and everything by turns.

To Sir Edward Grey and the Times it has all along meant a solemn pact with Russia to support her aggressive designs in the East. To Russia it has meant a complete deliverance from all restraints, moral or physical, in playing at her favourite game of crushing weak and struggling nationalities. To the Persians it has meant that they have lost all claims to be the masters of their fate and the guides of their future destiny. In the course of the last few months it has proved not a little inconvenient to its authors. Sir Edward Grey has not even yet finished explaining away its most categorical and patent denials and assertions. In the face of its scandalous past and most controversial present, he would be a bold man indeed who would try to define the principles on which this dangerous instrument was forged. True, it vaguely assumes some special interests of England and Russia, and divides the country into definite spheres of these interests. But whatever these interests may be, they are directly and emphatically in conflict with the interests of the Persian people. The Shuster incident illustrates this as nothing else could do. Even his worst enemies have found it hard to deny that he is an able and honest man, that he was serving the Persian Government with zeal and devotion, and that his administration of the finances was beginning to bear good fruit. Yet he has been dismissed, because he served his masters only too well, and probably because his honest and devoted service somehow or other dealt some injury to "special interests." The Times has as usual stultified its conventional criticism of Mr. Shuster's action by cynically maintaining that he had made himself impossible by ignoring the existence of "special interests." It would thus be manifest that the interests of Persia are not exactly the interests of Russia and England. To ask Persia, therefore, to accept the principles of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which was concluded to create and safeguard special Anglo-Russian interests, is to demand the surrender of her sovereignty and freedom and substitute the joint Anglo-Russian will for her own government established in conformity with the fundamental law of her Constitution. With the loss the joint Anglo-Russian Protectorate has virtually come to exist in its preliminary veiled stage. The remaining stages in the inevitable process of absorption will be traversed in due course. Was this the form of "stable" government about which Mr. Asquith so piously discoursed the other day? Was it for this purpose that Lord Morley and others laid the soothing unction to their troubled consciences and referred with evident satisfaction to a generous measure of financial help? As we go to press comes the news that the British Minister at Teheran, Sir George Barclay, exchanges places with the Minister at Bucharest. This means the reverse of a promotion and is not likely to be without a grave significance? Is he found out, or has he, too, found Sir Edward Grey impossible?

THE Hon. Sahebzada Atab Ahmed Khan did a public service the other day when he asked in the United Provinces Legislature whether Government was aware that the colony of Berias, who are members of a notorious criminal tribe which had been established at Aligarh under the supervision of the Salvation Army, was proving a source of danger and insecurity not only to the residents of the civil station and neighbouring villages but even to travellers on public roads whether Government was also aware that the said colony which had been located in the vicinity of the Aligarh College, consisting both of men and women, constitutes a source of danger and annoyance in more ways than one and if Government could be pleased to consider the advisability of removing the said colony to some other place better suited for the purpose and free from such serious consequences as are experienced and apprehended from its present situation. But what was the reply? The Hon. Mr. Stuart said that "the Lieutenant-Governor ordered the establishment of a settlement at Aligarh for the reclamation of members of a criminal tribe. That settlement was placed by him under the supervision of the Salvation Army. It contains about 140 Berias, chiefly women and children. They are under the charge of a European officer of the Salvation Army and his wife. There are also two Indian assistants. The site is not far from the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, on land lent for the purpose by the Military authorities and subject to relinquishment should they at any time require it. The Lieutenant-Governor has made careful enquiries as to the behaviour of these Berias. The result shows that during the period that the settlement has been in existence only three charges of committing offences have been made against its residents. Two of these charges were not substantiated by evidence and no prosecution resulted. In the third charge a male Beria was convicted of petty theft. In addition three other Berias absented themselves one night from the settlement. They were subsequently bound over to be of good behaviour. The Lieutenant-Governor is quite unable to accept the position that the occurrences just mentioned justify the settlement being described as a source of danger and annoyance to the community residing in its neighbourhood. He considers that the arrangements for the supervision and control of the Berias are perfectly satisfactory. The Lieutenant-Governor is making a determined effort to improve the condition of the members of the criminal tribes in this province. He has deliberately chosen the agency which has shown itself to be the most satisfactory for the purpose, and this Council has, in considering a resolution on the subject, itself ratified this choice. He hopes eventually to obtain the co-operation of all unselfish people in his endeavours to reform these unfortunate persons. Considering the fact that the settlement has not been long in existence the results of its establishment are, in his opinion, very encouraging, and he does not propose to take any action on the lines desired by the hon. member." This reply, while keeping outwardly the forms of ordinary courtesy, has an undercurrent not only of autocracy, which one could easily associate with so forceful, energetic and able an administrator as Sir John Hewett, but also of prejudice, which is the last thing of which such an authority should even be suspected. We shall not discuss the defence of the Berias, beyond saying that these modern Ishmaelites have discovered in Sir John not only an ardent and sincere reformer but also a well-disposed and active advocate. Nor shall we deal with the fact that Sir John is himself the originator of the scheme and deliberately chose the agency himself. We have no quarrel with the agency, and, in fact, are to some extent among its admirers in spite of General Booth-Tucker's excursions into the realm of Indian politics. But if it is the Lieutenant-Governor who has himself selected the site, and that too deliberately, we are rather sorry for the Lieutenant-Governor and cannot admire the result of his deliberation. It is not a sufficient answer to say that the Berias are not such great villains as they are believed to be, though in fact Sir John's reforming zeal would not be easily intelligible if they were merely moderate sinners. It is a fact that they form a criminal tribe, and it is notorious that the Beria ladies do not always respect a somewhat neglected commandment of the Decalogue. We ask, is a site not a mile removed from a large residential College and from the seat of a residential University of the future, the most suitable for Sir John's experiment in the reform of Beria morals? It is notorious that the Moslem League had to shift its headquarters from Aligarh at the suggestion of Lord Minto himself. Yet, apparently a colony of criminals cannot, in the opinion of Sir John Hewett, be justly described even as a source of danger and annoyance. At this rate, the Moslem League has only to enlist itself as a criminal tribe to secure from the reforming zeal of Sir John Hewett a sanction for its location at Aligarh. We regret we have to speak in this strain, but frankly, we must either shut up shop in order to say nothing about gubernatorial experiments that possess every merit except common-sense, or must appeal to the higher authorities in the way we do to interfere in a matter which is so obviously ripe for intervention. What is most regrettable is that Sir John Hewett should have stepped into the arena of personal acriminations by insinuating that the Trustee and Syndic of the College in charge of its residential discipline was selfish in asking so innocently a most necessary question. Had the authorities of the College even begged the Local Government for preferential treatment in the matter of land acquisition as against the Berias, the request could be called selfish only by some strange perversion of ethical considerations. If Moslem education cannot have a favoured treatment even in Aligarh, we do not know where in this wide world Lord Crewe would find a place wherein to provide special facilities for the Moslems to compete on equal terms later on with other Indian communities? But Mr. Aftab Ahmad Khan asked for no favours, and we believe he has long ago ceased to expect any from the present Local Government. To us the reply appears to be far more tinged with self-love than the question with selfishness. Sir James Meston will, however, soon be in charge of the Province, and we may safely say that the College authorities will not be dealt with by him in such cases as selfish people not entitled to the same consideration as a criminal tribe.

It is only when social evils assail masses of people and soak them through and through that one realizes how feeble is the force of law even in the twentieth century, compared with the power of religion, in cleansing society of evils of this magnitude.

Cotton Figure Gambling.

For instance, not all the Licensing Bills of England and Excise Laws of India have done for Temperance a tenth of what the Islamic prohibition of drink has accomplished, and similarly, not all the Purity Leagues and Salvation Armies of Europe have been able to combat immorality so successfully as the Islamic injunction that women should not disclose their attractions. We referred to this aspect of the matter when writing on the evils of horse-race betting in Western India and have occasion to do so again in connection with the craze of Cotton Figure Gambling. We had ourselves noted the growth of this evil in Calcutta and were collecting facts and figures, when our go-ahead contemporary, the Empire, did a great public service by publishing an extremely interesting description of the craze and facts connected therewith over the signature of "Gendarna." It appears that five sets of cotton figures are daily telegraphed from New York, which are added together and then divided by five. The last figure of the quotient, if a whole number, is recognized as the one for the day. If, however, there is a remainder, this is announced as the winning number. If the quotient ends in a zero, then ten is quoted as the figure for the day. It seems, and our own experience confirms it, that Bow Bazar Street is the favourite haunt of the gamblers, though more fashionable localities are not free from the evil, and perhaps the biggest deals take place in Burra Bazar, a wealthy Marwaris' estimate being that a crore of rupees change hands daily. As "Gendarme" writes: "Wealthy Jews, Armenians and Marwaris, Europeans in swaggar suits, poverty-stricken Anglo-Indians, domestic servants of every description, Indians of all religions and mendicants by the wayside may be seen anxiously waiting for the day's figure to be announced, on the result of which many find themselves stranded and destitute. Similar scenes may be witnessed throughout the length and breadth of the city and its suburbs, and the evil which is spreading by leaps and bounds bids fair to swamp Calcutta ere long with an army of professional thieves, loafers and beggars." "Bystander", writing to the same journal, adds that "the craze has penetrated even to zenanas, the go-betweens being the women-servants. Children also are to be found slipping out from home to stake whatever money they have been able to beg borrow, etc., and money given them for sweets at tiffin-time at school now goes the same way. One young urchin in Wellesley Street the other evening misappropriated for the purpose the three coppers given him to buy some oil, and after doing the deed calmly turned to youthful companions for advice as to the best tale to tell his "nani" for not taking home the oil!" It is said that the Police are powerless in the matter as this form of gaming does not come within the provisions of the Gambling Act. If this is law, then we have no hesitation in saying that it is a very stupid person. But "Bystander" has supplied some interesting data about the time when the figures are cabled from America, proving that it is impossible to guess the winning figure on the day on which bets are made from information about the market, and that being so, we should have thought that the Gambling Act covered the case. A test case could at least be instituted to test the extent of Law's stupidity. We are glad that the Hon. Mr. Golam Hossein Cassim Arif intends to ask a question on the subject in the Bengal Legislative Council next Monday, and gladder still that the Government of Bengal has taken into consideration an amendment of the law which will enable the Police to suppress this and other abuses of a like nature. But where so much of modern commercial activity is near allied to gambling, it could only be religious belief in the mischief of gambling that could effectively deal with an evil of such magnitude, and here again Islam has proved the firmness of its rational basis. European civilization is too much soaked with moral and commercial as well as with actual alcoholism to cure the disease, and Pharisees who thank the Lord that their own religious belief is more exacting and starts from a higher level, go after this comforting reflection to a hall to fathom the mysteries of the Kala Juggahs, or to the Club to sample the latest brand of whiskey and have a few rubbers. Western civilization is on its trial in the East, and it will not be judged merely by teaching Japan to destroy European fleets, China to inaugurate a Republic, or India to babble in Legislative Councils, but also by making the Oriental more abstemious, more honest, more self-reliant and more God-fearing.

EVERY fresh discussion in Parliament about the status of Indians in South Africa only serves to emphasise the almost hopeless nature of the fight that valiant champions like Lord Amthill are still carrying on for the sake of justice and humanity and for the ultimate benefit of the Empire. Once or twice every year, when some one happens to call the attention of His Majesty's Government to the scandal and enormity of the treatment meted out to His Majesty's Indian subjects in South Africa, confessions of helplessness and impotent regrets are skillfully mixed up with halting apologies, and one realises only then how even a problem of Imperial magnitude, big with fateful consequences, can be trifled with in the Mother of Parliaments and politely hustled out of hearing. It is, indeed, passing strange that the Colonial Office should not even be in constant touch with all that is happening to the Indians. We do not know for what cosmic purpose the Colonial Office exists if it can obtain no "official information" about a number of His Majesty's loyal Indian subjects, silently enduring humiliation in an integral part of the Empire and bearing all the hardships of a deliberately harsh and repressive legislation. With such an amazing confession of ignorance, it is rather amusing to hear Lord Emmott talking in the same breath in vague generalities about the general situation. It is almost irrelevant to say that "the relations of the communities in South Africa had improved and would continue to improve," when nothing has been done to relax the rigour and stringency of the laws that have been imposed upon the Indian settlers. Lord Selbourne had the courage of the partisan and dis-couraged on the difficulties of the situation from the South African standpoint. He considered the problem to be a question of divergent types of civilisation. The restrictions imposed on Indian immigration were inspired by the instinct of self-preservation on the part of the European who would otherwise be wiped out of existence. "It was not a sound basis to say," said Lord Selbourne, "that all the King's subjects had the same rights in all parts of the Empire. It was a truer basis that the special interests of each part should have the first consideration." This theory of Imperialism is not a new one. In fact it is the old doctrine of self-sufficiency in disguise. The only difficulty about it is that it cannot hold together an empire, if by empire we mean an association of self-governing states bound together by some mutual privileges and mutual obligations. However, let us for argument's sake accept Lord Selbourne's definition of the duties and privileges of the Imperial citizenship, and see if it could also be applied from the Indian's standpoint. If the South African patriot is absolutely within his rights in legislating on the basis of colour and race, and not only excluding Indians from the colonies but humiliating them in the most brutal fashion, then, surely, the Indian Government ought to be able to send all colonials out of India, be they traders, settlers or servants of the State. We hope the law of retaliation will do its work more quickly and surely than all the goodwill that may be invoked in the name of the Empire. But will the Empire survive a conflict of colour, a silent but grim strife of races fiercely asserting themselves, with their ugliest passions of pride, hate, and hunger roused to the utmost? It is for Lord Selbourne to answer. If the Empire is at all a thing worth preserving, mutual tolerance and comprehension must find a place in all schemes of Imperialism. Surely it will not be preserved through the glorification of the Little Africanism that loves to skulk behind racial ditches and embankments raised by colour.

WE HAVE much pleasure in announcing that His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has been pleased to become a patron of the Moslem Institute. His Honor has also been pleased to make a small grant to provide the Institute Hall with some conveniences and to purchase books for the Institute Library. An Institution of this character deserves every assistance. It is by influencing the students' ideas by sympathetic dealings and friendly persuasiveness rather than by suspecting them of sedition in season and out of season or making them loyal "by order" that success can be achieved.

The Comrade.

The Future of Islam.

III

LAST week we endeavoured to refute the charge of Professor Margoliouth and the Pioneer that Islam is "less exacting" than Christianity and "starts from a lower level" and instanced the Islamic injunctions as regards prayers and fasting and the prohibition of the use of intoxicants and intercourse of men and women which would prove far too exacting for modern Christians. We could add to these many other instances, including the compulsory Poor Rate of Islam, the Zakat, and the prohibition of gambling. In England we have seen the difficulty of taxing the rich for the benefit of the poor, and the hysterics and bombast of the Western India Turf Club have spared us the labour of supplying instances within the experience of our readers which show how exacting is Islam's prohibition of gambling. We discussed the advice of those who propose its defecation to a mere transparency as well as of those who pretend to regard its schisms and sects as the signs of its spiritual strength, and then went on to deal with the temporal history of Islam, contrasting its rise in the past with the present condition of its decline. We quoted the views of European Christians on the nature of the present danger to the worldly power of Islam, and drew the obvious conclusion that under the existing circumstances we could consider Pan-Islamism only as a force for purposes of defence not of defiance.

But Professor Margoliouth ignores this distinction when he says:

It is the thought of an offensive and defensive alliance between 300 millions of Moslems against the European rulers of Asia and Africa which renders the phantasm alarming. And the alarmists are right in the right that this is the end which the movement called Pan-Islamism compassed and compasses. Whether the spirit which it summons from the vasty deep will come or not may be questionable but it certainly summons them.

So far as the phantasm is aggressive, it is certainly, as the Right Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali said, "created by Europe to create a prejudice against Islam." But the Moslem historian was careful to add that "intelligent sympathy between Moslems in each other's trials and tribulations should appeal to all who have a spark of humanity." If that is Pan-Islamism and alarming, the spirits of mischief which it may summon from the vasty deep, whether they will come or not, would be the Franksteins created by Christian Europe itself. In India, as Mr. Ameer Ali has said, "no Moslem thinks of disloyalty under Great Britain," and when the fruits of victory had been cruelly snatched from the hands of Turkey after the unprovoked war foisted upon it by Greece, and there was a general stir in the restless elements on our North West Frontier. Mussalman soldiers, including many Afghans, fought against their own co-religionists for king and country, and elicited from Lord Elgin the remark that "in the course of these unfortunate disturbances we have again seen what we have often seen before—the loyalty and gallantry of Muhammadan subjects and soldiers of the Queen." Even the Pioneer is forced to remark that,

In the past the misfortune of any part of the Turkish Empire set a wave of sympathetic unrest through all countries where the Moslem element was at all strong. The French have known the feeling in Algeria and the British in India and in their African possessions and both have been anxious as to the attitude of their Muhammadan subjects. To day the sympathetic tremor is felt, but neither in Algeria nor in India is it accompanied by the familiar signs of political unrest and disturbance.

No sane person who appreciates the extent of the responsibility would like to answer for the actions of the 300 million Mussalmans of the world in all conceivable and inconceivable contingencies. But so far as we know the Mussalmans of India we are prepared to say, as Sir Syed Ahmad Khan had said years ago, that the attitude of the Mussalmans of India towards their British Rulers would depend wholly and solely on the treatment meted out to them in this country. So long as their rulers give them the blessings of peace and provide them with opportunities of attaining spiritual salvation and temporal prosperity, as they have done in past and continue to do to-day, there is not the ghost of a chance of the Mussalmans of India being anything but a great asset of loyalty. After the Mubny, Sir Syed Ahmad Khan at one time contemplated retirement to Egypt. But better reason prevailed, and he decided to share the fate and improve the condition of his co-religionists in India. The result of that choice is obvious to-day and he who runs may read it. We trust no one would contemplate retirement to Turkey to-day, for not only is the proper place of an Indian Mussalman in India itself, but in these more peaceful days the future is far more certain than it was fifty years ago, and we have no hesitation in saying that it is a hopeful and a progressive future. At one time it was the dream of Syed Ahmad Khan and Theodore Beck to make Aligarh the nursery of Islam's missionaries of progress who would raise their co-religionists in other lands also. Although Aligarh has not yet been able to realize that dream, there is no reason why it should not do that in the future; and from the point of view of the rulers too it would be better if Aligarh sends out its missionaries to backward Moslem States than if Moslem India has to import Enver Beys to uplift the Mussalmans of India.

But there are passages in the leader of the Pioneer which cannot be allowed to pass unchallenged. It says:

Islam for centuries had only one aspect. It was a universal conquering religion which identified itself with political supremacy. The Moslem's creed taught him that he must either subdue a "hostile" land or quit it. By degrees Islam acquires in his mind another aspect. He begins to concern himself with the extension of its spiritual influence, and is satisfied if he obtains a just share of political influence in the state of which he is a citizen. As the idea of a Messianic Kingdom gradually faded away among Christian communities, so the educated Moslem sees that in the modern world the idea of a universal Islamic state is impossible of realisation. He is learning to accept the principle of a constitutional and neutral polity, in which he finds his own place as a member with equal civil rights irrespective of religious belief. It is hard to discard the notion of a divine thoeracy, for this colours the whole body of Koranic doctrine. But the Moslem, like the Christian, is amenable in the long run to the hard facts of the society in which he lives, and he is assimilating, even faster than he imagines, the notion of the civilised creedless state, and of civil rights which do not depend on religious observances.

If by this the Pioneer means that the Mussalmans of to-day are departing from the original tenets of Islam, in the matter of peaceful obedience to their non Moslem rulers, it is wholly mistaken. Islam as a spiritual force was never dependent upon temporal dominance, except in the way of regarding worldly dominion as the handmaid of the Faith. And although Islam had for centuries been "a universal conquering religion" in most parts of the world, we cannot ignore the Titanic Empire of China, where there are no less than forty million Mussalmans who have obeyed and prospered under Chinese and Manchu rulers, and where Islam has not been the forced growth of a temporal power, but the vigorous banyan developing from a tiny seedling into a whole forest of sturdy growth. It must also be remembered that no land is "hostile" where perfect religious freedom is permitted to the true believer. Hali, the great Moslem poet of India, regarded temporal power only as a useful adjunct of the Islamic mission, and not as its essence, for he complained in his famous Masaddas:

ادا کر چکی جب حق اپنا حکومت
 (میں نے اسلام کو اس کی حاجت
 مگر حیف ہے نذر آدم کی امت
 ہوی آدمیت یہی سائبہ اوس کے رخصت
 حکومت تھی گویا کہ اب جہول تم پر
 کہ اوزے اوس کے نکل آئے جوہر

(When temporal rule had done its work, Islam no longer had need of it. But fit, O followers of the pride of Adam, your humanity has also departed along with it. As if temporal power was but a covering, and that removed your reality is at last betrayed.) The same idea is expressed in another way by Iqbal, who says:

توحید کی امانت سبوں میں ہے ہمارے
 آسان نہیں مٹاؤں دم اشان ہمارا

(The message of the unity of God is a trust locked up in our breasts. Hence it is not easy to obliterate our name and all traces of us.) In the days of Islamic rule the Faith followed the Flag much more naturally than the commerce of European countries follows their conquests to day. Mussalmans cannot be expected to despise such a powerful safeguard of their missionary rights, and neither their own fate nor that of the Jews can encourage them in the belief that the loss of temporal power would have no effect on the progress of Moslem missionary efforts.

The treatment of the Moors in Spain cannot be forgotten, nor does the constant clamour against Mormonism in England as well as in America give any assurance that the propagation of the Quran would not be tabooed as "the inculcation of doctrines subversive of morality." In fact, we need not go so far for the illustration of a very real danger. Does the Pioneer know how many Hindu States under the "protection" of the British Government place difficulties in the way of the Mussalmans desirous of performing their religious duties in peace? Does it know how many mosques have been dumped in the past and are still withheld from Moslem worshippers, and how many have been desecrated in recent times? We have with us several letters from correspondents writing from such States the publication of which is certain to be considered by a large section of the Hindu press as tending to "accentuate religious differences." The Muezzin is not permitted in several States to call the faithful to prayer, and similar custom, dating from the time of the Sikh rule in the Punjab, is paramount even in portions of British India. As for the slaughter of cows for sacrificial purposes, no mention is needed. It is undreamt of in Hindu States, but in British India itself Mussalmans are not immune from wrongs, as the recent case of Meerut would show, where the sacrificed animal was interred in the ground by order of the Magistrate, and many Mussalmans who had slaughtered it in good faith, even if not in accordance with custom, were harassed for long with a criminal prosecution. The "principle of a constitutional and neutral polity" is almost as difficult of realization as that of the equality of all States according to International Law or the policy of the Open Door in international trade. At a time when even the most powerful European States believe in an armed peace, and are trying to outpace each other in the race of armaments, and when Retaliation is declared to be the only serviceable weapon in combating protection, how delightfully appropriate to expect the Mussalmans to renounce the world, the flesh and the devil and concern themselves only with the thoughts of the world to come.

If Professor Margoliouth's own view was to prevail it is certain that Islam would get short shrift in this world. For referring to the persecutions of the Prophet before the Hijrah to Medina, he writes in his Life

A measure which seems both natural and harmless was taken by the Meccans; the Muslims were kept out of the precincts of the Ka'bah. When they came there their devotions were rudely interrupted.

And although the other adviser of Islam, Sir Harry Johnston, says that "no civilized man or woman wishes to revive any idea of religious persecution or disability," and points out that "no European Power that has achieved predominance over a country essentially Muhammadan has, since the eighteenth century, persecuted Muhammadans by forbidding polygamy or compelling them to abandon any of their rites or ceremonies," what guarantee is there that, when once the fear of a Moslem alliance for defensive purposes is wholly gone, Sir Harry Johnston's vague exception "in regard to such religious or religious topics as by international opinion are voted to be indefensibly cruel and harmful to human development" would not be applied to religious tenets of the Mussalmans which fail to secure the approval of Europe's changing fashions. According to Sir Harry, "somehow or other Jews and Christians have found a way of evading the trammels of their religious beliefs where they, in process of time, grew to be inconvenient or out of harmony with the enlargement of man's outlook and the firmly based revelations of science." But Islam has never pretended to be equally à la mode and whatever may happen to "man's outlook" or the "revelations of science" which supplant each other with bewildering rapidity, Mussalmans must hold fast the rope of Allah, trust in His unchanging and steady outlook, and shape their conduct according to the revelations of their religion, which are far more firmly based on the rock of Eternal Reason. Christendom has permitted the adulteration of Christianity to a pure transparency, and has evaded even the trammels of an antinomian creed already made facile by the teaching of St. Paul. Many regard Mr. Rudyard Kipling as embodying in his powerful verse the spirit of the Christendom of to-day. But it is a European and a Christian who calls him three parts Pagan and only one part Christian. When the Imperialism of Mr. Kipling and the pan-Christianism of Sir Harry rule the world as the sole arbiters of its destiny, what chance is there for the Quran, which, in the opinion of Sir Harry, "was, like the book of Mormon, a kind of parody of the Old Testament?" Would any toleration be then shown for a religion in which, according to this advocate of European morals, "lustful man was to find for thirteen centuries a warrant for polygamy and an excuse for uncontrolled sexuality?" Do we not see already, though yet dimly, the unthinkable future in the words of the writer when he talks of "the intolerable severance of the narrow mentality of Muhammad, an illiterate, uneducated, bandit mystic of the seventh century, A. C.?"

Prof. Margoliouth has done his worst in the vilest biography of the Prophet that has yet been written by a Christian to prove that in the character of the "bandit mystic" — a phrase confessedly based on the Professor's researches — mysticism was a secondary feature and brigado the main purpose of his life. He writes that "one mode of acquiring a living is open to the very poorest, when there is impunity and that is robbery," and adds that when persecuted by the Meccas he migrated to Medina, "even then he expected to have to fall back on plundering their caravans." According to him, the battle of Badr was a bandit's raid, and at Medina the Prophet was "at the head of a robber community." In the words of Sir Harry Johnston, "the appetite growing with the eating," Muhammad "sought to transform the successes of a bandit into the foundation of a kingdom." This line of reasoning is, of course, based on the Professor's own interpretation of the character of the Prophet of Islam. We have already quoted his summary of Muhammad's career, in which he is stated to have "founded an empire with religious and political capital," and to have given to his followers "a rallying-point in their common religion and therein discovered a bond more permanent than a dynasty." This is the view of Sir Mortimer Durand's "knowledgeful interpreter of Islam," and so let it be. But if a being whom a sixth of mankind regards as immaculate and a person of virtue and humanity, and of whom three hundred million people can say with assurance, if such a being was a bandit and had put himself at the head of a robber community, then those who have inherited their predatory habits as well as mysticism from him shall not readily allow other and more cultured bandits to snatch away the booty. If the appetite grew with the eating thirteen hundred years ago, it has not grown so dull with the diminishing sustenance of the last two hundred years that it can now reconcile itself to the promise of complete starvation. If Mecca was then made the religious and political capital of Muhammad's empire, is it right to suppose that what the Pioneer promises so innocently would reconcile the Mussalmans to the sight of the Cross floating over the Sacred Stone? If the Prophet of Islam had given them a rallying-point in their common creed, are we to believe with that "friend" of the Mussalmans that "the unity of the Moslem world is a barefaced fiction"? If, in the faith of his followers Muhammad had discovered a bond more permanent than a dynasty, are we to understand that Professor Margoliouth is right, and an appeal to the Brotherhood of Islam is as futile as an appeal in cynical Europe to the Brotherhood of Man? To our mind Islam and Pan-Islamism are one and neither is aggressive and provoking. But even the proverbial worm turns, and those who calculate on the acquiescence of peaceful Mussalmans in every aggression on the part of Europe and Christendom seem to believe that human nature is one thing in a Christian and quite its contrary in a Moslem. So far as India is concerned, we have no faith in a conventional, passive loyalty, and shall ever work for an active devotion to a King that is the Sovereign Lord of seventy million Mussalmans of India no less than of the forty-five million Christians of Great Britain and Ireland. But only a perverse judgment would base loyalty on anything but a rational basis, and it is difficult to believe that the mentality of British statesmen has become so warped as to call up wantonly the spirits of mischief from the vasty deep. No doubt that clouds have darkened the horizon. But we are inveterate optimists, and our unalterable belief that the Unity of God has yet to prevail throughout the universe, and that the Message of Islam is still only partially delivered, makes us certain of the silver lining to these dismal clouds.

"Whatever record leap to light,
"He never shall be shamed,"

This hope brings us to an aspect of the matter which seems to have been wholly ignored. Islam has never encouraged a lacerating distinction between this world and the next, or between things temporal and things spiritual. It is the prayer of Islam that the Faithful may receive good in this world and good in the next, and just as every Moslem is, or, at least, can be, a missionary, so also Islam does not require Moslem kings to renounce the good things of the world, like the great Buddha, before they can become useful missionaries of Islam. According to the Moslem view, a strict adherence to the spiritual precepts of Islam would not only ensure to the pious salvation hereafter, but temporal power in this world also. Viewed in this light, the loss of temporal power would betray a want of religious piety, and conversely, the extension of Islam's spiritual influence is certain to bring it political predominance also. These aspects of Islamic belief have evidently escaped the notice of those of its friends and advisers who would encourage it in the continuance of schisms and give it the opiate of security for its spiritual influence. Who that has read the history of Turko-Persian struggles in the sixteenth and subsequent centuries can mistake the significance of the remark of Busbequius, Ferdinand's ambassador at the court of Suleiman the Magnificent, that "Tis only the Persian stands between us and ruin. The Turk would fain be upon us, but he keeps him back. This war with him affords us only a respite, not a deliverance." As for the soothing syrup of spirituality, it is a little strange that its dispensers should be those who call themselves the disciple of a Messiah who said that his was not the kingdom of this world.

To the Mussalmans we shall say that, in the words of Kipling and another Turkish Minister, the God who hath poised upon nothing Heaven and Earth and by Whose aid Islam has so long struggled not altogether unsuccessfully against its foes, will come to the assistance of the Mussalmans only if they will follow His dictates. Unconditional loyalty to a temporal sovereign accords ill with the hope of unconditional assistance from the source of all power, temporal no less than spiritual. One of the greatest truths of the Quran is that which the greatest leader of Indian Mussalmans prominently put before them throughout a long and arduous career. It is this: "God never changeth the state of a people unless they change it themselves." It is the old, old story of the camel and the confidence in God.

بر تو کل (الرئی اعتر بندہ

(Tie up the camel's knee and trust it to God.) Cromwell, too, who very nearly approached a pious Mussalman in his ideals and actions, succeeded in attaining more than one "crowning grace" by making his Ironsides trust in God and keep their powder dry. It is this lesson that has to be taught to the Mussalmans painfully frequently all the world over.

Let us forget! Let us forget!

The Lords on the Announcement.

When the Government of India and the Secretary of State were planning the Delhi camp in absolute secrecy between them, the apparition of Lord Curzon, furious and indignant, must have many a time crossed their minds and caused them many an anxious moment of doubt and misgiving. They must have felt as if they would be guilty of a personal spite against the masterful proconsul by undoing that on which he had so deliberately and triumphantly set his seal. When immediately after the announcement at the Durbar, Lord Curzon expressed his surprise in the House of Lords in words of suppressed passion and defiance, and announced his resolve of initiating a full dress debate after the return of the King and Queen from India, the constitutional advisers of His Majesty must have felt a strange lifting of the load, though the threat of discussion must have kept them uneasy like the one awaiting a big surgical operation. The "fearful" debate has come and gone and the Secretary of State and the Government of India must have heaved their last sigh of relief. Lord Curzon spoke eloquently for one and three-quarter hours, and, as Lord Morley said, "he is always eloquent when he is indignant." He elaborated his points with his usual lucidity, skill and force of expression. Many of his important arguments have grown old enough by use and the new arguments that he advanced were unfortunately not very important. All the same his well-directed criticism delivered with a wealth of trenchant phrase and angry denunciation left not a shred of plausibility for Lord Crewe's apologies. The situation in itself was not without its ironies. A Radical Government that has talked itself hoarse with the popular formulas of democracy and constitutional rights has indulged in a supremely autocratic exercise of power under the wings of the Sovereign. A Tory statesman, himself an ex Viceroy of India, and an autocrat by temperament no less than by political faith, stands up to pronounce a damning indictment against the Radical Ministry for having flouted Parliament and violated the established constitutional usages of the land. The Secretary of State for India descends to a remarkably incoherent and fatuous pleading and can only urge opportunism in defence of his policy.

It is needless to repeat the arguments on which Lord Curzon's indictment was based. Even the most inveterate believer in the infallibility of governments can say nothing in defence of the abrupt and unconstitutional manner in which the Government of India has rushed through the measures on which it had set its heart in secret. It was fully conscious of the enormity of its bold project, and it could not trust itself to carry it through without using the prestige of Royalty on a solemn and momentous occasion. The secrecy was observed not so much for the sake of the ultimate dramatic effect as on account of the Government being nervously afraid of the tremendous opposition and hostility that the measures would have evoked if public opinion had been consulted. Lord Curzon pressed home this aspect of the matter with great directness and vigour. Everyone would agree with him in his pathetic observation that "if we had dared to do what you have done, you would have made the heavens ring with your denunciation." But having done what even the Tories have never dared to do, Lord Crewe can justify his radical autocracy by making fugitive and feeble references to Tory high-handedness in the past. The fact of the matter is that, setting aside the intrinsic merits of the changes, there can be no justification of the manner in which they have been carried out. The line of defence that the Secretary of State has taken up in regard to the grave constitutional issues involved has only served to emphasize the fact that His Majesty's advisers have very imperfectly grasped those issues in all their bearings. The one great fact that seems to have influenced them in the formulation of the far-reaching schemes, the full import of which they are only now beginning to apprehend, has been their determination to escape from their present influences and environments. One cannot help feeling the truth in Lord Curzon's gibe that a Liberal Government should be seeking to fly from their rights for the Bengalees for whom they have done so much. Be this as it may, we are not sure if the Bengalees would let the Government go so easily. It is, as it were, the Nemesis of the British Rule, and will continue to dog the footsteps of those who are responsible for the government of the country. If we can believe a Bengalee periodical, the Bengalee invasion of Delhi has already been thought about and planned in detail; and who knows but that the Government of India may some day be driven from Delhi into the fastnesses of the Himalayas?

Lord Crewe in defending an indefensible position was driven to use arguments which are, to say the least of them, irrelevant. The despatches which a Society of Mutual Admiration had drawn up with a view to impress the world with the variety and scope of its power and the smooth omnipotence with which it could create a new earth, if not a new heaven, had conveniently glossed over many vital interests that had been severely shaken or injured. But no gloss could cover the naked audacity of the method when examined in the cold light of reason and constitutional usage. It is, therefore, not a little amusing too to see Lord Crewe driven to ridiculous shifts in order to secure for the novel practices of the Indian Government a modest measure of public sufferance. He says that "it is one of the merits of our scheme that it does not represent the triumph of any party or creed. Each party would have preferred some of the features removed if the rest were retained." These lines lay down a proposition that would delight the soul of a diplomat. According to this, an act or a measure should just balance the various interests affected, taking something here and conceding a little there, without the least reference to justice or its permanent and enduring effects on the life and progress of the people as a whole. Surely, no statesman responsible for the many-sided developments of a huge population in various stages of social and political evolution could approach the administration or other problems in the spirit of one concerned only with the needs and the triumph of the passing hour. Surely, it is no reason to deprive the public of its traditional right to express opinion on measures of vital importance because their disclosure at an early stage would lead to angry and passionate discussions "possibly leading to the application to some English newspapers of the more extreme rigours of the Press Act." No one can excuse himself of having neglected to do his duty on the plea that he was afraid it might lead some one else to break the law. Similarly there is no reason why "agitation among the Muhammadans" should be considered as something undesirable when something is done which admittedly militates against their interests. We utterly fail to see the justice or wisdom of the policy which plans something behind the back of the people, forces it down their throat on a peculiarly unique and solemn occasion and then glories in having manoeuvred them successfully into a reluctant acquiescence in the accomplished fact without agitation because they have been led to believe it to be the will of their Sovereign. A champion hustler securing emergency votes for a party platform may well have prided himself on manoeuvres such as these.

It is no doubt a wise practice to keep the Sovereign outside the arena of party politics. It is therefore all the more necessary, especially in regard to Indian affairs, that nothing of a violently controversial nature should be sprung on the people through the mouth of the Sovereign. Lord Crewe was apparently very anxious to mark the occasion of the Durbar with something very huge and striking such as could keep it alive as a distinct landmark in the history of the country. Was it only through unconstitutional escapades and huge administrative gambling in areas and populations that that laudable object could be attained? Lord Macdonnell, whose Indian horizon is bounded by the pun Hindu cries of the Indian National Congress, can easily believe that "His Majesty's announcement changing the current of thought of an entire people from discontent to loyalty was as happy an event as any in India's history." If Lord Macdonnell's mind had been a little less afflicted with bias he could have easily realized that the announcement had enough in it to change the current of thought of about 70 millions of people from loyalty to discontent. Lord Minto had a truer grasp of the whole situation when he said that "throughout the meagre correspondence submitted there was little trace of the true appreciation of the grave issues affected with regard to the re-organization of Bengal. The way the repeated declarations to the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal had been disowned was not conducive to the reputation of the British Administration in India. The reorganization was only a sop to a political faction as a recompense for the removal of the capital." The spectacle of a Secretary of State clutching at every passing straw and pressing into service all possible and impossible opinions and conjectures to justify what he cannot even explain is not very edifying. The message of loyal homage sent to His Majesty by the princes and people of India was an expression of joy and thankfulness for the immense benefit done to the country by the Royal visit. But to construe it in any way as approving the procedure or substance of the Durbar announcement is surely to read something into it which the authors of the message had never intended to mean.

As a matter of fact the Government of India had decided in secret conclave that the thing had to be done. They therefore did it in a way that could shield them most effectually from the vexations of a powerful and widespread agitation. Against the changes themselves we have nothing more to say. The substantial injury has fallen to the share of the Eastern Bengal Mussalmans. Lord Crewe has recognised that "the Muhammadans have shown remarkable self-restraint and a great many have refused to join in anything in the nature of an agitation hostile to the Government." Under the circumstance it is the duty of the Government to reward such loyalty and self-restraint in a befitting and handsome manner. Lord Crewe thinks that "the best way to convert the balance against the Mussalmans anywhere in India was to give them a chance of improving their position on equal terms with their Hindu fellow-subjects. This could be best done long by increasing their facilities for education." The Mussalmans ask for nothing more. Their only hope is that the Government will afford them the necessary equality of opportunity. Will the Government redeem the pledges so often made to the Mussalmans in the spirit of Lord Crewe's utterance? We are waiting for definite pronouncements in this behalf and we hope we shall not have long to wait.

The Council

By THE HON. MR. GUY.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please

—As You Take It

After the light repast of more than a month ago, Council met again on the 23rd. H. E. himself presided with customary grace and sat throughout the sitting, though Sir Guy's motion for the suspension of the rules to admit Dashing Boy's Resolution before Legislative Business had foreshadowed an early retirement from the turmoil of politics. Thus Sir Guy escaped the worry of cosetting his own quiet nook by the side of his Secretary, which he secured long ago in spite of his seniority, for the doubtful joy and doubtless responsibility of the Presidential chair.

As the roving eye of the spectator went round the assembly gaps in personalities if not in places were visible. Death had laid a heavy hand on the fraternity of friendly wranglers for among the non-officials the Mir of Sind and the Sirdar of the Sikhs, and among the officials Sandow II were no more. They had departed to another Council, where questions were perhaps still more difficult to answer, where Acts and not Resolutions had any value and where surpluses and deficits mattered far more than the result of a gamble in rain, for the stake was a whole eternity of peace or of regrets.

H. E. opened the proceedings with the note of sadness, and referred to the inexorable character of the law of nature that had robbed India and the Government of India of Sandow II while the country still remembered the enthusiasm and joy evoked by the Royal visit to Calcutta. Little could the strength which battled so successfully against all possible inclination to petty jealousy and meanness avail him when he battled with Death. But the song or defeat is gone when those who intimately knew the victor-victim could say of him,

"Statesman, yet friend to truth, of soul sincere,

"In action faithful, and in honour clear,

"Who broke no promise, served no private end

Such a one is a Strong Man indeed, for he has the strength of Truth and Sincerity. The tribute of regret was also due to the Mir and the Sirdar, for each tried to do his duty by his country according to his lights, and death and doing one's best are levellers of all, of the official and the non-official, the strong and the weak.

At question time, at the summons of Bhupen Babu, Bootlair Sahib placed before the Council the memento mori of his own Department. Three Indians against 208 Europeans in the Indian Educational Service in the year of grace 1912, and one Indian appointed out of every 105 admitted into the Service during the last 16 years. This sad state of affairs has been revealed in official statements, speeches and replies only too often. Trust that Bhupen Babu's reminder would not act like grave-digging on the clowns in Hamlet, and "custom" would not make it in the Department "a property of easiness." As Hamlet said, "the hand of little employment bath the daintier sense," and perpetual reminders may take away from the official "the feeling of his business."

Bhupen Babu evidently of the same mind as S. of S. and very wroth because a doctor had disagreed. In spite of the endless controversy raging about the announcement, Bhupen

Babu would have every Civil Surgeon in the land know that the boons are not controversial matter and that Royalty has not only made them irrevocable but also non-controversial. So, forgetting his own tearful optic, he would have every man-jack of them wink with both eyes as a sign of loyal jubilation. Wanted to know what operation, major or minor, Government were going to perform on the Seditious Surgeon who would permit no mention of the Royal Visit to cursed Calcutta in the Viceroyal welcome to darling Dacca. Regie, the new Minister of the Interior, dolefully replied that,

It was a lark to the Herald of the Morn
And no official nightgale that sang
Come Bhupen, look, what enviable streaks
Do lace Partition clouds in East Bengal
Nights' candles are burnt out, and jocund day
Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops,
Only half hid by Dacca's 'Varsity
Bear with us while we pack our household gods,
And from Job Chernock's fishing hamlet hie
To Delhi's charnel-house, and there exchange
Bengal's mosquitos with the Northern snakes.
The Englishman with ill-divining soul,
Cassandra-like croaks daily out of tune,
Straining harsh discords and displeasing sharps
It sees us dead in the bottom of a tomb
But we are winging for the Imperial Flight
We must be gone and live, not stay and die

Questions over, and Sir Guy having secured a warrant of precedence for Dashing Boy, the House was flooded over with printed eloquence. More than once Council not only smelt the midnight oil in Dashing Boy's orator, but also saw therein the stains of the printer's ink. "I will further down enter more fully into the facts connected with the increase," and "the italics are mine," betrayed him even more than the printed speech from which he read out. The accents were the accents of the orator, but the italics were entirely the printer's. Began by describing the various disguises of the Income Tax, and in asking for the raising of the minimum of taxable income, although he quoted Lord Curzon's hope of further remissions and reliefs, proudly proclaimed that he did not seek to justify his Resolution by any promise of Government. He took his stand upon a higher ground, the justice of the case. A veritable Kutub Minar of Dashing Boy's own construction to the Ochterlony Monument of such unstable things as Government's promises. But the very first argument from "the justice of the case" was a quotation from the Statesman that in India the Income Tax still remained in the crudest and least scientific form and essentially a poor man's tax. Wonder whether Pope, whom H. E. had quoted earlier in the morning, could have thought it possible for a journal to call itself the Statesman, when he wrote, "Statesman, yet friend to truth."

The Council rejoiced to hear that Dashing Boy did not intend to go into "an elaborate discussion of the features of the Indian Tax which distinguish it from the English Income Tax." Colour was bad enough as an invidious distinction between Indian and English, but heaven help us if it comes to a comparison of figures and thereafter an elaborate discussion of features as well.

Discussing the rise in prices, said it was "all round." One would have thought that altitude alone was enough to make it formidable without throwing in rotundity into the bargain. Referring to the idea of Sir Guy that the rise was due to "world factors," added that "world factors" will not disappear from the Indian economic situation unless we are going to live in utter seclusion from the world, of which there was precious little chance." This vividly caused uneasiness in the ranks of the Government of India, and all wondered if Dashing Boy had learnt from some secret source that even the irrevocable word was to be revoked and the Imperial Flight finally abandoned.

When he came to explain that "the fact that wages of domestic labour has increased simultaneously with the recent enhancement in prices, only adds to the difficulties of the humble bhadralog," the Nawab of Jaunpur, who judges all things in the world from the standpoint of the Domestic Servants' Agency, wondered if C.I.E's, Nawabs and Khan Bahadur log were also included in the term bhadralog. Included or excluded, he keenly felt for those whose Home Department arrangements were upset by the Government of India's Finance or Education Department.

Regardless of the inhuman possibilities of the Government, talked of human probabilities, and said that the principles underlying the methods of assessment made it more honourous to the respectable poor, but English as she should be spoke makes more onerous demands on the speakers. Went on to give the Council the much needed information that one mark was equal to Rs. 12, and referred to the English practice of distinguishing between "earned" and "unearned" incomes, creating some anxiety in the mind of the Education Department as to the category under which the salaries of those must be classed who have nothing to do but to provide tenants for deserted secretariat, by creating conjectural Teaching and Residential Universities. Said that "the English practice will provide an inspiring example," and cheered the heart of the Administrative Orphan who had not heard a good word for his former chief since he had landed in India.

After a wealth of comparative wisdom, came to the question of questions, whether his suggestion of the abandonment of a revenue of 30 lakhs could be "received with equanimity." Never fear, Dashing Boy, it is sure to be received with perfect equanimity. For not one man in the Council would agree to the abandonment of 30 shells just now, much less 30 lakhs, and there is therefore no need of any excitement. Only a "lively faith," a faith that skips and jumps and turns somersaults in the mere joie de vivre would believe that 30 lakhs more or less don't matter much after all. In spite of constant opposition to every suggestion of the Mild Hindu for the extension of education took his oath that he yielded to none in his enthusiasm for mass education. But had a telling reply for all those whose opposition was anticipated, that the retention of 30 lakhs did not guarantee but a bras armé would be spent on schools and drains. In any case, had an alternative scheme for replenishing the coffers of Sir Guy by taking from him or his Secretary as well, along with others drawing more than Rs. 50,000 or 30,000 as pay, six pias per rupee instead of five. This suggestion was made possible by the courtesy of Orator (now ex Orator) Meston, on whose well-merited elevation to a satrapy and to the suggested limit for a super-tax Dashing Boy was easily the first to congratulate him in the debate. In conclusion—yes, there was a conclusion at long last—trusted that "this loading" would prove far more productive in the end, and, at any rate, when 30 lakhs were once abandoned, he could trust Sir Guy, "with his ingenuity and superior knowledge" to "devise other and more satisfactory means of recoupment"—if necessary!

تر مشق ناز کو خون در عالم میری گردن پر

(Practice thy arts, and the blood of the two worlds be on my head)

When this oratorical effort was over, and Dashing Boy was relieved of the pent up passions of the fiscal reformer, Cheery Chintus, in his bright new knight's armour, rose to leave such knotty—or was it naughty?—concerns as changes in financial matters to a paternal and benign Government.

Sobron, the Pantaloon, appeared no more as a sympathetic friend of raiders on the Government Treasury, but adopted a new Nymphathetic attitude. Congress and League were not against the lower limit, and if these Upper Thousand circles were indifferent to such matters, why need a Council of the Upper Ten worry about it? Anyhow the moment was inopportune.

Then rose the Khan Bahadur to declaim his maiden meditation. But his fancy loyally turned to thoughts of peace which the British Government had established, which converted its very generals out for a war in Aborland into clerks of the weather. The speech was encyclopaedic in its wide expanse, but the refrain of loyalty provided the nexus of relevancy. Talked in the familiar style of Lahore and League platforms of "thrills of delight," and it appeared that the speech, far from taxing his well-trained larynx, acted only as Rahat-i-lagoom.

Burly Raja rose to correct the geographical inexactitude of the Khan Bahadur and said that India was a Peninsula and not quite a Continent. And thereafter fell incontinently into language not quite unlike that of another loyal nobleman who had mixed up ribbons with ropes. With Sobron, the Pantaloon, and the Punjab Khan Bahadur, he considered the moment inopportune, explaining that there were other requirements such as "the outlay needed to create an Imperial Delhi," and "further, there was the Dacca University, while other things might crop up in these inordinate times."

The Mild Hindu also joined the opposition, but the habitual moderation of his opinions made him suggest that even if Sir Guy could not commit the offence of abandoning 30 lakhs, he may take a hand in abatement.

Madge gave convincing assurances that there was "a class of people in this country who were obliged to adopt a higher standard of living when their means were growing smaller year after year." Although he did not name the class, was there any doubt that this referred to people who lived à la Whitcaway, when their means suggested the mode of the Municipal Market? He could not support the Resolution as it could not relieve this class, but he hoped Sir Guy would become their William Whiteley, and, in the famous phrase of Sir Ali Baba, K C B. make them Commissioners or give 'em pensions.

This was the last straw and Sir Guy could hear no more. Rose to reply, and disturbed the peaceful plans of the Undesirable Alien, who was just then drafting a cable to the pale Grey Liberal about the "stable" Government of Persia after the horse had been stolen. Sir Guy indicated the clear drift of Dashing Boy's fiscal policy as leading to bankruptcy. "Last year he attacked Cotton duties, this year he assails the Income Tax. If he had his way, revenues would apparently continually diminish, whilst the claims upon them, which he concurrently presses, would steadily increase. This he called "a remarkably illogical attitude." But what could be more logical? If Sir Guy would not grant his claims, he must curtail Sir Guy's. As Glasgow's belated passenger said to the railway Guard, who would not let him jump into the moving train, and was therefore held down by the Glaswegian when himself jumping into the Brake Van, "If I munna, thou sanna."

Surprising how in Finance also, as in all else, "Judy O'Grady and the Colonel's lady are sisters under their skin." For here was Sir Guy approvingly quoting "the present British Chancellor of the Exchequer"—no other than Lloyd George—who called the Income Tax "the centre and sheet anchor of the British financial system." Wonder whether Sir Guy is getting into the Georgian mood as a good training for the forthcoming Budget. Lloyd George has said so many nasty things in his time, and it would be a sight for the gods to see Sir Guy coming out in true Lamethouse fashion. We cannot speak for the language, but the thought seems to be running in the identical groove, for he told Dashing Boy that if asked again for a 1,500 rupee limit, he may be induced to see it he could not bring it down to 500. Like the weaver who prayed for a horse when his legs could carry him no further on the long and wearisome journey, and who for all his prayers got a young colt to carry on his back for the robbers whom he chanced to meet, Dashing Boy may well exclaim,

(O thou that hearest by contraries, I had prayed for one below, but have got one above!) It would almost be a "boon!"

Dashing Boy dashed himself on the Council once more to the utter dismay of H. L. But he cleared the doubts of the President by claiming the right of reply. This unexpected check only acted like a hose that tipped an oil tank and played on a raging fire, and the next second, Dashing Boy, foaming at the mouth and looking a whole arsenal on the non-official members, blurted out the query, "What is the exact psychological moment for a reduction?" Cheery Chintus looked at Sobron, Sobron stared at the Khan Bahadur; the Khan Bahadur gazed at Burly Raja in blank amazement, and the gaze recoiled from him to the Mild Hindu as a Martini bullet may ricochet off a rhino. The Mild Hindu sought an answer from the melancholy vacancy of Madge, and Madge turned to Sir Guy. But the Cerberus of Finance had been turned by some unkind fairy into a star-dreamer for the nonce, and was evidently tracing in his mind the movements of the Great Bear on the Government House firmament. So, like a boomerang, or the broad cast upon the waters, Dashing Boy's query came back to him, and echo answered, "Hwat?"

Balked in his search for the Psychological Moment, Dashing Boy, like a true Loyalist, dashed himself on the serned phalanx of the Congress and said that the Income Tax was left severely alone because it was known that this was the only Tax on the Feringhee. At this Madge became a little unhinged and shouted,

"My tables, my tables—meet it is I set it down," and forthwith passed a sponge over "all trivial fond records," "all saws of books" and other such stray marks on the slate of his memory.

Complimented the Khan Bahadur on securing the brush at his very first meet as the reward of being at the kill of a "popular measure," little knowing that the Khan Bahadur had successfully settled many a popular measure before. After stating with delightful tautology and blissful ignorance that the incidence of land revenue does not fall on the rural population, but—unlike Cotton duties perhaps—is part of the cost of production, expressed a hope that wisdom may yet come to the Finance Department and his persuasive and prolonged eloquence from the unattainable height of the Kutub may not all be in vain. Sir Guy was now no longer busy star-gazing, and looking Dashing Boy steadily in the face, "permitted a non-committal smile to hover about the pursed lips of High Finance.

The legislative business was small and uneventful, Regic making his debut in Select Committees with the one sacred to lunacy.

Then came a reversion to Resolutions, and the Mild Hindu moved for papers about the Inchcape Committee. Within a railway yard of him, sat the Railway Sleeper in a posture reminiscent of the asana of a yogi. The right foot was twisted peculiarly and reappeared under the left knee. The left hand rested on the waist with elbow thrown out, while the right held the chin philosophically. The Mild Hindu complained that he had no official news of the Inchcape Committee. He had only read in the papers that Inchcape was coming. Then the papers told him he had arrived. Later they informed him that he was holding a Conference. And finally he learnt from the same source that the Conference was over and that the report was to leave by the last mail. Now, that proves how useful are the papers! Once bitten, twice shy. The papers are not going to be sold again, as they were over the boons "Anticipation of events, intelligent or otherwise"? Why, good papers are like great men. They create events and circumstances. But Mild Hindu was not concerned with all this. He wanted, like Goethe on his deathbed, "more light." Why were there no press communiqués or official déments? What was Inchcape's position? What were the terms of reference? Was it a fact that he was going to report direct to the S. of S? What was the position of the Government of India? Had any protest been made against such strange proceedings? To all of which another query might have been added. Was the Inchcape Committee the Nemesis of the Announcement, hatched in the privacy of those incubators, the Despatch Boxes of Whitehall, breaking the shell only as "an accomplished fact"? The Mild Hindu talked of the "proper channel," forgetting that the new irrigation policy of the Government had altogether done away with proper channels, substituting for them the subsoil current of secrecy. After explaining the position of the President of the Conference and its reaction on the interests of the Railway Board and the Companies, expressed doubts about the unconscious bias of the senior partner of a commercial house having extensive dealings with Railway Companies, and feared that he may not prove an Inchcape of Good Hope to the people. Referred to the tightening of the control of the Council and the Finance Department over the Railway Board and the consequent turn of the screw on the Companies and incidentally declared that the Railway Sleeper had ideal qualifications for the work of the Board. After all, the Railway Sleeper is the basis of all Railway lines, and this one returned the compliment by designing on the writing pad another bogey on the model of the Mild Hindu bogey of the Railways.

Mud Holkar explained his self denying ordinance, of withdrawing his earlier questions in view of this resolution, and ran at express speed through tunnels and over bridges when he referred to "the extreme disappointment, indignation and alarm felt by all classes in this country because of the secrecy in which the proceedings of the Committee were shrouded."

Vital Thackeray gave his massive support, but as he intends bringing forward a Resolution of his own on Railway Policy, and speeches with him are not plentiful, did not care to waste words on Mild Hindu's Resolution. In the course of his short speech, neatly cleared the five barred gate of the Railway Sleeper's Christian name and referred to him merely as Sir Wynne. Graham very naturally dissociated his own constituency from "the disappointment, indignation and alarm" about this instance of secrecy. After all Calcutta is no more the Capital of India. So there may be as much secrecy now as the Government ever cared to have. After us the deluge.

The Administrative Orphan rose to "explain the matter in a very few words." Alas for the scarcity of current coin, and the choice of the psychological moment for a retrenchment of words. What Committee? Which Inquiry? Who's Inchcape? Who talks of Terms of Reference? There were no such things. It was all an illusion; nothing but maya. Om, mani padam, Om! As for newspaper reports, who believes them? In fact, who reads them? He never did. He has more secret despatches to read than he can spare time for, and even official déments might let out the feline contents of administrative bags.

The Mild Hindu called for a division, and nearly died for joy to know that out of the three hundred and fifteen millions of India there were as many as nineteen that had been fed up with the sage of secrecy, and the broth of evasive replies.

Petty Larceny.

[MOTTO.—"Wit is your birthright, therefore steal it wherever you find it."—Rigmarole Veda.]

A SCHOOL INSPECTOR was trying to elicit from a very ignorant class the name of the capital of France. "Think, boys, what is the place to which so many of the rich and fashionable people go?" A pause, then one boy puts out his hand: "Please, Sir, Hell, Sir."

MRS. X (away from home). "John, did you leave out anything for the cat before you started?"

Mr. X. (who dislikes the beast). "Yes; I left a can of condensed milk on the table, with a can-opener beside it."

FIRST SOCIETY LADY. "That pretty baby we've just passed is mine."

Second Society Lady: "How ever did you know?"

First Society Lady: "I recognized the nurse."

THE old friends had had three days together.

"You have a pretty place here," remarked the guest on the morning of his departure. "But it looks a bit bare yet."

"Oh, that's because the trees are so young," answered the host, comfortably. "I hope they'll have grown to a good size before you come again."

FIRST STRANGER (at Douglas). "Ah, sir, it seems a shame to see all this water going to waste."

Second Stranger. "Jesso, jesso."

First Stranger. "Are you a mechanical engineer, sir?"

Second Stranger. "No, sir, I'm a milkman."

YOUNG HOPEFUL. "Father, what is a traitor in politics?"

Veteran Politician. "A traitor is a man who leaves our party and goes over to the other one."

Young Hopeful. "Well, then, what is a man who leaves his party, and comes over to yours?"

"Veteran Politician. "A convert, my son."

A LOCAL doctor once sent his man with a box of pills to a patient and a hamper containing six live pullets to be left at the house of a friend. Unluckily the messenger bungled over his errand and took the hamper to the patient and the pills to his master's friend. Imagine the consternation of the patient on receiving along with the fowls the following prescription—

"Two of these to be swallowed every half-hour."

A UNFRIENDLY clergyman, while walking in a colonial mining district, came upon an old man turning a windlass which hauled up ore from the shaft. It was a very hot day, but the old man had thrown aside his hat, and the sun was streaming down upon his bare head.

"If you expose your head to the sun in that way," said the good parson, "your brain will be injured."

But the old man only looked wearily at the speaker and shook his head. "I wouldn't be doing this all day long if I had any brains," he answered quietly.

IN A Board School recently an inspector was examining a geography class of boys on Africa.

After he had put many questions he asked the following:—

"What bird lives in Africa, and has wings, but cannot fly?"

This question seemed to puzzle the boys very much, and seeing them hesitate, the inspector said:—

"Come! come! Cannot some of you tell me?"

At last a little boy put up his hand, and said:—

"Please, sir, a dead'un."

A PRESS Communiqué is issued denying the rumour that, in view of the expected disorder in Glamorgan connected with the miners' strike, Russian troops have been despatched to the affected area with the full concurrence of Sir Edward Grey, and that France and Russia have signed a Convention jointly guaranteeing the integrity and independence of Great Britain.

We are enabled to state that there is no truth whatever in the rumour that Mr. P. S. W. would be made the Governor of Bombay on the retirement of Sir George Clarke, with Mr. Sherrinck as a Councillor, and that the Anglo-Indian community of Calcutta is to be given a teaching and residential University.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

THE Karachi Chamber of Commerce has telegraphed to the Foreign Office, Calcutta, urging that a small escort of Indian troops should accompany each caravan leaving Buncer Abbas for the interior of South-Eastern Persia.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 19th —The British and Russian Ministers presented a note yesterday evening containing a joint declaration of policy.

Sir John Lonsdale on the 19th asked whether Sir Edward Grey's attention had been drawn to the boycott of British firms in Persia. Mr. Asquith replied that Government was taking all possible steps to remove the boycott in Shiraz. All other cases had been dealt with satisfactorily.

The Imperial Government intended to demand compensation for the attack on Consul Smart. Mr. Asquith said it was understood that the Swedes in Persian service had elaborated a scheme for policing the Bushire-Ispahan Road. Mr. Asquith added that the compensation demanded was £4,734 and gave details of the casualties consequent on the attack on Consul Smart and said that the total value of animals and property destroyed was about £900.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 19th —The Anglo-Russian Note offers an advance of £200,000 at 7 per cent on condition that Persia undertakes to conform with the principles of the Anglo-Russian Agreement to dismiss Fidaïs and other irregulars immediately the ex-Shah quits Persian territory, to organise a small and effective army and to arrange terms with the ex-Shah as previously suggested by both Powers. The Note makes no mention of withdrawal of the Russian troops.

In the House of Commons on the 20th Mr. Ponsonby moving an amendment to the Address complained that the Government had failed to take effective steps to preserve the integrity and independence of Persia in accordance with the Anglo-Russian Agreement. Consequently, he said, the Indian Empire and the interests of Great Britain were gravely menaced.

Sir Edward Grey replied on the line of his previous utterances on the subject of Persia, repeating the charge that our strategic interests had been damaged since the entente with Russia. He emphasised that he had taken a strong line with regard to the ex-Shah, whom he said we would not recognise again. Sir Edward Grey stated that our share of the Anglo-Russian Loan of £200,000 would be used to restore the security of the southern roads. Mr. Ponsonby withdrew his amendment.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "ENGLISH" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Washington, January 26.

THE New York American prints prominently this morning a report of a conversation which its representative has had with Mr. Shuster in Paris. Mr. Shuster denies the report that he had been placed in Persia in the interest of a certain powerful American financial house. He could, he is reported to have said, have done anything he liked in Persia.

"I could have been absolute dictator had I said the word. Thirty-five of the bravest officers of the Guard not only swore allegiance to me but were ready and anxious to fight for me. They regarded me as the saviour of their country. My word came to be taken as law to such an extent that I had to be very careful about uttering any figurative expression that might be misconstrued. Law or justice did not exist. The force of power was the only law recognized and superior strength alone gave justice."

In the circumstances to have been in the slightest degree false to his trust would have been the act of a "low dog." Mr. Shuster then told how, in November, the Government proposed that he should hand over to any American he liked the Trans-Persian Railway enterprise, and how he refused to consider the proposal.

Until the United States shows strength and influence to protect American investors it will be useless, Mr. Shuster thinks, for American capital to try to overcome the obstacles of the dominating influence of Russia and England.

The ex-Treasurer-General assured the representative of the American that Monday's address before the Persian Committee would not be lacking in sensationalism.

Mr. H. F. B. Lynch has received the following telegram from the Sardar Assad, dated Teheran the 24th instant —

I desire to give every assurance that myself and my family do not in the least think of acquiring the Regency or of establishing a Bakhtiari dynasty. We shall serve the responsible and Constitutional Government alone and no other regime. Rumours of dissent between the Regent and myself are without foundation, as are all other rumours which mischiefmakers are spreading against myself and Cabinet. The Cabinet is most trustworthy, and deserves the fullest confidence; it is inspired with only patriotic feelings. You can fully assure the friends of Persia in this respect. (Signed) ALI KUTLI BAKHTIARI (SARDAR ASSAD).

Teheran, January 28.

M. Mornard has appointed Mr. Lecoffre to be collector of the revenues of the province of Fars and will probably also appoint Mr. Schindler elsewhere in the south. He has applied for leave to appoint a new Belgian Treasury staff.

Teheran is threatened with a serious deficiency of bread, as since Mr. Shuster's departure the Governor and his associates have revived the corn ring.

St. Petersburg, January 27.

A telegram from Tabriz states that six Fedais who took part in the attacks on Russian troops have been executed — (Reuter).

St. Petersburg, January 28.

The reiterated rumours from Teheran alleging that Russia is increasing her troops in Persia and that Russian agents are covertly assisting the ex-Shah are baseless. I am enabled to state positively and categorically that not a single soldier has been added to the contingent of 9,000 which was in Persia three weeks ago, nor is there the slightest intention of increasing it. The force at Meshed consists of one battalion of Turkistan Rifles with one sotnia and six guns. Another battalion at Korkhan, halfway between Meshed and Turkistan is guarding the communications. The Kazvin detachment has not been increased, nor will any troops be moved south.

Far from helping the ex-Shah, it may be taken as the firm and unalterable determination of the Russian Government that the presence of the Russian troops in Persia shall in no case contribute to his restoration. The Consul at Resht, who is said to be secretly assisting Mohammed Ali's adherents, recently disarmed the Governor of Ardebil and compelled him to return to Ardebil. The strictest injunctions have been telegraphed to the Russian Consular officers to do their utmost to prevent any combined action on the part of the ex-Shah's agents and partisans.

Teheran, January 30.

The Government organ, the Attah, publishes a prominent inspired article foreshadowing approaching Anglo-Russian representations. It declares that the exceptional state of the country demands exceptional measures. The Government must rely on Anglo-Russian support in carrying out the heavy task before it. The Anglo-Russian Convention contains nothing inherently inimical to Persia, and if Sir Edward Grey's statements in December in the House of Commons, which the journal quotes, represent reality, Persia is entitled to expect Anglo-Russian help. Nevertheless, the Government was only induced to accept the Russian ultimatum in the hope of an early withdrawal of the Russian troops not only at Kazvin but elsewhere. Russia now appears disposed to say that she will withdraw only when the Central Government is sufficiently strong to maintain order, this is moving in a vicious circle. While the troops remain the Government can have no prestige and the restoration of order is hopeless. Although Russia designs the troops as a moral support for the Government, the effect is quite contrary, unless, therefore, the Government possessed guarantees for the withdrawal of the troops, the acceptance of the ultimatum was a profound mistake.

This significant article is interpreted as meaning that the Cabinet is ready to recognize the Anglo-Russian Convention, if the forthcoming negotiations promise a withdrawal of the troops. I understand that Russia has now finally formulated her views in London.

Mr. Shuster on Persia.

MR. W. MORGAN SHUSTER, the late Treasurer-General of Persia, was entertained at dinner at the Savoy Hotel on the night of the 29th January by the Persia Committee, when he gave a complete statement of his experiences in that capacity during the last eight months.

Mr H F. B. Lynch, chairman of the committee, presided at the dinner, and amongst a company numbering about 240 ladies and gentlemen present were the Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali, Sir T. and Lady Barclay, Mr. C. Barclay, Sir M. M. Bhowanaggee, Professor E. G. Browne, Dr. Chapple, M.P., Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Cobden Sanderson, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Dewar, Mr. A. Ponsonby, M.P., Mr. J. S. Fletcher, M.P., Mr. H. S. Foster, Consul-General for Persia, Mr. A. B. Cunningham-Graham, Mr. Stephen Gwynn, M.P., Mr. P. Morrell, M.P., and Lady Ottoline Morrell, Mr. C. J. O'Donnell, M.P., Captain C. B. Stokes, Lieutenant Colonel G. C. Trench, Mr. and Mrs. Fisher Unwin, and Mr. F. Whelen, honorary secretary.

The Chairman gave the toast of "The King," which was followed by that of "The President of the United States," proposed by Sir T. Barclay.

The Chairman afterwards proposed "The Guest of the Evening," and said that in welcoming Mr. Shuster the Persia Committee had been pursuing a course strictly in accordance with their past action. From the very first they had supported that gentleman in the extremely difficult and delicate task which was committed to his charge. He denied that Mr. Shuster had ever endeavoured to upset the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which, he said, was a purely commercial matter and had nothing to do with politics. The real reason of Mr. Shuster's dismissal had been given him by an Englishman in Persia, who was not a sympathizer with the Nationalist or Democratic Party in Persia, when he wrote him that Mr. Shuster's mission was doomed to failure because if Persia were made prosperous it would weaken Russian influence.

Mr. Shuster, who was most warmly acclaimed on rising to reply, disclaimed having any irritation or rancour of any kind. His object in being there, apart from the pleasure of meeting that distinguished gathering, was to enable people in this country to form a better opinion as to the fairness and the wisdom of the political treatment administered to Persia by two powerful Governments which had special interests there. He would not deny that he had felt a certain resentment as to the manner and form in which his dismissal from the office of Treasurer-General was brought about, but he was not posent enough to claim that he had been irreparably damaged by it, hence he claimed to speak with at least a degree of impartiality.

Mr. Shuster went on to describe the conditions under which the post of Treasurer-General was tendered to him last December, and how he accepted it only in the belief that there was an opportunity to do a creditable piece of constructive financial work. On arrival he found the finances of the Persian Government in a chaotic state, and corruption and dishonesty of all kinds rampant throughout the administrative services. After spending two days in discussing the situation with people in all walks of life, and particularly with the leading members of the Mejlis, he informed them that the situation was such that nothing but arbitrary and drastic control in fiscal matters would save it, and it was for the legislative body to state whether they were prepared to concede such power to a foreigner of whom they necessarily knew but little. The Mejlis promptly decided that this was a necessary step and requested him to draft a simple basic financial law. This he did and the law was passed on 13th June by a practically unanimous vote.

The Russian Legation at once said that they needed no assistance from Persia in the matter of the Customs, the receipts from which were largely pledged to Russia. Other Legations joined in this opposition, with the exception of the British, Turkish, and, of course, the American Legations. The effect of this opposition was to delay for nearly two months the work of establishing a central Treasury system, and it was only when he stated that he would put before the Mejlis a proposition to cancel the contracts of the Belgian Customs officials that the opposition collapsed and M. Mornard agreed to obey the law.

He went on to explain the difficulties which arose from his endeavours to employ the services of Major Stokes to assist him in organizing a Treasury Gendarmerie, which was the only means by which the internal taxes could be promptly and efficiently collected by the Central Government. It was at this point that he received new light on what the Russian and British Governments considered to be the far-reaching effect of the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907, although the British Foreign Office had only shortly before agreed to Major Stokes being employed for this work if he resigned his commission in the British Indian Army, a thing which he promptly did. Finding that the Russian opposition to Major Stokes was unalterable, he sought to reach an agreement whereby the Russian Government would consent to Major Stokes advising him in the formation of this Gendarmerie for so short a period as ten months, but after frequent discussions with the Russian Legation the St. Petersburg Government refused absolutely to withdraw their opposition. The next incident was the confiscation by him as Treasurer-General, under orders from the Persian Government, of estates of Shua-es-Sultaneh, the brother of the ex-Shah. The Persian Government, having notified the Russian and British Legations that it intended to issue this order, and no objection having been made and assurances having been given that any and all rights of foreign subjects would be fully respected by Persia, he sent Civil officials with a few Treasury gendarmes to seize the different properties. It was then that the Russian Consul-General Pokhitonoff sent his two Vice-Consuls in full uniform and accompanied by 12 Russian Cossacks, fully armed, to arrest the Treasury officials who were in peaceable possession of the properties, and to conduct them to the Russian Consulate-General, where their lives were threatened and they were treated with the greatest indignity. He communicated to the Russian Legation his intention of resuming possession of the properties the next day, which he did with a force of 100 gendarmes. Mr. Cairns, who was in command of the force, on his way to the house saw M. Pokhitonoff, and again warned him of what was going to be done, after a vain attempt to procure the peaceable withdrawal of the Cossacks. The Russian story that the property was seized while a conference was going on was a pure invention, as was the statement of the two Vice-Consuls that they had been received on the second day with insults from the Persian guards. The Russian Legation, indeed, sent to St. Petersburg reports of an exactly opposite nature.

The Persian Government next protested strongly against the affront put upon them by the Russian Consular Office, and the result was an ultimatum from the Russian Government demanding the immediate withdrawal of the Treasury gendarmes from the properties and an apology to be publicly tendered by the Persian Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Russian Legation. After considerable hesitation, and as a result of advice tendered by the British Foreign Office, the Persian Government complied with this humiliating demand. At the very moment of the apology the Russian Government was formulating another ultimatum, which was presented a few days later, and not only demanded the dismissal of himself as Treasurer-General, the right to veto foreign appointments, future and existing, to the Persian service, and the payment of a considerable indemnity, but added an omnibus clause, under which the Russian Government could claim anything from Persia for past, present, or future actions, and Persia must satisfactorily comply therewith under penalty of being held to have violated the ultimatum. The grounds, he understood, on which his dismissal was demanded were his appointment of a British official to Tabriz and his alleged circulation in Persia of a translation of his letter to the Times—both petty, and both untrue.

He could only say that after a careful review of these four incidents running over a period of several months he believed that one of two conclusions must be reached. Either that the Russian and British Governments, and particularly the former, in respect to the acts of its Consular officials in Persia, must have intended to pursue a policy calculated to destroy all hope of Persia's regeneration and up building through the efforts of the people themselves, or those two Governments must have been continuously and grossly misinformed as to what was happening on the ground. Certainly no other hypothesis could reconcile the stand which they took towards the Constitutional Government of Persia with the actual facts of the case. (Cheers.)

He would say a word in his own defence that he had not thought to say because, after all, it did not make any difference whether he was right or wrong in the discussions in Persia. The particular charge against him personally, and one which might be true, was that he lacked a certain hness in not recognizing that words did not mean what they said and that diplomatic agreements sometimes had a sub-clause not expressed on their face. (Laughter and cheers.) If that were true, he must feel innocent on the ground that the countries who expected him to read into their agreements meanings which did not exist in the words should have informed him of the secret code by which they translated them. (Cheers.) They did not do so. He was in constant touch with both of the Legations and esteemed the Ministers very highly, and from the time he arrived until the time he left he never had an unpleasant word of discussion with them. If he were indiscreet in finally giving publicity to facts which were happening there without the world or the people of the Governments which were doing them knowing it, to that also he pleaded guilty. He consulted the elected representatives of the Persian people upon whether they preferred to be slain in a dark alley or have the crime committed in the public square, and they said they preferred the public square. (Cheers.) He hoped what had been said that evening might foster interest in the future of a country whose people still yearned for an opportunity to become a third-rate Power in the world. Why a little prosperity on their part should be feared by Europe he could not understand. (Cheers.)

The Mejlis refused three different times to accept the Russian ultimatum, and under such circumstances of pressure and danger to themselves, owing to the fact that the arrival of Russian troops was daily expected, that they gave evidence of a true national spirit in Persia. It is easy to allow patriotism to swell in our breasts on occasions of gladsoime celebration when there is no danger involved in matters of thoroughgoing patriotic utterance, but when you have a body of seventy Mahomedans acting under the threat almost of imprisonment and the gallows from a superior force, day by day subjected to these threats and intimidations, and yet refusing to cede their sovereignty—this, I think, will be taken as proof of national spirit. They know in general terms that we believe in the Ten Commandments. In their simple, child-like minds they cannot understand how a people believing in the Ten Commandments could treat them in the way in which they have been treated. They don't understand that international politics have not time for the Ten Commandments. We should be foolish to hope for an immediate change, but we have seen something like a carnival of injustice in the last few years all over the world. It has been an artificial carnival, because it has not been desired or brought about by the peoples concerned. Some of our diplomats seem to suffer from the desire to show how complicated they can make the language of diplomacy. I believe a change is coming, and that soon diplomacy will run as clear as a mountain stream.

He hoped that meeting was the augury of an interest on the part of the great British nation in the weakened, war-cursed country of Persia; and this was something more than a hope, because he believed, however inelastic forms of government might be, that when the knowledge of an injustice was brought home to a great people, no matter what the circumstances or the cost might be, their vote would be given to right it. (Loud cheers.)

The toast of "Persia" was afterwards proposed by Mr Morrell, M.P., and responded to by Professor E. G. Browne.

Mr. Shuster on Persia.

NO FAULT can be found with the tone of the speech which Mr Shuster, the late Treasurer-General to the Government of Persia, made at the Savoy Hotel on Monday night. He spoke with moderation and restraint and with what was clearly a sincere desire to put his case fairly before the public. But, while his address makes his attitude intelligible, we cannot but think that at the same time it explains the circumstances of his dismissal. Mr. Shuster formed his own views as to the condition of Persia and the remedies which it demanded, and he seems to have expected that Great Britain and Russia would assent to the application of these remedies irrespective of their own interests and as a matter of course. That, it need hardly be said, was an expectation which no trained diplomatist or statesman would have formed, and an expectation which was in its nature incapable of fulfilment. When this rather elementary truth was borne in upon Mr. Shuster by the incidents which he describes he came to the remarkable conclusion that either the two Governments have intended to destroy all hope of the regeneration of Persia through the efforts of her people, or that they have been grossly and continuously misinformed. Nothing else, he thinks, could explain their attitude towards the Constitutional Government at Teheran. Mr. Shuster's speech contains, we must suppose, the best evidence which he possesses in support of this view. Can it be maintained with plausibility that the facts on which he relies make out his contention? Do they not rather, upon his own showing, lend colour to the suggestion that he was wanting, not merely in the finesse in which he argued he was not deficient but also, in the broad common sense which enables a good business man to grasp the essential facts of a political situation? First amongst those facts in Persia is the possession by England and Russia of those special interests there which Mr. Shuster recognises that they have. How did he respect these interests? He made up his mind on the situation in two days. He demanded from the Mejliss "arbitrary and drastic control in fiscal matters," and asked them whether they would grant it to a foreigner. They granted it to him in the terms of the law which he himself drew up. It never seems to have crossed his mind until he had gained it that the exercise by him of "arbitrary and drastic control" of finance might possibly prove inconvenient or undesirable to the Powers with "special interests."

No sooner did he attempt to exercise this control than the inevitable consequences followed. We do not need to contend that in the series of incidents that sprang up Mr. Shuster was always in the wrong, and that the two Governments and their local representatives of all kinds were invariably and entirely in the right. On the contrary, it seems to us evident that both the British and the Russian Governments showed want of judgment and indecision on more than one occasion during Mr. Shuster's term of office. (This was particularly the case as regards the appointment of Major Stokes, to which the Foreign Office seems at first to have agreed, but which they afterwards rightly refused to sanction, in deference to the objections to it which Russia ultimately refused to waive. Nobody, it is quite true, with any eye for political facts, would have dreamt of proposing Major Stokes in the circumstances for this particular post, or of insisting upon the choice, when once Russia had intimated her objections to it. But this consideration does not excuse the British and Russian Governments for the vacillation which they both exhibited. After reading Mr. Shuster's own account of his relations with the Russian officials in Persia, nobody, we fancy, can be much surprised that his dismissal was one of the terms of the second Russian ultimatum. It is absolutely necessary that the Treasurer-General should know how to work harmoniously with both the Powers who have special interests in Persia. It was plain that Mr. Shuster could not, or would not, so work with the Russians. Naturally the Russians insisted that he should go.

Mr. Shuster seems to blame this country for not having quarrelled with Russia in the interests of "Constitutional" Persia. We incline strongly to the belief that more, and not less, co-operation between the two Governments would prove to be the best defence of Persian rights and of Persian progress. We do not for a moment cherish the fond illusion that "the elected representatives of the Persian people," as Mr. Shuster grandiloquently but not very accurately calls the Mejliss, are capable of regenerating Persia by their own efforts within a measurable period. We do not discern any clear signs of constructive ability in their past acts—even in the readiness with which they handed over "arbitrary and drastic" control of the finances to Mr. Shuster on his demand. We do not, however, despair of their future and of Persia's future under wise guidance, and we are satisfied that their best chance of receiving such guidance rests upon the cordial co-operation of London and St. Petersburg. The situation in Persia could not have become so deplorable and so dangerous as it undeniably is had the two Powers been working together in the frank and intimate manner which we believe both peoples to desire. It is incredible that the Stokes case and some, at least, of the other cases which figure in Mr. Shuster's indictment could have taken the course they did take, had both Governments, and the officials in Persia of both Governments, been working in close co-operation, or had they realized the state of public opinion and the effect which incidents of the kind are calculated to exercise upon it. The demonstrations of friendship and of honour with which all classes and all parties in Russia are now welcoming the British delegation seem to show that Russia realises how truly public opinion dominates the policy of this country. No arrangements to which it does not extend a firm and a cordial support can be effectual in the long run, while understandings which it approves are often of more real worth than the most precise of treaties. The Russians have too sure and too fine a political instinct not to discern the advantage of cultivating so potent a political force, and not to see how easily and how profitably this may be done by adapting the conduct of their officials in Persia a little more closely to British ideals of Persian rights and to British interpretations of the Anglo-Russian Agreement.

—The Times

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES"

SIR,—In today's leader you write, "Mr. Shuster formed his own views as to the condition of Persia and the remedies which it demanded, and he seems to have expected that Great Britain and Russia would assent to the application of these remedies irrespective of their own interests." And "It never seems to have crossed his mind that the exercise by him of 'arbitrary and drastic' control of finance might possibly prove inconvenient or undesirable to the Powers with 'special interests'."

Is there anywhere evidence of dissent by Great Britain from those remedies or the slightest suggestion that their application was in any manner or sense inconvenient or undesirable from the British point of view, does not every Britisher who has any knowledge in the matter believe that Mr. Shuster's plans would effectively have promoted the cause of regeneration, peace, and order to the advantage of Persia and Great Britain?

Is there anywhere proof or suggestion that Mr. Shuster's arrangements were in fact detrimental to any legitimate Russian interest? True, Russian officials or Belgian pro-Russian officials raised objections—obviously from ulterior motives; but there is not a shadow of evidence of any interference with Russia's "special interests" as disclosed to Great Britain and specified in the Convention of 1907—12, "for geographical and economic reasons the maintenance of peace and order," and the right to seek "concessions for railways, banks, telegraphs, roads, transport, insurance etc."

I hope I am not entirely "deficient in the broad common sense which enables a good business man to grasp the essential facts of a political situation," but I must confess my utter inability to understand why His Majesty's Government should supinely submit to the sacrifice of Persian and British honour and interests when by the simple process of requiring compliance with a most precise agreement they could have protected all. If the price of friendship is that your friend may dishonour the bond of agreement, would it not be better policy to be a little less friendly, and considerably firmer in insisting upon indisputable rights?

Yours faithfully,

In addition to the Order of Khandan-Ale-Osman, the Sultan has conferred upon King George the Order of Nishan-i-Imtiaz, set in brilliants. The simultaneous bestowal of the two highest decorations is unprecedented.

The Pioneer's London correspondent wires on the 17th:—According to the Daily Chronicle's Constantinople correspondent the Turkish Foreign Minister has been informed that Lord Haldane, Sir Ernest Cassel and German statesmen discussed the Baghdad Railway during Lord Haldane's recent visit to Berlin and that a complete Anglo-German understanding in regard to the extension of the line to the Persian Gulf is expected shortly.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 18th.—A telegram from Cairo received here states that there have been several encounters recently between the Yemen Chiefs, Iman Yahya, whom Turkey recently recognized, and Imanuel Dohiani. The former has been compelled to take refuge in the fortress of Sanaa, the magazine of which has been blown up, the casualties numbering a hundred.

The Aden correspondent of the Times of India, in a message dated 11th February, says:—

"According to advices received from Hodeida the Italian steamer Calabria and three or four other warships are still blockading Hodeida and Al Gabbana and Ras Al Kateeb which are a few miles from that port. The remaining ships of the squadron are cruising in the Red Sea and examining steamers or dhows going to Turkish ports.

"It is announced that the blockade will now be conducted from Hodeida lying in latitude 14 degrees 47 N., longitude 42 degrees 54 E. to Ras Isa, in latitude 15 degrees 13 N., longitude 42 degrees 38 E., and all communication by sea with Hodeida, Ras Al Kateeb, Al Gabbana and the neighbouring Turkish places is now practically interrupted.

"Trade between Turkish ports and Aden is at a standstill and merchants and traders who have trade relations with those parts are suffering."

In view of the telegram received by Aden merchants from Hodeida asking for the despatch of a steamer, the Tuna, belonging to Cowanjee Dinshaw and Brothers, has been chartered by certain European merchants here and was sent to Hodeida on Saturday with the permission of the Italian Consul here. The Tuna took the German Consul and was allowed to enter Hodeida after she was searched by Italian warships. She has now returned here with the German Consul on board but has brought no cargo or passengers.

The steamer Woodcock which left here on Saturday for the Turkish port for Lohia and Moka, with a cargo of flour and other articles, is reported to have been stopped by the Italian warships near Moka, and a quantity of flour and other cereals consigned by Aden merchants to Moka is said to have been seized and taken to the Italian port of Massowa.

Letters state that the Turkish authorities in the Yemen have ordered most of the Turkish troops in upper Yemen, which consists of about 20 battalions, to proceed to the coast. It is also reported that the Italian warships have bombarded Ras Al Kateeb firing over 50 shells, but no losses are reported.

At an informal meeting the Aga Khan made a vigorous appeal for funds for the Red Crescent Society inaugurated by Mr. Abul Ali in London. Rs. 4,500 was wanted, but Rs. 6,000 was subscribed on the spot.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 23rd—Amid wild and unanimous enthusiasm Signor Giolitti yesterday introduced in both Houses of Parliament the Bill ratifying the annexation of Tripoli.

Moslem Feeling.

At a public meeting of Muhammadans held at Madras on the 17th under the auspices of the Madras Presidency Moslem League, the following resolutions were passed:—

Mussalmans of Madras, in public meeting assembled, strongly denounce the intention of the Italian Government to blockade the ports of Jeddah and Yembo in the Red Sea which form the gateways of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina and other sacred places in Arabia, in the free access to which, at all times of the year, the entire Muhammadan population of the world are deeply interested. The threat to blockade these ports has caused considerable alarm to the Muhammadan community, and, if allowed to be carried out, will lead to most deplorable result. This meeting, therefore, once more respectfully urges on the British Government the necessity of using its influence in preventing the creation of such an extremely dangerous situation.

The meeting further resolved that the boycott of all Italian goods and articles of merchandise be continued with greater vigour and thoroughness and approved of the despatch of a medical mission to the seat of war by the London League.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tripoli, January 28.

ON SATURDAY night the Turks made a feint in the direction of Gargaresh and attacked Ain Zara at 7 o'clock on Sunday morning with 3,000 Regulars and Arabs. Fighting was vigorous until 10 A.M., when the Turco-Arab force was driven back.

Rome, January 29.

A message to the Stefani Agency from Tripoli of yesterday's date reports attacks made upon the Italian positions both at Gargaresh and Ain Zara, in the latter of which large forces of the enemy took part to the number of possibly 7,000. The attack on Gargaresh was easily repulsed and was probably only a feint to draw attention from the advance against Ain Zara. This advance was revealed by a chance shot at about 6 o'clock in the morning, and from that hour a furious fire was kept up against the Italian posts until some time after daybreak, when the bulk of the enemy retreated. It is supposed that the enemy suffered a heavy loss, the Italian casualties were two killed and eight wounded.

Rome, January 29.

On the day following the announcement of the arrest and release of the French steamer Tavignano the official Stefani Agency published the following explanation:—

"With regard to the incident of the sequestration of the Tavignano, it is well to remember that the correspondent of several English newspapers, Seppings Wright—a well known Turcophile, who is in the Turkish camp in the Tripolitaine—has related how a large quantity of supplies and ammunition arrives there from abroad by means of steamers which disembark their cargoes with great ease at Sfax, whence their contents are passed on in small sailing boats which disembark them, especially by night, on the coast of Tripoli. The steamer Tavignano, of the Compagnie Mixte, which carries such cargoes to various landing places along the coast, now stops at El Biban (where in fact it was sequestered), while at the beginning of the war it went as far as Suva. This is shown in a correspondence from Tunis published yesterday in the Messaggero, which confirms, as far as the Tavignano is concerned, what another correspondent in Tunis has lately written to the Mattino and the Stampa."

An official communication to the Press which justifies the action of a Government by evidence given in the unsupported statements of newspaper correspondents is in itself rather unusual. It is still more strange when one examines the character of the statements quoted. The Messaggero's correspondent in Tunis did on 24th January send a message to his newspaper which purported to contain fragments of Mr. Seppings Wright's correspondence; but the correspondent took care to head his communication with the following words:—

"A certain mysterious 'veiled lady' has been able to tear from the note-book of the Englishman Seppings Wright—correspondent of several English newspapers, the Globe, Evening Standard, Daily Graphic and others—some pages which I hasten to communicate to you, etc."

It is sufficiently evident that the Messaggero correspondent was anxious not to vouch for the genuine character of the document he furnished to his newspaper. He was quite right; the whole document reads like a rather silly hoax, and it is clear that the "veiled lady" must have practised upon his credulity. It is not necessary to quote it here. It does contain statements about the passage of contraband to the Turkish camp; but for the most part it is made up of reflections on the valour of the Italian troops, the panic caused by them among the Turks, and the usual comments of an Italian journalist—given in a form and in a language which is also curiously like that of the Italian journalist.

It is interesting to know upon what evidence the Stefani official agency bases its statements. Ever since the beginning of the war there have been constant complaints on the part of the Italian

REUTER wires from Nanking on the 15th.—Sun-Yat-Sen and the members of the Republican Cabinet have tendered their resignation to the Republican National Assembly and strongly recommended the election of Yuan-Shi-Kai as the President of the Republic. The election of the new President has been fixed for to-day.

Reuter wires from Wei-Hai-Wei on the 16th.—The bloodshed continues outside the British leased territory. Probably 150

Revolutionaries have been killed. The British are striving to arrange a conference of delegates from the opposing parties. The British police are keeping the British territory peaceful.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 16th.—Yuan-Shi-Kai has been unanimously elected President of the Chinese Republic by the Nanking Republicans.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 19th.—A manifesto announces the adoption of the Western calendar. Yuan-Shi-Kai has notified the Powers of his election as President and requested recognition of the Republic.

China Reuter wires from Shanghai on the 21st.—Tangshaoyi has started for Peking to conduct Yuan-Shi-Kai to Nanking for instalment as president.

Afghanistan.

News has been received from Kabul that the Amir intends increasing the output of his rifle factory there. More workmen are to be engaged.

It is also reported that Afghan purchasing agents are being sent to India to buy mules for military transport service.

The number of Turks now serving in various capacities in the Afghan army is said to be forty. Some of these are commissioned officers but the majority are instructors in drill and musketry. A few have taken up civil employment.

According to reports from Kabul correspondence is now established between Turkish and Afghan Governments. Letters are being sent through Herat and Meshed.

Mr. Gokhale's Bill.

Another meeting of the Mussalmans of Lahore has been held at Habibiya Hall under the presidency of Dr. Sheikh Mahomed Ikbal, Bar-at-Law, Secretary, Mahomedan Educational Conference, Punjab, in support of Mr. Gokhale's Elementary Education Bill. The meeting approved of the general principle of compulsion in elementary education as harmonising with the spirit of Islamic teaching but considered the income limit of Rs. 10 for exemption from fees as too low. The meeting recommended Rs. 25 instead. It was also recommended that in view of the pecuniary requirements of Mussalmans, provision be made for their religious instruction. Urdu should be the sole medium of instruction and the controlling votes should be constituted so as to safeguard Moslem interests.

The Moslem University.

HIS HIGHNESS the Aga Khan is again addressing provincial workers to hasten the realisation of the promised subscriptions to the Moslem University Fund. Over Rs. 26 lakhs has already been paid and about Rs. 11 lakhs still remains unraised. With the realisation of Rs. 9 lakhs more the work of establishing the University will be taken in hand in right earnest. Further subscriptions are expected shortly. His Highness the Nawab of Cambay has contributed Rs. 20,000 to the University Fund.

Nawab Vigar-ul-Mulk writing in the latest issue of the Aligarh Institute Gazette fully approves of the Dacca University scheme which according to him will wholly satisfy the educational demands of Bengal Muhammadans. He is ready to welcome not only a separate Government University for Behar but also more than one Government University in every other province. He does not agree with those who find in the Dacca University a rival of the Aligarh movement. At the end of his article the Honorary Secretary of Aligarh College draws the attention of his Congresswallah co-religionists to the agitation which is being raised against the proposed Dacca University.

French Possessions in India.

REUTER wires from Paris on the 15th.—The Senate has passed the Foreign Estimates. M. Flaudin, member for India, asked the Prime Minister to reassure the French Settlements in India which had been disquieted owing to the recent speech of M. Caillaux concerning a possible exchange of settlements. M. Poincaré replied that there was no question of cession of any French territory.

The Lords on the Announcement.

Lord Curzon, after taking his seat as a British peer, called attention in the House of Lords on the 21st to the changes announced at the Delhi Durbar and moved that the papers be laid on the table in connection therewith. His lordship said that the decision taken with regard to the Government of India was the most important since the Crown had assumed the Government and raised great issues that must profoundly affect our rule in India for all time.

At the outset, he emphasised that the step was taken on the initiative of a Viceroy who had only been in India for a few months and a Secretary of State who had not enjoyed his position for a long period, without any reference to Lord Lansdowne or himself or any other ex-Viceroy whose combined knowledge of India and the responsibility of its Government covered nearly a quarter of a century. The Opposition refrained from raising a note of discord during the King's tour. Lord Curzon here made a warm eulogy of Their Majesties' connection with the tour and declared that nothing he proposed to say would affect in any way his profound recognition of the services His Majesty had rendered in India to India and the Empire, but it would not be right if in India the personal authority of the Sovereign were used to relieve the Ministers of responsibility and shut the mouths of public men. The Opposition's criticisms were directed not at the Sovereign but at the advice of Ministers on which, the King's announcements made it clear, he acted. The gravamen of their charge was that the Ministers had decided on a course involving the uprooting of the traditions of 150 years, the annihilation of a capital and the creation of a new one, the reversal of a great administrative act of their predecessors and the carving out of great provinces in secret, without consultation with those whom the Government usually consulted in India, without any intimation to representative bodies or persons without consultation with public opinion, and behind the back of Parliament. They had invested the procedure with a sacrosanct character by putting it into the King's mouth on an occasion when His Majesty gave as solemn pledge to the representatives of three hundred millions of his people. It was impossible to imagine a procedure more contrary to the established usage of the Constitution or less in accord with our democratic rights. The acceptance of its principle to establish autocracy was the less tolerable because the Ministers were sheltered behind the Sovereign. All previous great changes had been fully debated and sanctioned by Parliament. Lord Curzon quoted as an especial instance the "frenzied hostility of Liberals to giving to the Queen the title of Empress of India." He said the precedent was most dangerous because, established as it had been to serve the interests of one party, it might equally be used in the interests of another's again. If the policy placed in the mouth of the Sovereign were successful, continued Lord Curzon, credit would attach to the Government, if otherwise some blame would be bound to fall on the innocent shoulders of the Sovereign. Lord Curzon then declared "If we had dared to do what you have done you would have made the Heaven sing with your declamation."

His Lordship continued: "The reasons given in your despatch for dethroning Calcutta are vague and valueless." The railway facilities, he said, had overcome the difficulties of the position. He ridiculed the idea that the Council could only do its work properly in a central position, instancing the Congress at Washington in this connection. The presence of two Governments in the same city was not an objection. The friendly relations between them was of the greatest value. He challenged Lord Crewe to produce a single Lieutenant-Governor, past or present, to dispute this. In the simultaneous presence of the Imperial and Local Governments for seven months of the year at Simla, they were leaving the greater part of the anomaly untouched. Every argument with regard to Calcutta applied doubly to Simla.

Another doubtless real reason, said Lord Curzon, was the desire to withdraw the Government of India from its present environment. He was amazed that the Liberal Government should desire to escape from their Bengali friends for whom they had done so much. Lord Curzon did not believe that Calcutta would suffer, except temporarily. He dealt at length with the history of the Partition of Bengal and emphasised the Liberals' repeated declarations of its acceptance as a settled fact. He challenged the production of any evidence to support the Viceroy's assertion that it was responsible for the alleged growing estrangement between Muhammadans and Hindus. Lord Crewe himself in the House of Lords on November and last, had said there was nothing in the general temper and demeanour of the people of India to give rise to anxiety. (Opposition cheers.) That was the day after he had signed the Despatch congratulating the Viceroy on the accuracy and fairness of his statements.

The position of Muhammadans in Eastern Bengal now was one of the saddest features of the situation. It was common knowledge in India that their leading nobleman when decorated at Delhi said, "The ribbon you hang round my neck is a halter with which I am to hang myself."

Lord Crewe asked what authority he had for making the statement, whereupon Lord Curzon replied: "I can give you authority for it. You yielded to a fictitious agitation and bitterly offended Muhammadans and taught them to doubt the word of the British Raj."

Assam, Lord Curzon proceeded, had been treated as a petty pawn. The Province of Behar had been made up of odds and ends of Bengali leavings. He feared that with the removal of the Capital to Delhi, Government might be shut off from the main current of public life and would become more bureaucratic and less in sympathy with public opinion. The time spent in Calcutta in the very surge of the national life was of enormous value to Government. The change, he said, would diminish the prestige of the Government and the efficiency of the administration.

Turning to finance, His Lordship ridiculed the idea that Government buildings at Delhi would be erected within three years. "It won't be done in ten," he said. He instanced the Government offices at Dacca which had been building for six years and were not completed yet. He dealt in detail with the cost of the changes. He said he had consulted many authorities and one of them placed the cost at less than eight millions, the majority of them placed it at ten, and others, including himself, though not less than twelve millions. "You are losing millions of opium revenue. A few months ago the House of Lords was discussing the saving of a few thousand rupees by abolishing certain posts. Now you are almost sending a Commission to discuss the reduction of the Native Army with a view to economy. Money is wanted everywhere for Railways, for Education, for Public Works and Social Reforms. This is the moment you impose this great burden on the Indian tax-payer."

Referring to the picture drawn in paragraph 38 of the Government of India's Despatch of a federation of self-governing, quasi-independent States with the Governor-General-in-Council interfering only in case of misgovernment, Lord Curzon said "Extension and delegation of powers must continue but the policy of separate States contemplated by the Despatch could only lead to disruption and disaster. The Viceroy would then become a puppet and there would spring up different principalities. In the hour of danger, it was not by separate Provinces but by a strong central Government exercising efficient control over all India that trouble would be met. He wished he could have accepted the changes in silence, but those who had served in India had a sense of their duty to that country and to the cause of British rule in India. They would be of little use if on an occasion fraught with such consequences, they did not state fearlessly what they believed to be the truth." Lord Curzon spoke for an hour and three-quarters.

Lord Crewe then rose to reply on behalf of Government. He said it was not likely that any ex-Viceroy would at the start be in favour of the Government's proposals but some of them on closer examination had modified their objections. Lord Curzon's speech, however, the tone of which recalled that of a prosecuting counsel, had not a word in favour of any of the proposals and was full of exaggeration. Lord Crewe desired, first, to deny that the proposals were pressed on the Government of India from England. The whole policy had been worked out step by step between the two Governments as the series of problems were in some degree interdependent though distinct and separate. As regarded the procedure on the occasion of the assumption of the title of Empress by Queen-Victoria that was a different matter as it affected England equally with India.

Lord Crewe continued "Lord Curzon's charge is that though we did not consult Parliament or the official bodies, we ought to have thrown our policy on the table for public discussion. It is true that Lord Curzon foreshadowed the Partition of Bengal at some meetings in Eastern Bengal where the change was likely to be acceptable but what would have been the result of our throwing our scheme on the table? We could foresee what parties would advance. It is one of the merits of our scheme that it does not represent the triumph of any party or creed. Each party would have preferred some of the features removed if the rest were retained. Suppose we had announced beforehand the policy we intended to follow, there would have been a lively, regrettable agitation among the English residents in Calcutta, possibly leading to the application to some English newspapers of the more extreme rigours of the Press Act. There would also have been an agitation among the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal, but the rest of the people would undoubtedly have supported us on the merits of the scheme as a whole." Lord Crewe said: "I do not think that the Opposition would have led to the disappearance of the Viceroy or myself, but it would have led to a deal of ill."

"As regards the charge of unconstitutionality in connection with the personal announcement by His Majesty, I think no distinction is possible between the announcement made on such an occasion with His Majesty's own lips, or made on his behalf by the Viceroy in his presence. Lord Curzon thinks that no announcement ought to be made by or on behalf of His Majesty, which might be capable of causing any difference of opinion in India. That is very near to saying that no announcement should be made at the Durbar at all. The answer to the objection that it was unwise to make the announcement at the Durbar," said his Lordship, "was the general gratification caused throughout India by the fact that this important and solemn announcement was made on the most solemn occasion that had occurred in the recent history of India." Lord Crewe was convinced that there would have been bitter disappointment if the Durbar turned out to be merely an occasion for a spectacle of pageantry, however magnificent, and a feeling that no serious meaning was to be attached to Their Majesties' visit.

"Properly speaking," said Lord Crewe, "there is no capital of India. Calcutta has always been described as the capital but it has been losing its position in that respect gradually for some years. The fact that the Government is conducted for a short period in Calcutta and the rest of the year in Simla is a singular and remarkable arrangement, and it is indisputable that in the minds of many educated Indians the fact that the stay in the hills has become not merely hot weather migration but regular settlement does more to impress the notion that British rule is an alien rule than any other feature of our Government. Lord Crewe continued: The danger of isolation of the Government from the main current of public life is one that ought to be guarded against, though I think that Lord Curzon's fears are somewhat exaggerated. Delhi is not Simla. It is a great emporium and the most important railway junction in India, and in some respects the Indian Government and particularly the Department of Commerce will be in a better position to keep in close touch with Indian opinion.

As regards the planning of New Delhi we shall have expert opinions before any definite step is taken. None of the proposals had more influenced him than the importance of breaking the association of the India Government with the Government of Bengal. He had had official opportunity of watching the work of many systems of Government in British India and he knew of no system anywhere so badly adapted to stand the stress of a difficult period as the relations existing between the Government of India and the Government of Bengal. As regards the cost, the Government of India would see that the work was carried out under the most careful supervision. The estimate did not profess to be exhaustive and he could only hope that it would not be largely exceeded. The arrangement that there was something in the constitution of Bengal which differentiated it from other parts of India might have had force in the old days, but the present arrangement was welcomed by Bengal itself.

With regard to Eastern Bengal, Lord Curzon had laid the colours on too thickly. Lord Crewe said he thought that the best way to convert the balance against Muhammadans anywhere in India was to give them the chance of improving their position in equal terms with their Hindu fellow-subjects. This could be best done by increasing their facilities for education, and it was most gratifying that Muhammadans were becoming alive to the advantages of education. Lord Crewe went on: "Regarding in particular the re-Partition of Bengal, Muhammadans have shown remarkable self-restraint and a great many have refused to join in anything in the nature of an agitation hostile to Government. Their scheme must be considered as a whole. It will not be carried out in a spirit of hurry. Its consideration began more than a year ago and has been the subject of the closest thought and most free discussion. All through, their main question has been whether there were people whose interests and welfare were likely to be compromised." Lord Crewe said he honestly believed that Lord Curzon in thinking that such injuries outweighed any benefits of the change would find himself a member of a small minority in England and of an almost infinitesimal minority in India. He believed that the general reason contained in the despatches would be considered by public opinion in India as conclusively showing that the benefits of the change would be greater than any damage either in substance or sentiment to any class or community. Therefore he said without hesitation that in spite of the powerful and well-directed attacks of Lord Curzon, he remained entirely unrepentant, both concerning the general features of the scheme and the fact that the policy was announced by His Majesty at the Durbar.

After all the opinion of India was really what mattered. He recalled the remarkable message from India after His Majesty had left which was unique and unprecedented in one respect and that it represented the joint action of the Princes and those entitled to speak for the educated opinion of India. It was organised by some of the most powerful and most conservative of Indian Rulers and was authorised by some who were most representative amongst the advanced politicians of India. He did not think it had attracted the attention it should have done in England because it was naturally and properly sent through the Viceroy and was therefore supposed to be of an official character. Lord Crewe continued: "As a matter of fact it had nothing to do with the Viceroy, who was unaware of the intention of its writers until the whole matter was settled." Lord Crewe thought that one was entitled to take the message as expressing the general opinion of all classes in India that His Majesty's announcement was one of the great and most notable features of the Durbar and that the kind of criticism suggested by Lord Curzon and of others

The Week.

China.

A MESSAGE to the Daily Telegraph on the 24th from Peking states that the Federation of Mongol Princes has elected Yuan-Shi-Kai to be President of the Federated Empire.

A message to the Times from Peking states that Yuan-Shi-Kai informed a deputation of Protestant Christians that he was determined to remove all religious disabilities.

Reuter wires from Wei-Hai Wei on the 24th.—Representatives of the new Chinese Government and chief natives of districts outside the British boundary are endeavouring to pacify villagers before the arrival of a thousand Republican troops who are expected shortly. The villagers continue to persecute suspected Republicans.

Quieter conditions in Yunnan are now indicated by the returns of the Commissioner of Customs and of Mr Fraser of the China Inland Mission to Tengyueh. No satisfactory news, however, is available of the actual conditions.

Reuter wires from Washington on the 29th: The Foreign Committee of the House of Representatives has reported favourably upon the resolution congratulating the Chinese people on the assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government. If the resolution passes, it will be tantamount to a recognition of the Republic.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 29th.—The British, American, French, and German bankers will advance five million taels to the Republican authorities to pay the troops. A large loan will be contracted immediately. A Coalition Cabinet is formed.

It is understood in Tokio that Russia and Japan will participate in the loan to China.

Baghdad Railway.

THE Pioneer's London correspondent wires on the 23rd.—The Daily Chronicle's Constantinople correspondent says that the Turkish Foreign Minister is preparing a reply to the British proposals regarding the extension of the Baghdad Railway to Koweit. The agreement will probably be based on a 4 per cent. increase of the Customs and income tax on foreigners.

The special correspondent of the Manchester Guardian at Berlin understands that the German Foreign Office is prepared to concur in the British belief that from a strategic point of view it is desirable that Great Britain should control the final stages of the line.

The Daily Telegraph's correspondent at Kriabuchi says that all surveys and plans as far as Baghdad are completed, and were posted a week ago to Constantinople for sanction.

The Pioneer's London correspondent wires on the 24th.—The Daily Telegraph's Constantinople correspondent contradicts yesterday's statement from Kriabuchi, and says the plans of the Heli-Baghdad section will not be ready for sanction for three or four months.

A telegram from Aleppo states that the laying of the section of the Baghdad railway to the east of Aleppo began yesterday.

Reuter's Agency understands that fresh delay has arisen in connection with the execution of the vast Mesopotamian irrigation scheme devised by Sir William Willcocks. Sir John Jackson, Ltd., are at present carrying out the work which was immediately pressing at the Hendish barrage and the Habbanieh reservoir, and it was the intention of the Turkish Government to put in hand at once contracts involving the expenditure of a further £1,000,000. This plan was abandoned in favour of the immediate placing of contracts for the whole of the scheme, which amount to about £15,000,000, and tenders were called for covering the complete scheme. The last date for the receipt of tenders was Saturday, 20th January. It is understood that three British contracting firms have submitted tenders, these are Sir John Jackson, Ltd, S. Pearson and Son, Ltd, and Paulings and Co, Ltd. In view of the financial conditions under which the work is to be carried out, each tendering firm is supported by a banking firm. There has been some talk of German competition for the contract, but it is not believed that any German tender has been submitted.

Moslem Deputation to Japan

A MEETING of Lahore Muhammadans was held on the 26th under the presidency of Mr Fazal Hussain, M.A., Bar-at-Law, at which it was resolved to send a strong deputation of Punjab Moslems to Japan headed by Dr. Iqbal, M.A., Ph.D., Bar-at-Law, some time Professor of Philosophy in the Government College, Lahore, with a view to remain there two months to study the situation and to collect Rs 2 lakhs within one year for the local Anjuman-i-Himayat-i-Islam.

Female Education.

MR. JUSTICE KARAMAT HUSSAIN of the Allahabad High Court, a great advocate of female education in India, has made an endowment of one lakh and eighty thousand rupees towards the cause of female education. The fund is to be called after his name, "Karamat Fund."

THE Times publishes an appeal on the 26th signed by four Indian ladies, on behalf of the Indian Women's Education Association, for funds to endow scholarships for the training of Indian women teachers in England.

Crete.

Crete, Feb. 27.

THE Powers have presented a Note stating that they are determined to maintain the status quo and to take what measures they deem necessary if the Cretans persist in sending deputies to the Greek Chamber, dismissing Mussalman employees, and continuing the ill treatment of Muhammadans.

The Note concludes that if the Cretans cannot govern themselves without endangering European peace, the Powers will take action which will not be in conformity with the wishes of the Cretans. Reuter wires from Paris that the Protecting Powers have decided to strengthen the naval forces at Crete.

Khartum Railway.

LORD KITCHENER on the 27th opened the extension of the Khartum Railway, from Khartum to El Obeid, in the presence of Sheikh and chief personages. There was a vast gathering.

In the House of Commons on the 27th Mr. Harcourt announced that Portugal had agreed to the Beira-Nyasaland Railway.

Anecdote.

DR. WHATELY, when the learned Primate was Archbishop of Dublin, met a young aide-de camp at a dinner when the latter propounded this singular conundrum—

"Does your Grace know the difference between an archbishop and an ass?"

"Sir, I do not," answered Dr. Whately.

"One wears the cross on his mitre, and the other wears it on his back," explained the placid officer.

"Do you know the difference between an aide-de camp and an ass?" asked the Archbishop, calmly, in return.

"No, your Grace, I do not," was the reply.

"Neither do I," said his Grace.

THE LATE Sir Lewis Morris, author of "The Epic of Hades," was once complaining bitterly to Oscar Wilde of the attitude of the Press in the matter of his claims to the poet laureateship. "It is all a complete conspiracy of silence against me," he declared—"a conspiracy of silence! What ought I to do?"

"Join it!" replied Wilde.

TETE À TETE

It is with feelings of profound sorrow and grief that the news of the untimely death of Maulvi Mohamed Aziz Mirza Sahib, Honorary Secretary of the All-India Moslem League, has been received throughout the country. The Moslem community has suffered the loss of a zealous and steady worker who had just begun his active public career, who had inspired such high hopes, whose life was, indeed, beginning to be closely bound up with the most important and organised efforts for the direction of communal affairs. The abrupt ending of a career so young—it was only since 1909 that he had entered the ranks of voluntary and earnest workers in the public cause—and withal so useful and so rich in promise, has very considerably impoverished Moslem public life. No one was prepared for his passing away so suddenly and so soon, and the news of the tragic event has everywhere caused a profound shock. Human life is made of such fragile stuff. It is almost a profanity to sermonise about what one is so powerless to control. Everyone of us has his vision and his hope. The life stretches as a vast, limitless opportunity before us. We toil with a stout heart and in the light of the faith that is in us that we may realise on earth however imperfectly, the beautiful heaven of our dreams. But anon, it may be in the very height of success the light fails, the body is flooded with chaos and the life that willed and toiled and created with such ease and power, in an instant ceases to be. Maulvi Mohamed Aziz Mirza Sahib was one of the oldest and most brilliant alumni of the Aligarh College. Immediately after taking his degree he had entered the Nizam's service in Hyderabad. By sheer industry and capacity he rose to be the Home Secretary and was sure to reach the highest offices in the State, if he had not had to retire under circumstances that so largely govern the destinies of people in Native States. His retirement, however, had proved a distinct gain to the Mussalman community. He was soon after elected to the responsible position of the Honorary Secretary of the All-India Moslem League, the duties of which he discharged with conspicuous ability, zeal and devotion to the end of his life. His little tracts in Urdu on Indian politics for the instruction of the man in the street have proved to be the most valuable contributions to the political literature of the times. He was a Trustee of the Aligarh College and a Syndic in charge of secular learning, and had always taken a keen and active interest in the affairs of the institution. Indeed, he was one of the few trustees who are alive to the tremendous responsibility of their trust. In view of his ability, earnestness and high sense of duty it is not at all improbable that he would have risen soon to be the Honorary Secretary of the Trustees had he been spared by the cruel hand of death. To the Aligarh College, to the Moslem League and the Moslem community his loss has been great indeed, and it would be difficult to fill the gap he has left behind. We offer our deep and heartfelt condolence to the bereaved family.

THE Hon'ble Mr. Justice Karamat Husain of the Allahabad High Court has created an endowment of Rs. 1,80,000 for the education of Moslem girls.

The Karamat Fund. The creation of this magnificent trust for such a useful and beneficent purpose will keep the name of the illustrious donor alive as a great benefactor of his community. It has now always become a fashion to talk of education as the only panacea for the ills of the Mussalmans. Fashionable opinions, however, are generally lip-deep in most cases; and though even the wisest dullard amongst the wisacres of the community will begin to grate on the least provocation about the advantages of a widespread communal enlightenment, it is not a little disconcerting to see the actual indifference of the leaders who have identifiably failed to do anything practical for the spread of popular education. When the education of Moslem boys is as yet in a disorganised condition and subject to thousand and one freaks of opinion and random accidents, the education of Moslem girls can scarcely be said to exist in any modest sense of the term. It is, therefore, all the more creditable to the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Karamat Husain, that he should have exercised a wise discrimination in his choice and applied his liberality to an object that deserved and needed it most. His interest in female education is well known. He has hitherto supervised with great care a Normal School at Allahabad for the training of Ustans. The school has been doing a useful work in its own way. The generous endowment that he has now made in the cause of female education will earn for him the undying gratitude of the community. We do not know at present how and under what conditions the trust will work, nor can we state what definite scheme it has been set apart to promote. Until we know something definite and in detail about the objects that the donor has in view, we cannot offer any useful opinion or suggestion. We trust however, that the splendid gift will be turned into a source of abiding benefit to female education and will be most usefully applied.

IN THE SITTING of the Imperial Legislative Council, held on the 27th February, the Hon Mr Gokhale moved that District Councils.

"this Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that steps should now be taken to bring district administration into closer touch with the people by creating, as far as possible, in every district in the different Provinces a District Council composed of not more than nine members, partly elected and partly nominated, whose functions should be merely advisory to begin with, and whom the Collector should ordinarily be bound to consult in all important matters." In the speech that he made in recommending this Resolution to the acceptance of the Council, Mr. Gokhale based his plea on the desirability of directly associating educated Indians with the administration of the districts. This was, so to speak, the burden of his theme. According to him "it was not sufficient that the administration should be carried on efficiently and honestly by the officials themselves. If the educated class was kept out of the administration they would criticise the administration. The limits of fair criticism were soon reached and then would come ill-informed and denunciatory criticism which would cause a gulf between the two classes. In the interest of administration it was necessary to admit the educated class to the responsibility of administration and give it an interest in the administration. If this was done a good deal of the poison that gathered in districts would be got rid of. The time had now come for making a beginning of this kind in this matter." On the face of it, the principle enunciated in this passage is so self-evident that there can hardly be room for difference. District administrations would enormously gain in popularity and effectiveness if they are in direct sympathy with enlightened opinion of the district and conducted in the full light of public criticism. Let us, however, just consider the nature of district administration in India. The officer in charge of a district is a magistrate, a revenue and police officer and many more things besides. He has all the threads of administrative and executive power in his hands. He cannot, however, as a rule initiate a policy. His function is simply to maintain public tranquillity, administer the law, and execute the orders of the Government. But his authority is so great and his powers so comprehensive that he can to a very large extent affect, for good or evil, the lives and wellbeing of the people under his charge. The overwhelming majority of the district officers being Englishmen, it is all the more necessary to devise some means to keep them in touch with public opinion and fully informed about the needs of the people. Will Mr Gokhale's device achieve this end? It sounds very plausible, but we are afraid it is rather cumbersome and could easily lend itself to abuse and misconception. An Advisory Council fastened on a district officer would in some cases hamper work instead of expediting it, while in most cases at present it would degenerate into a mere subservient body registering the decrees of the district autocrat. We will not be surprised if such councils opened new and strange ways to favouritism, flattery, and even scheming and manipulation for selfish ends or party aggrandisement. The best remedy for bringing district administration nearer to the people is to throw open the close preserves of the Englishmen to educated Indians and admit them more freely into the Civil Service of the country. The root of the problem, however, will not be touched until the system of district administration undergoes a change. The true and only remedy lies in separating the executive from the judicial function and thus reducing the chances of abuse of power or the dangers of indifference, incompetence or neglect to a minimum. It is, therefore, for reform in this direction that the efforts of our Legislative Councillors should be directed. We need hardly say that we have little sympathy or respect for the officials who oppose all administrative reforms with the notorious cant about the interests of "the people." This class of officials always tries to set up a sort of antagonism between the interests of "the people" and those of the educated Indians. No fallacy could be more idle and mischievous. The educated classes are the articulate and thinking portion of the community, who formulate the needs of the people as a whole. If the masses were to be educated they, too, would think as the educated classes; and, after all, the hopes and aspirations of educated Indians about the future of their people and their country indicate the only true and certain lines along which the social, moral and political advance of the teeming millions of India will be effected.

It was only a fortnight ago that the late Mr. Aziz Mirza addressed to the Home Secretary to the Government of India a letter on the subject of Italy's blockade and bombardment of Arabian ports in the Red Sea and her proclaimed intention of extending the operations to Jeddah and Yembo after the pilgrimage season came to an end. A pathetic interest attaches to this communication, as this was perhaps the last which he addressed to Government, and a protest against an intended sacrilege was a fitting termination to the life of a pious Moslem in whom Western education had, if anything, confirmed Oriental piety. In this letter Mr Aziz Mirza brought to the notice of the Government "the feelings of alarm and resentment entertained by the Moslems of India," and explained that "Moslem apprehensions regarding the blockade are not merely sentimental but substantial as well," referring therein to the trade interests of Indians who maintain a brisk traffic with Jeddah and Yemen ports. But he had added, "The loss to trade is merely one aspect of the question. The veneration in which Mecca and Medina are held by Moslems all over the world cannot be exaggerated and communication between the two places and the rest of the Islamic world does not cease with the end of the pilgrimage season. If Italy were to succeed in an effective blockade of the ports leading to these places and thus prevent all communication with other countries, the resentment caused among Moslems would be very great." It is needless to say that we agree with every word of it. But we rather wish that the Council of the League had not brought it to the notice of the Government with a view to prove that "the course of harassing Turkey which Italy has adopted is fraught with grave danger, as it will be regarded as a violation of their Holy Land by Moslem communities of the East and will produce among them a commotion which has never been seen before." This wish on our part may at first sight appear strange, as we have ourselves taken some pains to reflect Moslem opinion on the various aspects of Italy's action. But we have strong reasons for not desiring that further communication of this character should be addressed to Government. We are convinced that Government know full well what the Mussalmans have felt during the last five months, and what they must feel about a blockade of Jeddah and Yembo and even more provoking conduct on the part of Italians. But assuming that they did not know such obvious things, it is doubtful that the League's letter would have materially added to their knowledge. The object of the League in sending this letter was to "respectfully request the British Government to persuade Italy to desist from wantonly wounding the feelings of His Majesty's Moslem subjects... and confine their operations to other ports." But this is what the Mussalmans should not ask for at present. There was a time when intervention would have been useful and would have appeared altruistic and humane. Even the proverbially short lived memories of diplomats cannot have forgotten the repeated Turkish appeals for intervention when Italy had gone no further than arranging a naval promenade and could not therefore have been said to have committed herself irrevocably to the task of conquest and annexation. The Turks were snubbed by every Chancellery in Europe and were plainly told that it was their own business to defend themselves and their empire and that they should cease praying for mediation. They accepted the plain and broad hint in a chastened spirit and set about to defend the honour and integrity of their dominions as best they could. Meanwhile the naval and military promenade had to grow into a heavily equipped expedition, and the Italian army had to fight for every foothold and instead of marching ahead to realise its vision of conquest and military glory, speedily entrenched itself on the coastline of the Tripolitaine under the protection of the fleet. The romance wore off the shabby adventure, the heroics of the Press sank into mere calculating garrulity; the weak and vain government, intoxicated with the dream of empire, woke to its perilous condition at the first shock of reality, and thenceforward began to systematically work to bring about European intervention, for therein alone lay its safety. The Italian fleet began to run amock amidst neutral shipping and to indulge in random destruction along the Arabian and Syrian coasts.

To day when the Turks have confined the 125,000 Italians in Tripoli like rats caught in a trap, and when Italy, in spite of her boasts about excellent financial condition, is forced to ask for a loan even before Turkey, and to take to the bombardment of places like Beirut which cannot by one jot alter the situation in North Africa, it is Italy and not Turkey that stands to gain by intervention and it is solely in order to force the Powers to mediate in their own interests that she proclaims by beat of drum her evil intentions which are likely to create unparalleled commotion in neutral countries. Moslem excitement and Moslem appeals of intervention mean playing into the hands of this despicable and cowardly Power. The proper course for the Mussalmans of India to follow at this juncture is to curb their feelings, to cause no anxiety to their rulers and to give no handle to Italy for working up the Powers. This is exactly what Nawab Vihar-ul-Mulk—who, by the way, is fearfully badly served by those who wire inaccurate and ambiguous summaries of his advice to Mussalmans—has counselled them to do. Of all European Powers, France favoured Italy's raid the most, for it tended to break up the Triple Alliance and made Italy of no use to Germany in the Mediterranean in case of a conflict with the entente Powers. But Italy's maladroit interference with French shipping on the coast of Tunis has now taught that there is no honour among thieves and has converted a friendly neutral to something even less useful than a neutral friend. France is therefore ready to intervene, if only some other Power would show her willingness to share the task with her. An Austrian journal had recently put forward the suggestion that "Turkey should make the best of a bad job, recognise Italian sovereignty in Tripoli, and accept what compensation in cash might be offered." That suggestion was said to emanate from Russia and to be approved by the Powers who were ready to intervene, though as a contemporary pointed out, "it was very clear it was only a kite flown at Italy's instigation." Only recently the Italian Chamber was convoked to ratify the annexation of Tripoli. This was indeed a counsel of despair. It looks as if a nervous and demoralised government wanted to restore self respect and courage to itself by shouting till worlds in the hearing of the world. Immediately after the Gibraltar ratification of the Royal decree the talk of mediation springs into life in Paris and St. Petersburg. We do not know how far it is spontaneous and based on a genuine desire for peace. To us it looks suspicious and appears to be the result of some concert rapidly coming into existence in order to drag Turkey into surrendering what Italy has not been able to wrest from her by force. Nor do we like the looks of Man o' War going to Creta with Scaled orders, even though it be to avenge unpunished murders of unprotected Mussalmans in Creta. We hope common decency, if not common equity, will keep the Powers from pressing on Turkey their advice for peace on the basis of Italian sovereignty in Tripoli. We have no patience for political charlatans like Dr. Dillon, who never tire of telling the world that Italy cannot go back on her declaration without losing her self respect. Should Turkey then lose both her self respect and her territory in order to save Italy the humiliation of defeat? What right have the Powers to mediate on a basis which is admittedly unjust and iniquitous? Let Italy establish her claims on Tripoli by force if she can. The method of arbitration was chosen by herself, and if she is unequal to the task she so lightly and wantonly undertook, let her go back and leave the field. This is the only basis for peace negotiations. Only the logic of the stricken field should tell in the settlement. The coercion of Turkey by the Powers in order to help Italy will be resented by the Mussalmans throughout the world. But a request from the Mussalmans of India would be Sir Edward Grey's opportunity. If a Gladstone could intervene in a war forced upon Turkey by Greece by making the victor give up the fruits of victory so that "not an inch of Christian soil" should go to the Moslems, a Grey could outlive him only by allowing the fruit of victory to go to the vanquished and ceding thousands of miles of Moslem land to a Power at least nominally Christian. Surely this is not what the Mussalmans of India desire. Let them suppress their anxieties, trust things to Allah, and let us upon Sir Edward the practice of that doubtful virtue, Consistency.

COMMENTING on the article of Nawab Vihar-ul-Mulk that recently appeared in the Aligarh Institute Gazette on the subject of Italian invasion of the Holy Places, the Tribune in the course of an editorial note says:—"To give the Muhammadan masses in this country an idea that there is danger of the holy places of Islam being desecrated is to give an opportunity for the rousing of the worst passions of a fanatical population. A gentleman of the intelligence and education of Nawab Vihar-ul-Mulk must know that the action that he says Italy has under contemplation is impossible. A bombardment from aeroplanes is not feasible. They can only help in locating cities or people who cannot be easily approached by a journey by hand. We have repeatedly made it clear in these columns that the act of aggression committed by Italy in Tripoli has nothing whatever to do with religion. In fact to describe the Turco-Italian hostilities as war between Islam and Christianity is opposed to the truth. It is, moreover, calculated to excite ignorant people in favour of a Jihad. In our opinion it is doing the British Government great disservice. Comment would seem to be superfluous. But we would like to ask the gentlemen who have developed fearfully non-conformist consciences, how they relish the journalistic charity practised by papers like the Tribune.

The forces of democracy in the land of the Celestials have at last succeeded in dethroning the Manchus from political power, in making short work of an institution of immemorial sanctity, and in planting a full-blown republic on the ruins of an antique system of government. The revolution, the full reach and import of which we are yet too near the event to grasp in its entirety, was as much the work of resolute and selfless patriots driving with consummate courage and skill irresistible popular forces, as it was due to the ferbleness, decadence, and corruption of the constituted authority. The Republic of China would initiate an experiment, the first of its kind in the East, the results of which would be watched with profound interest. The pseudo-scientists of Europe, who have evolved theories of political science on the basis of colour, and regard autocracy to be the only form of government suitable for brown, black, or yellow humanity, have of late been shedding fast some of their fondest illusions. The growth of democratic movements in the East is a fact too big to be hidden away under a philosophic pose or a sceptical sneer. Nor can it be explained away on the convenient but most insufficient ground of the meteoric rise of Japan and its influence on the rulers of the East. The conventional experts of Eastern affairs are fond of tracing to this single cause almost everything of note and importance that has happened in Asia. No doubt the sudden rise of Japan into a world Power has influenced opinion in China, but there were still older, wider and deeper influences at work which were gradually restoring mobility to social organs and preparing the people for a bold readjustment of motive, purpose and endeavour. We sincerely hope the ancient and gifted race that has just assumed new and very grave responsibilities will go through the untried regions of self government with all the wisdom, prudence and moderation that are its characteristic virtues in the field of industry. The resources of China are immense, and if her statesmen are men of steady faith and purpose and are allowed to work out their destiny without foreign interference, the development of the Republic will be as rapid as it would be marvellous.

As a sample of journalistic dignity we quote the following from the Leader of Allahabad:—"Just a piece of amusing news. The Maharaja Bahadur of Durbhunga has been pleased to stop the Leader as we did not extend unqualified support to his appointment as a member of the coming Bihar Executive Council. We humbly pray to God that it may live yet." We trust journalistic dignity will survive this.

FOR reasons which it would take too long to explain we have been compelled to go to press without our hedonistic adjunct, Gup, which we have reason to believe provides amusement for the average reader and instruction for the wise. We are extremely sorry that both the wise and the otherwise would be disappointed. But we promise those who ate this week starving for mirth and instruction that next week they will probably suffer from an indigestion of both. We promise plenty of good cheer and pray for equally good appetites.

The Special Marriage Bill.

It was a foregone conclusion that the Special Marriage Bill of the Hon. Mr. Basu would not become law at the present time and that conclusion has been justified by results. But we are not quite sure if the Government were well advised in not allowing the Bill to go to a Select Committee of the Council. It is true that considerable time would have been taken up by the Committee and that Hon. Members have little leisure at present for academic discussions on a branch of Social Reform. But in view of the interest excited by the Bill throughout the country the expenditure of a couple of dozen hours at suitable intervals by less than a dozen members, including five non-officials to investigate and ascertain on what points agreement was possible between Hindus of the divergent views, of the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and the Hon. the Law Member and the Hon. Mr. Gokhale or between the Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock and the Hindu Members, would have been amply justified. If the Government could not agree to the passage of the Bill into Law, the Bill could easily have been thrown out after a Select Committee so composed had reported.

However, the Government did not choose to allot so much time to a Bill that had not the remotest chance of becoming a law, and it is not difficult to understand the motive that led the Government to reject the Bill at this comparatively early stage in a crowded Session. All that now remains for us to consider is the debate that took place. Frankly, the discussion disappointed us, and considering that the greatest responsibility in the case of a Private Bill is that of the framer, the Hon. Mr. Basu did not acquit himself as well as his undoubted talents and industry had led us to expect. He appeared both learned and industrious, and it goes without saying that he was both vigorous and eloquent. But he was verbose and unmethodical, and rhetoric supplied the place of relevancy. He was obviously in earnest, though we may add that perhaps no class of people in India are so prone to self-deception as the people of Bengal, and eloquence which could not cloud the reasoning faculty of an intelligent audience of average non-Bengalis is apt to sweep away the doubts of the speakers themselves. Mr. Basu has the merit of clear convictions, and although we do not assign the same value to his reforming measure that we do to the abolition of suttee or the raising of the age of consent, Mr. Basu's advocacy left no doubt in the minds of his audience that he regarded himself as the pioneer of a great and historical movement worthy to rank with the greatest social reform movements of the past. This made him a little stilted in his diction and pompous in his delivery. And while we do not wish to suggest that he should have cut and clipped his words in order to please his opponents and made them ineffective for those who sat on the fence, we are inclined to think that his tirades against the arch-monopolists of history, the Brahmans of India, were not calculated to persuade his Brahmin colleagues, and his sarcasm was only too of ten too personal to be in the best of tastes. It is true that he had reserved his choicest innuendoes for his personal friends, but if he retains their friendship even after this debate the credit would not be his, but entirely of his friends.

The "Statement of Objects and Reasons" showed that the Bill was intended in the first place to remove a declaration which had been felt to be "an unnecessary condition by the community for whose benefit the Act was specially intended," and in the next place to make the Act available for "those members of the Hindu community who desire to introduce inter-marriage between different sub-sections of the same caste or between members of the same caste inhabiting different provinces of India." Finally, it was stated that the necessity of such a law was "greatly felt by those who do not desire to break away from Hinduism and at the same time seek to adapt their life to the growing needs of the time." Now, the first object is of too restricted a scope and too unimportant a nature to justify much eloquence. The second is certainly more important, and although in its application it is communal or sectarian, anything calculated to pull down the intolerably large number of barriers that disintegrate Hindu society must be considered a measure likely to prove beneficial to a very large portion of mankind. The third object leaves us more confused than convinced, for it seems to add to the existing complexities of Hinduism yet another and to create a sort of caste of those who would like to remain in the fold, and yet snap their fingers at the rules that are binding on the flock. Not one of these three objects possesses the large humanity of the movement against suttee, and the beneficence of that which favoured a rise of the age of consent. If this was all, the Hon. Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu was nothing but a poseur who mouthed pretentious sentiments and strutted his hour upon the legislative stage. But this is not so. Mr. Basu aimed not only at the removal of the barriers of sub-castes and provincialism that divided the primary castes of the Hindus, but the destruction of all castes and the demolition of every wall that divided one creed from another in the matter of matrimony. His was an ambitious and a noble project and one nothing short of the unification of Indian society and the nationalization of its citizens. But if we must admire the boldness of the enterprise and the excellence of the motives, we must emphasise the fact that Mr. Basu has been guilty of trying to convert people under false pretences. He brought in a measure embracing three hundred and fifteen million people of innumerable castes, creeds, and races in its intended beneficence, and he pretended for nearly a year that he would only remove a superfluous declaration unpalatable to a handful of two sections of the Brahmins, permit a perhaps smaller number of others to enjoy the luxury of an appellation without having to accept the liabilities attached to the label, and as a final exhausting effort pull down a few newly-put up mud walls that separate members of one and the same caste. These may or may not be good tactics, but they do not give evidence of those ethical considerations which one expects from a social reformer who desires to rank with men of the rank of the great Raja Ram Mohan Roy and the eminent Vidyasagar. Mr. Basu confesses that his protestant zeal not so very long ago had resulted in "corporal chastisement which he was afraid he had not yet forgotten." We shall not be so uncharitable as to conclude that it was a good memory that suggested bad ethics, but it is open to one to argue that the absence of similar opposition to the latest measure of social reform was due to its sailing under false colours.

However, it is not our intention to argue in that way, for we had ourselves devoted considerable space to an analysis of the Bill in several issues in May, June, and July, and took care to point out that the Bill was not quite as innocent as the "Statement of Objects and Reasons" tried to make it. We shall not go over the same ground again, for excepting the aspect which made the Bill obnoxious to the orthodox Hindus, our examination of the Bill was both minute and exhaustive. Mr. Basu and his supporters in the Council failed to adduce a single argument in support of the Bill which had not been put forward at the time by his supporters outside the Council, and in this instance, at least, those who are not in the charmed circle of the Supreme Legislature appear to be if anything, abler than those who are.

But this seems to be true of orthodoxy as much as of heterodoxy, and we were surprised to find the Hon. Mr. Subbarao altogether silent, and the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya feeble in defence of the existing order of things than his assertive orthodoxy had led us to expect him to be. We cannot say whether history bears out the Hon. Mr. Malaviya's theory that intercaste marriages were given up only on account of the friction and discord which resulted from a gradation of wives from different castes. At any rate, if castes were higher and lower, and no fluidity permitting motion from one caste into another existed even in the remotest Vedic period, then expressions such as "my brother, the sweeper," which presented an alluring aspect of Orthodoxy, degenerate into unconvincing rhetoric. There is, however, considerable strength in the argument that as custom has been allowed to override Hindu Law, there is nothing to prevent a custom in favour of inter-caste and inter-creed marriages growing up in course of time. But it seems that the "enlightened minority" which does not desire "to break away from Hinduism" and at the same time seeks to adapt its life to "the growing needs of the time" is not prepared to wait so long or to suffer for the sake of an over-developed "conscience." A modern Perseus is too law-abiding a person to take the law into his own hands by cutting off the Chains of Andromeda and ridding her of the monster. Modern Chivalry would suggest to the maiden in distress a formal complaint at the nearest police station. Similarly modern "consciences" seek relief not in "marring in opinion" but by fighting the good fight in a Council Chamber. If there is any value in precedents, we cannot predict success to the would-be reformers if they continue to quarrel with the Government for following the line of least resistance while carefully avoiding all risks themselves. At present the status quo of the existing order of things is against the reformers, and a final victory against caste cannot be had so cheaply. Whether Hinduism can survive the reform is not for us to say. By no known rule can we judge what is Hinduism and what is not, and one of Mr. Basu's most persistent supporters confessed that "a more thankless task could not be conceived." The task appears to us to be not only thankless but also hopeless, and the symposium of eminent Hindus consulted by the Leader bears ample testimony to this apprehension. Mr. Srinivas Iyenger, who welcomed Mr. Basu's Bill in the Madras Provincial Conference, speaking of Hinduism said —

There were no definite articles of Hinduism absolutely fixed. The term Hindu itself was a modern term of usage. It was merely a convenient description of the congeries of faiths which inhabited the continent, but which could not be classified under any other well-known religion. What was Hinduism? It embraced every variety of faith and unfaith, all kinds of discordant views and antagonistic practices, monistic and dualistic philosophy, faith that was purely intellectual and faiths that were dogmatic and devotional, faiths that were cruel and obscene and faiths that were humane and noble.

If that is a true conception of Hinduism, we do not see why inter-caste and inter-creed marriages cannot take place. Where there is no orthodoxy there can be no heterodoxy. But in that case all that the reformers need is to convince the Courts that this is the true conception of Hinduism, and if the Law Courts could take so latitudinarian a view of Hinduism, no fresh legislation would seem to be necessary. But they could not accept so indefinite a definition and measure the legality of facts by so uncertain a standard, and the obvious remedy is the creation of custom rather than legislation. The latter must come in only when there is "an outrage on the fundamental law of humanity" or when an "overwhelming majority" of those who profess a particular faith demanded it. These are the touchstones which the Home Member announced as the criteria of necessary legislative intervention and we think they satisfy the justice of the case. It is clear that the first is wholly inapplicable to the present demand, and, as for the second, it should appeal more strongly to a community which relies so much on its numerical strength.

If the Hindu supporters of the Hon. Mr. Basu's Bill could not much justify legislation for the purpose, his Mussalman advocates could do it still less. Beyond insisting on the irrelevant instances of Moghul Kings and Princes marrying Rajput Princesses and unconsciously misrepresenting the views of the Right Honourable Mr. Ameer Ali, the Hon. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque could do nothing. The Hon. Mr. Jinnah spoke little, but he spoke to the point. If Islamic law is defective it must be corrected by the Legislature, and if the Lex Loci Act could recognise the claim of the renegade to succeed to the property of a true believer, why not those of the issue of a marriage under the proposed Act? What she failed to add is that while the details of Islamic law are for the most part determined by jurists from whom no one can differ, no Mussalman can claim to alter a word of the Quran in which any particular rule of Moslem Law may be based. Man's work can be and must be corrected by man, but

مہ گنتار معقوی است قرآنے کہ من دارم

(The Quran that I have is all the word of the Beloved) and the seal of finality is set on it.

الْيَوْمَ اكْمَلْتُ لَكُمْ دِينَكُمْ وَاتَّخَذْتُ عَلَيْكُمْ بَعْثِي ۝

(To-day I have completed for you your faith, and finished my blessing on you.) We cannot conceive that Mr. Jinnah does not know this, or, knowing it, regrets it and yet calls himself a Moslem. It is not for us to issue orders of excommunication, and we would rather have the realisation of that divine assistance and victory which is evidenced by the entrance of whole armies into the faith of Allah than the excommunication of a single person whom calls him a Moslem. But any Mussalman who encourages or even looks complacently upon the "reforms" of another Moslem which set out to "correct the errors" of the Quran in accordance with "the growing needs of the times" helps to create the same indifference which has given to Hinduism, according to some Hindus themselves, its comprehensive indefiniteness. That may be Hinduism, but it is not Islam, and while we are glad that the Hon. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque took care to dissociate himself from such "reforming zeal," we regret that Mr. Jinnah ventured so far into perilous seas.

To us the strength of the Moslem case appears to lie in this. The Mussalmans are members of a certain society which has laid down certain rules for the conduct of its members. If they choose to follow them they are entitled to certain benefits. If they do not choose to do so, nobody restricts their freedom of conscience or of action, but they cannot claim benefits which are directly dependent on the observance of those rules. Some of those rules relate to marriage and an observance of them gives to the issue of such unions rights of succession. If a man chooses to disobey them, he is free to do so, but the issue of unions unauthorised by Islamic laws are deprived of the rights of succession to the property of Moslems. Mr. Jinnah, who would not expect to be permitted even to play bridge at his Club if he chose to disobey some of its rules, such as its sumptuary laws or regulations pertaining to dress, still claims that his children should succeed not only to his own property but also to that of his Moslem ascendants and collaterals according to Islamic law in spite of his entering into a union for which the Quran uncompromisingly assigns him to "Tophet." Well, we must say he is less fair to his creed than to his Club and it betrays a regrettable state of affairs. He cited the example of the Lex Loci Act according to which a man who not only breaks the marriage law of Islam but throws Islam itself overboard is entitled to succeed to the property of his Moslem relations. But the Lex Loci Act is in direct contravention of Islamic law which places the brotherhood of religion above blood relationship and deprives the renegade of his rights of succession. The Lex Loci Act may be a good argument against the Hon. the Law Member but it is none against him as a Moslem, and he must be pardoned if he does not agree to rob his co-religionists of some of their rights because one of his predecessors robbed them of some others. What astonishes us is the fact that the abettor of this robbery should be a Moslem and the representative of a purely Moslem constituency. It is true that the section of Mussalmans to which he belonged does not follow the Islamic law of succession. But there is no want of equity in this because it is a self-sufficient section and it confines its peculiar rules of succession to the circle within which its members intermarry. Had they married outside that section they could not have kept their own rules of succession intact.

The Hon. Mr. Jinnah's speech and the criticism of the Hon. Mr. Shamsul Huda bring us to the question of the latitude to be permitted to representatives. The Hon. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque in defending his "advanced" colleague a little too warmly, claimed absolute freedom of opinion for all representatives and the Hon. Mr. Basu was ready to quote chapter and verse from Burke's speech before the electors of Bristol. But in the first place Burke is not followed even in the United States whose action in revolting against taxation without representation he defended, and, in the second place, the honourable gentlemen's constituents are not experts in such searching cross-examination of their would-be representatives as they are of the witnesses on the other side. Had there been the same questioning and the same heckling, not to mention orange peels and seasoned eggs, we could have found it in our heart to give them as much freedom as Burke desired. But if circumstances ever alter cases, the plain sailing of the last elections should have kept the "advance guard" of Moslem India a little closer to the main body of the force. It is sad to find one representative satisfying his own "unrighteousness" — we use the expression in no evil sense — at the expense of others, and to find another claiming for him the full pound of freedom, if not flesh, as a punishment for the credulity of his unsophisticated co-religionists.

The Budget.

It was under happy circumstances that the Hon. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson presented the Financial Statement on the 1st of March. He characterises it as a "No Change" Budget, and if we consider the fact that the last Budget was in every way a prosperous Budget with a very large surplus, we have every reason to be satisfied with the "No Change" that has been announced at the close of the present Financial Year.

The Estimates last year showed a surplus of less than a million, but the Revised Estimates show that it is going to be as large as 2½ millions sterling. As Provincial Surpluses, that is, portions of allocations to Provincial Governments not spent by them in the year, amount to more than £600,000, the total surplus for the year amounts to very nearly 3½ millions sterling. The increased surplus is due to an increase of revenue, nearly half of which is due once more to the opium windfall, but it is satisfactory to note that the greater half of the excess is the result of better returns testifying to general increase in the prosperity and trade of the country. Railways have contributed a net increase of about 1¼ millions sterling, Customs, Mint, Interest, Exchange and Salt contributing the other chief items. If the unfavourable weather conditions had not adversely affected the prosperity of Sindh, Gujarat, Kathiawar, and the small tracts with its centre lying between Delhi and Meerut, and the Estimates under Land Revenue had not been belied seriously by a deficiency amounting to nearly a million, the surplus would have been no less than 4½ millions or little less than what was secured in the preceding year. But Sir Guy has himself characterised financial prophecies of the Budget as a "gamble in rain," and had not the agricultural outlook been entirely altered for the better toward the end of August, there is no knowing what a sad tale he may have had to tell the Council. That "narrow line between plenty and want" to which Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson referred on Friday last makes us receive the diminished surplus with gratitude, if also, in view of what may unfortunately happen in the ensuing year, with chastened jubilation.

Expenditure during the year shows an excess of 1½ millions sterling if Provincial Surpluses and Deficits are included. In reality, however, there has been a saving of nearly a million, including about ¼ million in Provincial Account, the Imperial Savings of over £600,000 being chiefly due to less expenditure on the Royal Visit and in the Opium Department in Bengal. Balancing Expenditure against Revenue, the aggregate improvement on the Estimates of the year amounts to 4¼ millions.

The figures relating to the expenditure on the Royal Visit supply interesting information, and although nobody would grudge an expenditure of less than a crore, including the cost of the new regalia, our own experience of the Press Camp leads us to suspect that the contractors made a good thing out of the people's loyal and enthusiastic desire to receive their popular King and Queen in a manner worthy of the country and its traditions.

Opium on which Sir Guy made a most interesting pronouncement, which has considerable importance in view of the political situation in China, would be dealt with separately in a subsequent issue. But it is necessary to note here that the excess of opium revenue over the receipts which should have been obtained under the sliding scale, a financial device designed to break the fall from the huge opium receipts to their almost complete disappearance due to the reform in China, is no less than $1\frac{3}{4}$ millions sterling. Two-thirds of this amount would be remitted for the redemption of temporary sterling debt in London, and the remaining third which amounts to 85 lakhs will be distributed in the following manner: Sanitation will receive 50 lakhs and Agriculture 20 lakhs, while the balance of 15 lakhs would be distributed among a Central Research Institute for work in public hygiene (six lakhs), a School of Tropical Medicine in Calcutta (five lakhs), and Government Laboratories in Burma and at Bombay (four lakhs). Whatever may be the ultimate effect of the loss of the opium revenue, the windfalls from opium served to finance education last year and assist "the sister grace of cleanliness" this year.

Increment in the ordinary revenue has been utilised for the following allotments. Expenditure on the reconstitution of Bengal and Assam would be assisted with a grant of 117 lakhs, the Royal bonus of half a month's pay to Provincial officers in civil employ would cost 32 lakhs, Kathiawar gets a remission of famine debts, as announced at Delhi, to the extent of 11 lakhs, the Madras Corporation gets a grant for its water-works and drainage amounting to 25 lakhs, impecunious Burma gets 20 lakhs for its communications, and the expeditions upon the North-East frontier would cost 9 lakhs. These are all non-recurring grants, and it is not possible to offer an opinion at this stage about the comparative merits of such diverse and unconnected projects. It may, however, be said that although sanitation benefits from the opium windfall, the hard pressed taxpayer, who was tazed afresh two years ago when an advisory Budget was presented, could not have contemplated that windfalls would largely go to redeem sterling debts and ordinary surpluses would be spent on Tropical Medicine and Laboratories, expeditions to Aborland and the reconstitution of provinces. The Finance Minister is anxious about redeeming recent floating debt, and Indian publicists are pressing the demands of education and cleanliness. But the poor taxpayer seems to have been thrust into a neglected corner to be brought out for further exactions, when rains and or Russia marches towards Chaman. We mean no disparagement of Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson when we say that the Finance Minister has yet to appear who regards himself as a friend of the taxpayer before the rest of an assertive and pushful world. No doubt every one of the grants can be justified, including the unjustified expedition on the North-East frontier. But had a non-official member of the Council put forward the claim of Tropical Diseases, or an indiscreet official representative of Madras had complained that the thrift of the Southern Presidency was her greatest vice, we have little doubt that a dozen good reasons would have been supplied by the Department of Finance why Tropical Diseases should be considered financial luxuries, and the Education Department would have effectively snatched the so called benighted Province.

The provision for the ensuing year show an estimated revenue of $7\frac{1}{4}$ millions balanced by an almost identical expenditure, leaving in the purely imperial section of accounts a surplus of approximately $1\frac{1}{4}$ millions. Apart from opium, the Imperial revenue will be nearly a million in excess of the estimated receipts in the closing year. But opium is not estimated to give more than the figure of the retical sliding scale, and should "cautious finance" result in another windfall the creditors in England will no doubt be paid for after allowing something to a third "grace," and some other provincial project would be discovered as a fit object of individual cunnity, the policy of a "stable government" in Persia and the ominous movements of the Dalai Lama do not absorb the entire increment. As at present estimated Opium, Customs, Interests, Mint and Railways show a decline in revenue, though Opium and Railways alone show any considerable falling-off. But the increase of nearly a million in Land Revenue and minor increases in salt, stamps, Excise, Post Office and Civil Departments, are likely to balance the diminution so far as to leave a net decrease of two millions sterling only. Our overseas commerce in 1911 showed that the value of our exports was up to date the highest on record, and that both currents of trade gave a combined total value for the nine months of 1911 of 304 crores, which beat the past record of 272 of the same period in 1910. Railways naturally responded with similar increase and the Revised Estimate was £15,151,100 which also is the highest on record. Sir Guy has therefore estimated the net earnings for 1912-13 at £605,000 less than in the present year and his hope that no "prudent publicist" would be offended with "a moderate margin of safety" is by no means extravagant.

The total provision for next year's expenditure is $1\frac{1}{4}$ millions higher than the revised estimates of the closing year, but the whole of this excess occurs in the provinces and even an imprudent publicist would not cavil at the increase which for the most part represents drafts on the large Imperial subsidies for education, sanitation and other beneficial services which are being placed at the credit of local Governments. The Imperial expenditure itself shows a decrease even though it amounts to no more than £76,000. There are increases in direct demands on revenue mainly in the collection charges of Land Revenue, in Interest chargeable to Railways which varies with the growth of borrowings, in salaries and expenses of Civil Departments, Railways, Irrigation, and in other Public Works. The excess in the Civil Departments is, however, due to a special reserve of £530,000 for the advancement of education which will be hailed by all kinds of publicists, prudent or otherwise. The Finance Member is anxious to draw attention to "a noteworthy drop of £511,000 in Military expenditure" and we welcome as an earnest of a still more noteworthy drop after the Nicholson Committee has reported on Military expenditure and the Slade Committee's examination bears fruit, Russia and Sir Edward Grey's policy in Persia permitting.

With respect to education, Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson acknowledged the debt of gratitude which India owes to Mr Gokhale for pressing its claim to the forefront, and the country would certainly pardon the Finance Member's "indiscretion" in mentioning that on the very first occasion when he discussed finance with His Excellency Lord Hardinge, very soon after he assumed his high office, he expressed a hope that the burdens of the people would not be increased and that it was his chief desire that "the amelioration of sanitation and the wide and comprehensive diffusion of education should form the chief features of his Viceroyalty." His Excellency's speech at the Calcutta Club struck a very human note when he confessed very gracefully that viceroys also had feelings like other people. Speaking, we hope not too presumptuously, for the educated classes in this country, we would like to assure His Excellency that we have not the least doubt that he has education as much at heart as Mr Gokhale, and it appreciation of his excellent intentions, coming as it does from a humble quarter, can afford any pleasure we are willing and anxious to associate ourselves with all that fell from Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson. With a publicist so seasonably insistent as the Hon. Mr. Gokhale, with a Viceroy so extremely sympathetic towards such demands, and last, but not least, with Sir Guy himself as a preacher of economy to all and a practitioner of generosity towards education, Sir Harcourt Butler is not likely to find the needs of his Department neglected or deferred. Although a good deal has yet to be done for education, and we hope to find it receiving not less than a tenth of India Revenue, free and compulsory elementary education securing future proceeds from the sale of salt which is a tax levied exactly on those classes that would benefit from such measure, we must acknowledge that in recent years education has received remarkably sympathetic treatment. In 1910-11 the actual expenditure on this head was £1,816,213, while the revised estimates for 1911-12 show an expenditure of £2,038,000 and the Budget estimate for the ensuing year is no less than £3,012,700. In reviewing the figures during the last three years Sir Guy explained that the expenditure on Education has risen in the triennium by 75 per cent. and we are sure that, while such of the increase is due to the pressing demands of the new Council so ably led by the Hon. Mr. Gokhale, he and his colleagues would be the first to express their gratitude to a responsive government. The total new provision for the year consequent on the announcement of the Royal boon at Delhi, which has been liberally supplemented by the Government both with recurring and non-recurring grants, is no less than a crore and a quarter which exceeds the whole amount spent during the year on the Royal visit and the Durbar at Delhi. This is the boom of booms and the more this policy is followed the less foreign would appear the rule of the British in India.

We reserve for another occasion an examination of the provisions for Railway and Irrigation and the project of the new Imperial Capital, nor can we discuss to-day the Provincial Settlements of the new provinces. A discussion of military finance would also be more appropriate after the report of the Nicholson Committee is published. We may, however, mention here that in spite of all efforts, expenditure on military services during the last three years has decreased by no more than one per cent. This is no decrease at all but only a stoppage of inordinate growth, and considering that military expenditure has grown enormously on account of the re-organization scheme of Lord Kitchener it appears that we have not yet returned even to our normal ways.

There is in India and in England a class of Englishmen that resents the least criticism of British Administration and specially that which is directed towards finance. But it would show up the autocratic vanity of this class if high officials of Government from time to time corrected the mistaken notions of the critics of Indian critics as the Hon. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson has done in submitting his financial statement this year. It will also give both courage and confidence to Indian publicists and indirectly benefit the Administration to an incalculable extent. We therefore offer no apology for quoting in full the remarks of Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson.

It is not the time to sum up the influence which this Council has exercised on the general administration of India, or to estimate the services that it has rendered alike to the rulers and to the ruled. But I can testify unhesitatingly to the power that the Council holds for good in directing attention to the finances of the country, in scrutinizing expenditure, and in advising the Government on the employment of the public funds. I have always found criticisms of my non-official colleagues temperate, suggestive, and helpful. Unable though we may at times have been to accept their opinions at once, they have not been without their effect on our subsequent arrangements, and even where we wholly disagreed they have shown us fresh points of view and warned us of probable dangers. It is no exaggeration to say that the free interchange of views which this Council stimulates, has already become a powerful factor for good in the financial policy of India.

We are sure this is not meant to be an empty compliment, and we have no hesitation in saying that such appreciation of Indian criticism is sure to make it still more temperate and responsible and helpful to the administrators.

Short Story.

The Vicissitudes of a Young Man of Fashion.

Vicissitude I.

The Biter Bit.

MR. ALI HOSSAIN sat staring at a letter he held in his hand. It did not look a very formidable epistle, and yet it seemed to make him very uneasy. It was only a dainty sheet of notepaper covered with about half a dozen lines, in a handwriting obviously disguised. He threw the letter down with an impatient movement, and, getting up from the table, went to the window and lit a cigarette. As he stood staring out his ears caught the jingling sound of anklets coming towards his room. He hastily went back to the table and picked up the letter, and had barely thrust it in his pocket when the purdah was pushed aside and his wife entered. He stood waiting for her to speak—they had already had one tiff that morning and he guessed she had come to renew hostilities.

"Will you take me to the Museum this afternoon," she said abruptly.

Mr. Ali Hossain assumed a most distressed appearance.

"My dear, I have already explained to you that I have a very important business engagement this afternoon with my solicitors, so how can I take you to the Museum. Any other day I shall be delighted, to-morrow if you like—but I can't possibly take you to-day."

"But you promised last week."

Mr. Ali Hossain lost patience.

"Good heavens, why won't women understand that business cannot give way to their whims. Why don't you go to the Museum if you are so anxious to see the wretched place. You can take your cousins with you, I have no objection—only I can't accompany you. I can't neglect important business."

"Very well, we'll go by ourselves, and I hope your business will get on satisfactorily," with which words she left the room, obviously still rather displeased. Presently, however, he heard the sound of gay laughter proceeding from her side of the house. "That's all right," he muttered with a sigh of relief, and then pulling the letter out of his pocket, perused it again, but this time with a smile of satisfaction, and a complacent twirl of his moustache. "Five o'clock! It's past three now, so I had better get dressed. Bearer!"

Mr. Ali Hossain went to his dressing room. He seemed very hard to please that afternoon. Half a dozen suits were rejected before he finally decided on one. Then came the vexed question of shirts, ties, and socks. At last, to the bearer's relief, he was ready to his satisfaction. As he stood in front of the glass fixing in the dainty buttonhole, he surveyed himself with a pleased air. The clock pointed to half-past four. "Tell them to bring the trap round," and with a last look in the mirror he turned away. On his way out he looked in at his wife's room, to tell her he was off to his solicitors, and would probably dine out, but found she had already gone to the Museum with her cousins. Thanking his stars that she had taken his suggestion, he jumped into his trap and drove off towards the Eden Gardens.

The place was fairly empty when he got there. At five in the afternoon very few of the fashionable crowd are to be seen round the maidan. The Gardens are mostly given over to children and their attendants. Mr. Ali Hossain looked somewhat out of place among these, but his air of complacency did not desert him. Pulling out the letter once more he re-read it carefully. "Five o'clock—beyond the Bandstand" he murmured. "I am in excellent time. Let's hope she won't be long."

Drawing up his trap near the Bandstand he got out and strolled up and down the drive, always keeping his attention fixed on one particular point. A quarter of an hour went by, twenty minutes, half an hour! Mr. Ali Hossain began to show signs of impatience. The famous letter was studied again, with a slight frown this time—and he was hesitating whether it was worth while waiting longer, when a closed gharri drew up near the point on which his attention had been fixed. He looked up expectantly, and presently a little handkerchief was pushed through the venetians, waved twice, and withdrawn. Mr. Ali Hossain hesitated no longer. He hastened towards the gharri and eagerly opened the door. Two veiled forms were seated inside—in the hand of one was the little handkerchief. He was about to address her, when she beckoned him in, and with a finger on her lips enjoined silence. He stepped in, the door closed, and the carriage drove off.

"Where are we going?" asked Mr. Ali Hossain. No reply came from the veiled figure, but a little touch of the dainty hand thrilled him—only for a second did it rest on his and the gesture of silence was repeated. His heart beat eagerly. The adventure promised well, and although he could not see her face, she seemed young and slender—the little hand was fair and delicate enough.

Presently a whisper came from the other figure. "Do not be alarmed. The Bibi Sahiba is taking you to her house. We are afraid of being discovered, and you must promise to let us blindfold you when you get down from the carriage. You will not be disappointed when you reach home."

"I will promise anything," said Mr. Ali Hossain, now emboldened, "only grant me one glance of those beautiful eyes."

No displeasure was shown at the bold words, but no answer was given. In silence they drove on. In a few minutes the gharri turned into what seemed a courtyard and stopped. A sheet was held up, the door opened, and the fair unknown alighted. As Mr. Ali Hossain stepped out, a scarf was thrown over his head and a hand grasping his arm, gently piloted him along. Still in silence he followed and seemed to be led into a room to a sofa where he was motioned to seat himself. He was about to remove the scarf and reap the reward of his patient obedience, but a whisper said "Wait."

He waited, several minutes elapsed and his patience began to give way. "May I not see the goddess now?" he said, putting out his hand in an endeavour to touch the fair unknown. A peal of laughter was the only answer. Where had he heard that laughter before? Tearing off the scarf that bound his eyes he looked up eagerly. In astonishment he found himself in his own room and in front of him his wife!

* * * * *

Mr. Ali Hossain never dares to mention important business with his solicitor as a reason for not complying with his wife's requests. He is also very careful not to be too eager to meet ladies, who make appointments by letter, in a disguised caligraphy. In fact he is a wiser and sadder man.

Verse.

Calm.

"After a storm cometh a calm"—so says
The proverb. From the crucible of pain
Our love rose pure of dross. Melted in rain
Were now the threatening clouds of former days.
Nor did the genial sun withhold his rays.
Would we not wish to live those days again?
I know not. Ask those wounded in forays:
"He jests at scars"—I miss the old refrain.

And yet. And yet the storm, they say, hath power
To please, and clouds a beauty of their own;
And the wild buffeting of winds is known
To give delight to some, when storm-racks lower,
And on the wind-ward strand are foam-flakes blown
From angry surging seas in a misty shower.

CORRESPONDENCE

Sir Edward Grey and Persia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I find Sir Edward Grey has been decorated with the Order of the Garter. Some Mussalmans are displeased with it, but I think it is rather a good omen. It means that he is about to be shifted to some other post and this is meant as a consolation. In my letter in reply to the famous Russian agent Madame Novikoff, published in the Indian Daily Telegraph of 20th February I had suggested his relegation to the House of Lords and the presidency of Council as a fitter post for him, for he has shown utter want of backbone in his dealings with Russia.

The recent note to Persia strengthens my conviction that the Garter could not have been the reward for success in the foreign policy of the Whig Minister. For his work properly speaking begins now when Persia is asked to subordinate itself to England and Russia. That means either (i) a flat refusal and hence failure or (ii) other period of disturbance later on, or (iii) acceptance by the present Persian Ministry. Then an unfortunate Mith (national) war with the Mejlis and the nationalists who will be backed up by the full strength of the religious heads of Najaf and perhaps by the secret or moral help of Turkey, is looming in the background. The Ministry in Teheran cannot stand but with the open help and military support of Russia and England if it accepts this ultimatum called a "declaration of policy."

I am reluctant to contemplate the result of this unrighteous policy. A legacy of hatred amongst the Persians and the countries where they have active influence, e.g., Mesopotamia, Caucasus and Herat province, want of confidence in these two powers by the Liberals all the world over, the wounding of the hearts of Muslims in every clinate, the weakening of Turkey on the Eastern frontier, German demands for compensation and many other troubles. Cannot these troubles be allowed to sleep and the Note withdrawn? In my pamphlet "England's policy in Persia and its perils," published 14 months before, I had anticipated these troubles.

So I say, Sir E. Grey's work has just now commenced and all dangers that were remote are coming nearer to India, to Turkey, to Russia, to Islam, and to England.

The "Lack of Variety."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,—I read your short and sweet note on the "lack of variety" in the last number of the Comrade and was delighted with it. I am afraid I have got to confess that the Comrade is more of a "Fighting Bob" than anything else and you love nothing better than to demolish (and that too very efficiently) and expose the specious arguments and fallacies of individuals and communities. You hit hard, and justly, and spare neither big nor small. But many of us love Comrade best when it is offering an apology for unforgotten sins. Let us have more of them.

More Possible Truths.

"WRITTEN to order" is a phrase usually taken to imply mediocrity, but is the implication inevitable! That modern scribe who has asserted that nobody would write unless he were forced to it goes too far; but there are plenty of people who from laziness or lack of concentration write all the better when a subject is imposed upon them from without. Cowper's "Task" is the classic instance in English literature. In one of the fits of depression to which he was liable, his friend Lady Austen urged him to distract his thoughts by undertaking a long poem. He pleaded that he was at a loss for a subject and she, who had already told him the story of John Gilpin, had a lucky inspiration, "You can write on any subject," she said, "write upon this sofa." The demand was certainly enough to daunt a timid bard, but Cowper was too gallant to disobey.

How extract poetry from a sofa? "The Task" surmises to assure us that he did not fail. It is worth while recalling his own justification—

"The theme though humble, yet august and proud

The occasion—for the fair commands the song

Happy poet, to be thus commanded! Happy fair, to be thus obeyed! It must, however, be admitted that Cowper escaped from the sofa as soon as he could.

Again, it may be that, to borrow Cowper's phrase,

"That perpetual want of peace which vexes public men"

acts as a spur to lagging imagination. Some of the finest writing in the world owes its origin to compelling need. It comes as a shock to be told that Shakespeare himself but the thing is not as ugly as it seems. If want of money set him to work upon a masterpiece, be sure that motive was forgotten before the first act was finished.

"For gain and not for glory winged his flight"

Thomas Fuller, who in his childhood might possibly have seen Shakespeare and who included him in his "Worthies of England," openly avows that in his own case the pecuniary motive was among the incentives which made him write! And what of "Rasselas," that once famous Eastern apologue, which was translated into most European languages? Composed in the evenings of one week, there is small reason to wonder at the melancholy which pervades it when we remember that Samuel Johnson wrote it to defray the expenses of his mother's funeral. What recommendation could be stronger. Necessity gave the order and love obeyed it.

The probability is that all good writing is spontaneous, given the original impulsion while spontaneity need not exclude subsequent revision. Whether the second thoughts of writers are better is a moot point. We know that Shakespeare "never blotted a line," and at least one critic wished that he had blotted a thousand. But, after all, correction might not have meant improvement. Wordsworth was ill-inspired when in the original line "the blackbird amid summer trees" he altered "summer" to "leafy." The lengthening by Burns for musical purposes of each fourth line of his great lyric "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled"—"on to glorious victory" for instance, instead of "on to victory"—can hardly please any one. More over, there must be a limit somewhere. The aspiring poet should take warning from Addison's "Ned Softly" who coquetted half a summer's day between "you sing your song" and "your song you sing."

The ethics of biographical writing continue to provoke discussion. Indiscretion, it was lately asserted, is the would-be Boswell's greatest merit. But what type of indiscretion? Towards the close of the seventeenth century there dwelt in a cave in Galloway an old Scotch hermit who claimed prophetic gifts. One day he complained to the representatives of law and order that some neighbouring peasant had been "treating him with indiscretion." Pressed for the facts, he avowed that they had pelted him and his dwelling place with stones, exclaiming repeatedly, "Come forth, thou vile old apostate!" This, at any rate, cannot be the sort of indiscretion the biographer is to emulate.

The prospect of having their careers recorded has added, it used to be said in the case of the eminent, a new terror to life. But there is something still more formidable, and that is, when novelist or playwright works his will upon the great departed! A French writer has lately made a drama out of Byron's career, which he has travestied beyond all bounds of veracity and good manners. This is a subject to which I may perhaps return, if it is not deemed by the Editor too remote and recondite to interest readers of The Comrade. [No, not at all—Ed., Comrade]

In view of large French and other interests, Italian action at Beyrout has caused uneasiness in France. The press expresses anxiety regarding possible international consequences and several journals counsel Italy to use extreme prudence. Others severely condemn what they describe as futile action.

Reuter wires from Toulon that arrangements are being made to despatch a cruiser to the Levant to protect French interests.

The French liner Armand Behic called at Hodeidah and took off 31 Europeans and 62 Somalis, Indians and French proteges. An Italian torpedo boat assisted the refugees towing the boats from the shore to the ship.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 29th —Russia has made fresh proposals for mediation between Italy and Turkey. She proposes to ask Italy upon what terms she will conclude peace on the basis of Italian sovereignty over Tripoli, and afterwards for five Powers to approach Turkey.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 29th —There is little faith here in the efficacy of Russian initiative. The adoption of the Bill by the Italian Parliament annexing Tripoli is regarded as an insurmountable obstacle to an understanding.

Reuter wires from Constantinople —It is estimated that six or seven thousand persons are affected by the decree ordering the expulsion of Italians from Palestine. They include many employed on the Baghdad Railway at Aleppo.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, February 2.

OFFICIAL despatches from Benghazi report a furious attack delivered by some 400 Beduins on the night of the 30th on the small fort which protects the wells on that side of the town. The assault was repulsed by the garrison of the fort, aided by artillery fire from the flanking redoubts. The enemy left a number of arms and 12 dead in the wire entanglements surrounding the fort, while they carried off many of the dead and wounded. On the Italian side four were killed. The following morning a strong column of the enemy, with artillery, was seen at a distance of five miles from the outer fortifications. Some groups of Beduins who approached were dispersed by the Italian Cavalry.

February 4.

A telegram from Tripoli states that General Caneva, who is about to leave for Italy, has temporarily handed over the command of the Italian forces to General Frugoni.

The object of General Caneva's journey is said to be to confer with the authorities on the military situation.

February 5.

General Caneva arrived here shortly after noon to-day from Tripoli. He was received at the station by the Minister for War.

and the Chief of the General Staff, and was warmly cheered by the crowd as he drove off in a motor car to the Ministry for War.

The Times received the following telegram from Sheikh Ali Yousef, president of the Egyptian Red Crescent Society, dated Cairo, 3rd February:—

The latest telegrams received from the seat of war in Tripoli confirm the fact that the Italians are harassing the Red Crescent hospitals, and officials have been shot at repeatedly. We appeal to civilized nations to protect our missions and to prevent Italy's violation of international treaties.

Paris, February 4.

The French Government has instructed its representatives at Constantinople and at Obok, a French coaling station on the Gulf of Aden, to furnish information with regard to the reported bombardment of Hodeidah and Ras-el-Ketib, on the Arabian shore of the Red Sea. French interest in the matter is due to the fact that the Franco-Turkish Company which, with the help of a French loan of £11,000,000, is constructing a railway from Hodeidah to Sanaa has established works and depôts at Hodeidah and a wharf at Ras-el-Ketib.

On 27th January the commander of the Italian blockading squadron in the Red Sea ordered the company's agents to evacuate the works within five days, on the expiration of which the place would be bombarded. These orders were given in accordance with Article 11. of the ninth Convention of The Hague of 1907, which excepts from the list of undefended places that are exempt from bombardment all works and establishments capable of being utilized by an enemy's naval or military forces. As the Journal des Debats points out, the Italians regarded the Hodeidah works as coming within this category, and after giving reasonable notice they bombarded the place. The Debats adds:—

Failing more detailed information, France, therefore, has so far no reason to protest to the Italian Government against acts which, until evidence to the contrary is forthcoming, appear to have been in conformity with the laws of war. Those, moreover who have suffered loss and damage are unquestionably entitled to proceed against the other belligerent—Turkey. It would be unwise and a blunder to excite over this affair the movement of public opinion in France against our neighbours.

This warning is addressed to certain French journals which demand the despatch of French warships to the Red Sea upon the pretext that French interests are in danger. The Debats not only shows that French interests are not directly involved, but adds that it has reason to believe that the damage caused by the bombardment is far from amounting to the hundreds of thousands of pounds at which it is estimated by some other journals. It is further stated that the material for the construction of the quays at Ras el Ketib is still on board a steamer, which is on its way to Hodeidah from Suez. The principal sufferer is really the Ottoman Government, which counted on the railway to Sanaa as an important auxiliary for the defence of Yemen.

The French Government has taken steps to secure the embarkation of the company's 40 French employees in the first Messageries Maritimes steamer due to pass through the Red Sea.

With regard to the renewed bombardment of Sheikh Said at the southern Arabian end of the Red Sea it appears that the alleged French territorial rights in that place have not been exercised. If an article in the Pigaro is to be believed, the formal declaration by the Chamber of Deputies in 1896 that Sheikh Said was a French possession has remained without effect, and the part, the position of which opposite Perim renders it commercially and strategically important, remains in the military occupation of Turkey.

Rome, February 6.

The following semi-official statement is issued here:—

Reports have appeared in foreign newspapers that Italian warships have bombarded Hodeidah and shelled and destroyed the yards and buildings of the company constructing the Ras Ketib railway. Up to the present the commander of the naval force in the Red Sea has reported no bombardment either of the town of Hodeidah or of the buildings of the above company. There was, it appears, only a bombardment of an encampment of regular Turkish troops at Jebanah, 16 kilometres from Hodeidah and six from Ras Ketib. The Government is, however, awaiting further intelligence on this subject. In spite of the assertions of several foreign journals that Hodeidah could not be bombarded because it is an unfortified town, it has been ascertained that it is protected by a small fort at the extreme northern end of the town and that on 2nd October this fort fired on the Italian gunboats Volturno and Aretusa. It appears also that some field batteries were placed to the south of the town opposite the sea. (Reuter.)

Paris, February 7

It was stated yesterday that 14 truck-loads of shells consigned from Germany to Italy had been refused access by Switzerland via the Simplon route, and that they had been diverted to the French frontier for transit by the Mount Cenis route via Bellegarde and Modane. No further news is forthcoming with regard to the actual passage of the trucks through French territory, but a telegraph agency issues a statement to the effect that the French Government has never had the intention of preventing French industry from executing orders for arms and ammunition either for Turkey or for Italy. Article 7 of the Fifth Convention of the second Hague Conference is adduced in support of the contention that a neutral Power is not bound to prevent the export or transit for the benefit of belligerents of arms, ammunition, or anything else which may be of service to an army or a fleet. It is added that orders for war material are being executed in various French industrial establishments both for Turkey and for Italy.

According to the Temps, it is not considered probable that Switzerland refused to allow the consignment of German shells to pass through Swiss territory, since train loads of war material, including a captive balloon for An Zara consigned to Italy from Germany, have repeatedly passed through Switzerland.

We publish below an extract of a private letter which a prisoner in Kazerta in Italy had succeeded in sending to one of our staff:—

"I would have liked to write to you something about myself: but I cannot find an opportunity to write in detail. It is three months that we have been imprisoned in Aldefra (آلدفره) barracks. We'll not exactly in prison, but in custody. We are not allowed to see anyone. Among the prisoners are the following: about 400 soldiers, eighty old men, a Commodore of Tripoli and 3 Majors of Infantry, Cavalry and Gendarmes. The rest are Captains and Lieutenants, in all 29 officers. None of us is a prisoner of war, for we did not participate in the war. The Commodore and myself with 7 marines were seized on board the German steamer Galata. Similarly others too are men and officers taken from steamers bound for Constantinople or Dedeagatch. A few have been brought here from the towns of Benghazi or Derna, not one of whom had taken part in any fighting.

"To us is denied the treatment which is accorded to the meanest of men. I suppose international laws and agreements are not made to be applied to us Turks. However we enjoy the concession of reading newspapers, but no correspondent can approach us. Even Russia had not subjected our prisoners to such treatment during the war of 1878.

"We are not given any beds and sleep on stone pavements."

We have read the following with utter dismay and invite the serious attention of our Government to it:—

"When the Italians entered the town of Tripoli I was lying in the hospital, in spite of this, I was at once made a prisoner.

"All the patients of the hospital were treated as prisoners of war and subjected to various barbarities. Many of our fellow-patients could not survive this treatment. A few days later we, 140 in all, were put on board a vessel and brought to Naples. We were kept 10 days in Naples. Morning and evening we were given flesh of swine to eat. One day we decided not to eat it. When the dinner bugle we sounded we did not come out to take our dinner. Whereupon Italian officers, stick in hand, compelled us to take our dinner and gave those who refused a terrible thrashing. From Naples we were sent to Kazerta (كازرتة). Although pork is no longer our fare, we are still putting up awful treatment. We are given 300 grammes of bread a day. We will die of starvation. As to cleanliness we are never given any clothes to change. May God rescue us from the hands of these oppressors. I can't write any more as my eyes are glistening.

The Subject Races of Turkey.

A memorial on the present condition of the Turkish Empire has been addressed to the Sultan and to the Presidents of both Chambers of the Ottoman Parliament by a number of distinguished representatives of many sides of public life in Great Britain. After expressing sympathy with the people of the Ottoman Empire and referring to the misgivings and disappointments caused both within and without the Turkish dominions by the departure from the noble ideal proclaimed at the time of the revolution some three years ago, the memorial continues:—

"The historic sympathy of the English people with the Ottoman Empire in the past was alienated by the like evils, and the English people were convinced that no hope of amelioration in the lot of the Turkish subject peoples lay in any other direction than in the gradual disintegration of the Ottoman Empire. The reputation of these evils will, unless arrested, alienate once again, and, we fear, irrevocably, the sympathy which the Turkish revolution had re-awakened amongst us.... We speak in no spirit of self-righteousness; we had hoped that Turkey's great example would serve not only to anchorate the lot of her own people, but to fortify the ideals of ours. She may save herself by her exceptions, and Oriental civilization by her example. She has yet a unique opportunity of convincing the West that Oriental peoples have been unjustly believed incapable of Constitutional Government. Sadly must we confess, however, that this belief will be confirmed if the great experiment of Turkish Constitutionalism should fail."

Among the signatories are Lord Peel, Lord Esher, the Bishops of Winchester, Oxford, Hereford and Lincoln, Lord Courtney of Penwith, Lord Walsdale, Dr. Mair, ex-Moderator of the Church of Scotland, Dr. George Adam Smith, Vice-Chancellor and Principal of University of Aberdeen, Dr. Alexander Whyte, Principal of New College, Edinburgh; Dr. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bt., Sir Thomas Barlow, Bt., Sir Charles Bruce; Sir John Macdonnell; Sir T. Vezey Strong, ex Lord Mayor of London, Sir W. S. Brown, Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Sir W. M. Ramsay, late Professor of Humanity, Aberdeen University; Sir John Rhys, Principal of Jesus College, Oxford, Professor Sidney J. Hickson, University of Manchester, the Warden of Keble, Professor J. H. Morgan, University College; Professor Westlake, Mr. Noel Buxton, M.P., Mr. William G. C. Gladstone, M.P., Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., and Dr. George R. Parkin, Secretary of the Rhodes Trust.

The Turkish Soldier.

THE TURKISH SOLDIER IS THE FINEST SOLDIER IN THE WORLD

I know because I have campaigned with him, writes an American correspondent. I have seen him in the stress of battle, on forced marches, in camp and in garrisons. I have seen him in the trenches, in the hospital tent and in his home. From every standpoint he is the finest soldier in the world. There are many reasons why this is true. In the first place, he is almost invariably a perfect specimen of manhood. His physique is that of a boxer and wrestler in perfect condition. His endurance is unequalled. In the second place, he does not know the meaning of fear. Like the Japanese soldier, he is a fatalist. Everything happens for the best, no matter whether he is killed or desperately wounded. In the third place, he is perfectly trained. His officers are graduates of the great military schools of Europe. And he is equipped with the most powerful rifles used by any nation. Last, but not least, he can fight longer without a commissary than any soldier on earth. He eats sparingly at all times and can go days without food. Being a Mahomedan, he never touches liquor in any form. I spent three weeks with the Turkish Army that captured Constantinople in May 1909, and overthrew Abdul Hamid. During that time I saw every phase of a Turkish soldier's life. As I have made more or less of a study of the fighting men of all nations it is not an off-hand judgment when I say he is the greatest fighting machine in the world.

My experience with the Turks came about in this way. I sailed for Egypt with Mrs. Selwyn in February of 1909 to gather material for a play dealing with modern life in Egypt. A trip up the Nile convinced me that an Egyptian setting was suitable only for a comic opera and I decided to visit Turkey. We made a caravan trip through Asia Minor and reached Constantinople early in May.

The day we arrived at the Golden Horn we were advised to leave immediately, as rumours of war and revolution were in the air. In fact most of the tourists had left. However, we were anxious to witness the sultanik of the Sultan, which took place that afternoon, and we decided to stay. Armed with passports, we managed to view the impressive ceremony which precedes the Sultan's entry to the mosque, and, seeing the troops lined up six deep around the great building, we laughed at the warnings of our friends.

After the ceremony we hired a carriage and drove out to a suburb of the city. Arriving at a crest of a hill about 9 miles from Constantinople we encountered a Turkish soldier who motioned for us to go back. I told our driver to pay no attention to him, with the result that a bullet came whistling over our heads. We jumped out of the carriage to show that we were Americans and to display our passports. As we did so our driver wheeled his horses about and drove off at top speed. There we were left on the crest of the hill with the Turkish soldier. We were not alone long, however. In two or three minutes soldiers, separated like skirmishers, appeared as if by magic on the side of the hill below us. The situation dawned upon me in a moment. The Young Turks, who were supposed to be at Salonica, 22 hours away by train, were at the very gates of Constantinople. The revolution had begun. Seizing my wife by the arm, I turned her around, and we hurried down the road toward the city. Fortunately, after we had run nearly a mile, we came upon our frightened driver, who took us back to the city. I went immediately to the American Embassy and asked to see Mr. Leishman, our Ambassador. He was away, so I related what had happened to one of the Under-Secretaries, who listened to me with the air of a man who doesn't believe a word you are saying. He assured me that I was mistaken about the approach of an army and that no trouble was expected.

That night we went to bed at the Pera Palace, our hotel, with great misgivings. We determined to leave Constantinople the following day. However, our plans were changed. About four o'clock in the morning we were awakened by the booming of guns and the rattle of small firearms. The Young Turks were attacking the city. Looking out of the window of our room, we saw scores of Turkish soldiers in the gray dawn, with drawn bayonets, carefully threading the crooked streets.

I had a letter of introduction to Shevket Pasha, an officer in the Turkish Army, from an Italian friend which I intended to present if I remained in Constantinople any length of time. Imagine my surprise when I learned that Shevket Pasha was in command of the army of occupation.

I asked the officer in command of the guard at the hotel to deliver the letter. About 10 o'clock that morning Shevket Pasha called on me at the hotel. He was profuse in his apologies for the inconvenience I had been put to and to my surprise invited me to accompany him.

That morning I witnessed the attack upon the Sultan's Palace which was guarded by several regiments of his faithful troops. The Young Turks numbered less than 16,000, and had marched from Salonica in 22 hours without halting for more than 10 minutes at a time. So sudden was the attack that the city was taken completely by surprise. There was not a single newspaper correspondent in the city. No army had ever made a march so rapidly yet the men seemed fresh and they fought like tigers.

At one stage of the fighting the troops in the palace raised a white flag and thinking they had surrendered, the Young Turks rushed forward, only to be mowed down by machine guns. I watched the fighting with Shevket Pasha and his staff from a tower about a quarter of a mile away. He gave his orders as coolly as if he were in a drawingroom. The soldiers on both sides fought absolutely without fear. The wounded dropped down without a groan. When the order for the final attack on the palace was given, the Young Turks rushed into a veritable hail of bullets from the machine guns and after a desperate hand-to-hand struggle captured it. By 2 o'clock in the afternoon the entire city was in the hands of the Young Turks.

When the fighting was over the soldiers, both the loyal troops, who had been disarmed and the Young Turks, stood around drinking coffee and smoking cigarettes. The army of occupation had been without sleep for thirty hours and had been fighting since day-break, but aside from a blood-stained bandage here and there they didn't show it. The Turkish soldier seems insensible to pain. I visited some of the improvised hospitals which were filled with the wounded. Not a groan was to be heard. Turkish Army surgeons were performing major operations without anaesthetics. The patients did not even flinch.

Shevket Pasha treated me as if I had been a distinguished representative of the American Government. I was escorted back to the hotel by a guard of picked men with an invitation to take breakfast with him the following morning. Needless to say I availed myself of the opportunity. The next day all the guests of the hotel left on an outgoing steamer for Athens while I remained.

The Young Turk army went into camp outside the city, and becoming acquainted with several of the Turkish officers, all of whom spoke English, I spent all of my time with them. While the officers lived like Europeans, the enlisted men lived on food that a French, German or American soldier wouldn't think of eating. All they seemed to care about was their coffee and cigarettes.

My admiration for the Turkish troops was so great that Shevket Pasha invited me to spend a fortnight with him. During that time he inspected a dozen or more of the garrison near Constantinople. I accompanied him on several of these tours of inspection, and I saw the Turkish soldiers under all conditions. Every day my wonder for them increased.

I was given every opportunity to study them, and even if I had served among them I could not have learned more of their habits, their mental operation and their outlook on life. Shevket Pasha is now Minister of War and one of the most powerful men in Turkey.

Because he is silent we regard the Oriental as something of a mystic. As a matter of fact there is no mystery about him. He is more like a child than anything else. This is true of the Turkish soldier as well as of the Arab.

Turkish Finance.

(FROM A "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

HOWSOEVER many and great may be the political sins of Young Turkey, of that "irresponsible junta" which for the past three years has controlled the destinies of the Ottoman Empire, it cannot be denied that, in the domain of finance its leaders have done good work under great difficulty, and that the present condition of affairs is in several respects more promising than that which obtained at the close of the Hamidian régime. "Ottomanism" has made but little progress towards the establishment of law and order in the provinces, internal strife, active or latent, is still endemic in Macedonia, Albania, and the Asiatic provinces; lawlessness is actually increasing in many parts of the Empire, and the local authorities seem quite unable to check it.

But at headquarters, both at Constantinople and at Salonika the leaders of Young Turkey seem to understand that the maintenance of the benevolent, not to say complaisant, attitude adopted by the Powers in 1908 could only be secured by a cautious and conciliatory policy in matters financial. They gauged, accurately enough, the financial leit-motiv which runs beneath all the benevolent shibboleths of European diplomacy, and realized that the sentimental claims of humanity in modern politics stand for less, in the long run, than the immediate interests of bondholders. Finally, they have always kept well in view, as definite aspirations, the abolition of the Capitulations and the recovery of Tariff autonomy, and they have had sense enough to realize that these objects can only be attained by Turkey's proving herself worthy of confidence in the matter of financial administration. Wiser in this respect than their prototypes of Young China, they have made sincere efforts to put their house in order by holding fast to the tradition of the Monarchical form of government and by securing and following the advice of trustworthy financial experts in several branches of the public service. And the result of their wisdom has been that trade is slowly but surely developing, that the Customs receipts have increased; the Administration of the public debt has shown marked improvement in revenue collection and in Sinking Fund appropriations, while the general resources of the Empire have been materially strengthened as the result of improved administration and economic development. To Sir Richard Crawford, K.C.M.G., in particular, much credit is given by the Turkish Government for his effective reorganization of the Customs Department, the Financial Commission of Reforms has also rendered excellent service in devising new legislation and organizing fiscal administration upon practical lines—proving, incidentally, how short sighted was the action of the Powers which deprived Macedonia of their disinterested services in 1908.

Examination of the present condition of finance and economics in Turkey presents several features of interest. In the first place, it is to be noted that the returns of trade for the past three years (March 1907 to March 1910, continue to show a considerable balance against the Ottoman Empire. The figures are as follows:—

	IMPORTS.	EXPORTS.
	£T	£T
Year 1323 (March 1907-8) . . .	34,763,519	16,213,031
Year 1325 (March 1909-10) . . .	33,382,550	18,198,447

The state of affairs implied by these figures is less ominous than would at first sight appear, certainly it conveys no such warning as the adverse trade balances of other debtor States, such as China or Portugal, and this for several reasons. First, a very considerable proportion of the imports in recent years has consisted of machinery, railway material, and other plant intended for the construction of remunerative public works. These may reasonably be regarded as outside the normal volume of trade, coming rather under the heading of capital borrowed in kind. Secondly, the balance of trade is assisted by remittances of emigrants and other unseen factors. Finally, there is good reason to doubt the accuracy of the Customs valuations of several lines of exports, which pay duty ad valorem. Of the real nature and significance of the trade balance we should shortly be in a position to judge on more accurate data, for the Customs returns are henceforward to be compiled on British lines, showing the countries of origin and destination for all cargo. For the present, we are confronted with the apparently conflicting facts of a considerable adverse trade balance on the one hand, and, on the other, of gold imported in large quantities which remains in the country. Reliable authorities aver that during the past ten years no less than 25 millions of pounds (Turkish) have been absorbed, either in the form of women's head ornaments or as circulating medium. Travellers, especially those coming from Russia or Austria, are immediately impressed by the fact that gold currency is undeniably plentiful in the House of the Sick Man, and that the foreign credit of so visibly disturbed an Empire remains, comparatively speaking, unaffected by wars and rumours of war.

It is not possible to determine, with any degree of accuracy, the cost to Turkey of the present war with Italy, or, indeed, that of any of her numerous military operations and expeditions of recent years. Since the Revolution estimates of revenue and expenditure have been published, it is true, but official audits are still lacking so that actual details of expenditure remain matters of surmise. The Albanian, Hauran, Kerek, and Yemen wars have, between them, necessitated the mobilization of some 92 battalions of Reservists, and kept these with the colours for periods averaging four to six months; the troops in the Yemen have been on service since the beginning of last year. As regards the cost of the war with Italy, its principal item consists in the maintenance of the 50,000 Reservists called out (which may be reckoned at about £2,500 per diem) and purchases of ordnance and stores, chiefly for the Dardanelles Artillery. The burden is evidently insignificant compared with that which Italy is bearing, and it is, moreover, to some extent balanced by the cessation of administration expenses in the Tripoli province. Nevertheless the dominant feature of Turkish finance, as shown in the Budgets of the past two years, lies in its heavy, and apparently irreducible, burden of military expenditure. In the Budget for 1910-1911, out of a total expenditure of 35 millions the estimates of the War Department, Gendarmerie, Artillery, and Minister of Marine call for 12½ millions, while the service of the Public Debt absorbs another 11½ millions. It must be clear, from these figures, that either new sources of revenue must be found or that the administrative and reproductive branches of the public service must continue to be starved to the point of suspended animation. But the organization of new sources of revenue can only come with and from the activities of efficient civil administration; and so the whole question of reform continues to revolve in a vicious circle, the centre of which is money.

Herein lies the problem which confronts the Minister of Finance and those of his colleagues who appreciate the fact that with nations, as with individuals, the necessities of the debtor are the creditor's opportunity. Upon the solution of this financial problem, more than upon any conflict of races and sects, depends the future of the Ottoman Empire, yet its vital importance remains still unrealized by many of the rank and file of Young Turkey. If the position were accurately gauged, there could be no possibility of further opposition, or even of hesitation, in adopting the improved and organized methods of revenue collection repeatedly recommended by the Financial Commission of Reforms, methods which had successfully stood the test of experience in Macedonia, even before the Revolution. There is no doubt that in many provinces the present financial administration remains characterized by most of the irregularities, abuses, and waste which were supposed to be the direct result of the Hamidian régime and to perish with it. The much-needed development of the country's export trade in particular continues to be sore let and hindered by the levies of tithes and other exactions imposed (precisely like the skin of China) by the provincial officials of their own sweet will. The intelligent and progressive section of Young Turkey realizes, no doubt, the urgent necessity for remedial measures in these matters. But the question remains. Will their influence and efforts be sufficient to convert to seriousness and sense not only the reactionary and bureaucratic elements in the State, but also those Babu and boy warriors of their own party who have lately succeeded in reducing the Chamber of Deputies to something between a Kindergarten and a caucus?

The Balkan Danger.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Belgrade, January 21.

"THE prospect for the coming spring is viewed with increasing anxiety here. In the best informed quarters, both native and foreign, it is feared that the growing anarchy in European Turkey may lead to serious complications as soon as the respite afforded by the present severe weather comes to an end. The first outbreak of trouble is anticipated on the side of Northern Albania, the usual period for the renewal of disturbances in this country being now only a few weeks off. The tribesmen are already exasperated at the refusal of the Government to allow a discussion of their grievances in the Chamber, the dissolution and the return of the Deputies to their respective districts seem likely to increase their indignation and to prompt them to seek redress by other than Constitutional methods. Notwithstanding the severe cold, the bands in Northern Albania increase from day to day, and conflicts with the troops have already occurred in the district between Ipek and Mitrovitza.

In connexion with the prospect of coming trouble in Albania the attitude of Montenegro suggests many misgivings here. King Nicholas has neglected no means of retaining his influence with the Malissori, who have been provided with fresh supplies of arms from over the Montenegrin frontier, while Montenegrin agents are stated to be active in every part of Northern Albania. The suspicion with which Montenegro is now regarded here is not solely due to the discord prevailing between the reigning houses. It is now universally believed that King Nicholas has cast in his lot with Austria-Hungary and that Montenegro can no longer be reckoned on to join in opposing a prospective Austrian advance into the sanjak of Novibazar. It is certain that Russia largely forfeited her influence at Cetigne by withdrawing last year the subvention she had hitherto accorded to Montenegro, and the little State, unable to exist on its own resources and burdened with the expenses incurred during the last Albanian revolt, has been compelled to seek financial aid from Vienna. Whether the loan recently obtained from Austrian financiers on remarkably favourable terms involves definite political obligations is unknown but the worst fears are entertained here.

The anxieties of the situation are increased by the attitude of Bulgaria. For some time past King Ferdinand has been believed to pursue an Austrophil policy, and the circumstance that His Majesty is now in Hungary is not calculated to allay Servian apprehensions. During the crisis of 1908-1909, Bulgaria acted loyally towards Serbia and refused, it is believed, certain tempting offers at a moment when war with the Dual Monarchy seemed imminent. But Austrian influence is now generally supposed to be predominant at Sofia. It is reported from Macedonia that Austrian support is not withheld from the Bulgarian movement, even when it resorts to methods which need not be described in detail, and little comfort is derived from the pacific and apparently Turcophil attitude of the Gueshoff Cabinet, which may soon be altered by the stress of events.

It is therefore feared that should Austria take advantage of the troubled situation in Turkey to make a forward movement in the spring, Serbia will find herself practically isolated and deprived of the aid of her natural allies in the Balkans. The prospect of succour from any of the Great Powers is equally slender. While Italy is engaged in war and the Powers of the Triple Entente are absorbed by problems in Asia and Africa, Austria has her hand free, and needs only the assent of Germany to an aggressive movement in the Balkan Peninsula. The land apparently lies open, for Turkey, it is thought, would scarcely resist an Austrian advance in view of the danger of a simultaneous attack on the part of Bulgaria and Greece. The best hope for the situation would seem to lie in the unwillingness of Germany to risk a further decline of her waning influence in Constantinople and in the well known disinclination of the Emperor Francis Joseph to embark in a policy of adventure. At present Serbia must content herself with such consolation as may be afforded by these considerations which scarcely suffice to banish the Austrian nightmare, now oppressing her more heavily than ever.

Sofia, January 30.

I understand that an arrangement has been practically concluded between the Greeks and Bulgarians in Macedonia for common action at the approaching elections. The efforts made by Young Turk agents to sow discord between the two races appear to have failed, and the Bulgarians are stated to have rejected the offer of seven seats in the new Parliament provided that they would act against the Greeks. The Bulgarian leaders and the Albanian chiefs maintain the accord arrived at last spring. The Albanians, recognizing the error they committed last year by beginning the revolt prematurely, are determined to remain quiet for the present, but to continue their preparations.

This decision was taken some weeks ago and, consequently, is not attributable to the recent announcement of certain "reforms" on the part of the Young Turks, which are regarded as an electoral device and are not taken seriously by the chiefs.

Despatches from Uskub give details of an attack by a strong Turkish band on the Bulgarian Monastery of the Blessed Virgin, situated on the border of the districts of Ishih and Uskub. The Turks found nine persons in the monastery; these were bound and conducted into the church, where they were decapitated. The band then desecrated the church and plundered the monastery. The Commandant of the local Gendarmes, on being informed of the occurrence, by some peasants, sent two gendarmes to the monastery, who discovered the corpses, but no further step is stated to have been taken by the authorities.

Salonica, January 30.

A bomb exploded at Strumitza (58 miles north north-west of Salonika) last evening, killing an officer and five gendarmes and injuring the Commandant of the Gendarmes and seven gendarmes (Reuter).

Sofia, January 31.

The Crown Prince Constantine of Greece arrives to-day at the frontier station of Harmanli where he will be met by M. Panas, the Greek Minister, who will accompany his Royal Highness to Sofia. The circumstance that the heir to the Greek throne has been selected to represent the King of the Hellenes at the festivities in Sofia is much appreciated here, and may not be devoid of political importance, especially when taken in connexion with the recent interchange of visits between the Greek Patriarch and M. Sarafoli, the Bulgarian Minister in Constantinople, and the refusal of the Greeks in Macedonia to co-operate with the Young Turks against the Bulgarians at the approaching elections.

The Greco-Bulgarian rapprochement, which was inaugurated by Macedonian peasants, is also largely due to the tact and ability of the Greek representative here. The Bulgarian Minister in Athens seems destined to become an important factor in the future developments of the situation in the Balkans.

King Victor Emmanuel will be represented at the festivities here by a special mission under the Marquess Malaspina, formerly Italian Ambassador in Constantinople. The Italian Government will be represented by Count Bosdari, the Italian Minister here.

It is regretted that Great Britain alone of the Great Powers refrained from sending a specially deputed Mission on this occasion, as might naturally have been expected in view of the close relationship of the reigning houses, but it is understood that owing to the absence of King George and the lack of time for the purpose of making arrangements this was found impossible. A special British Mission will attend the 25th anniversary of King Ferdinand's accession next summer.

Vienna, January 31.

A special train left Vienna this evening for Sofia with the French, Russian, Spanish, and other Foreign Missions to the Bulgarian festivities. Prince Alexander of Serbia is expected to join the train at Belgrade.

Constantinople, January 31.

Commenting in the Janin on the visit of the Crown Prince of Greece to Sofia, Ismail Haki Bey expresses fear that the "pompous menacing" Greco-Bulgarian rapprochement is directed against Turkey. If that be so, the Ottoman Empire must stretch out its hand across Bulgaria and find an ally. As for the possibility that it may lead to interference in the internal affairs of the Empire, Turkey is strong enough to resist such attempts and can count upon the help of "elements that are oppressed by the hand of the foreigner."

Though the publication of these remarks at the moment when the Turkish mission is preparing to start for Sofia to salute the Bulgarian Heir-Apparent on his coming of age may seem somewhat discourteous, the above article faithfully reflects the apprehensions caused in Young Turk circles by the steady improvement in the relations between the Greeks and Bulgars both within the boundaries of the Empire and outside them.

Vienna, January 31.

Reports of outrages in Macedonia are becoming frequent. Bulgarian komitadjis are alleged to have placed in the house of a merchant, named Selini, at Radovishka a dynamite bomb which on removal and examination exploded, killing an officer and eight soldiers and wounding eight others. A Bulgar band is stated to have murdered and mutilated four men and two women of Bulgar race (according to another version eight men and a woman) for having betrayed a band near Kuprih.

These outrages, together with reports of unrest in Northern Albania and the singular stories supplied of late to the Austrian Press from Belgrade concerning the alleged revolutionary intentions of alleged secret associations of Servian officers, are regarded here as early indications of what is expected to occur in the Balkans next spring. Whether the disturbance will consist merely of sporadic turmoil, or of organized insurrection as in 1903, or of deliberate action by the Balkan States, there are at present no means of judging.

The supposition entertained in several Balkan centres, and even in some quarters in Constantinople, that Austria-Hungary contemplates action in the Sanjak of Novibazar or is actually engaged in fomenting trouble is scouted in official and military quarters. It is not denied that, in certain eventualities, Austria-Hungary would be compelled to safeguard her interests, but it is pointed out with some plausibility that, if only for financial reasons, anything in the nature of a military campaign would be extremely unwelcome. Of the present condition of Austro-Turkish and Austro-Bulgarian relations little is known, although the former are believed to have been until quite recently more cordial than the latter. The mysterious fittings of King Ferdinand of Bulgaria may conceivably have contributed to increase the intimacy between Sofia and Vienna, but for the moment no substantial sign of such a development is perceptible. The illness of Count Aehrenthal naturally adds to the uncertainty of the outlook, but in estimating prospects it should not be forgotten that the Emperor Francis Joseph is likely to set his face against any scheme of wanton adventure.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 25th — Two batteries which were despatched to Tabriz in December have left for Russia.

The Civil and Military Gazette's correspondent at Shiraz writes under date 1st February — "In native circles the great subject of conversation is the coming visit of Lord Lamington for whose stay elaborate preparations are being talked of."

"The Persian idea appears to be that his lordship is coming in an official capacity to make full enquiries into the whole question of the Fars disputes and obtain the removal of the 39th Central India Horse whose presence is still causing some offence but against whom the boycott has ceased. No news has transpired as to what is being done by the British Government about the attack on the 39th Central India Horse and speculation is rife as to whether a punitive force will be sent or whether the British Government will content itself with a modest indemnity."

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 28th — The anti British boycott at Shiraz has ceased.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, February 5

Sardar Assad complains that he is the victim in the German Press of a calumny periodically brought against him that he desires to oust the Regent and to establish a Bakhtiari dynasty. He is also accused of betraying his country at an interview with M. Isvolsky in which he undertook to secure the acceptance of the Russian ultimatum. During a conversation to-day Sardar Assad begged me to give publicity to his assurance that he had never aimed at the Throne, and that the Bakhtiari were determined to return to their mountains as soon as any tolerable order had been restored.

I repeat the assurance the more readily as, although the story is always circulating, I before had occasion to point out that Sardar Assad himself had never done anything which could give credence to the report. His conduct on the abdication of the ex-Shah and on the death of the Regent was in itself sufficient contradiction. He stated that his interview with M. Isvolsky was solely in the interests of his country with a view to obtaining stable relations if possible with Russia.

The old chief's eyesight has unfortunately not benefited by his visit to Europe. He fears that blindness is rapidly approaching. "The specialist in Berlin," he told me, "forbade me sad thoughts, but all my thoughts are sad."

The question of compensation for the American officials seems finally settled to their satisfaction. Two of the American Generals, Mr. Merrill and Mr. Preuss, will remain with Anglo-Russian approval.

Teheran, February 6

The British and Russian Ministers to-night made the first portion of their expected communication. It states that Russia is willing, on condition that Persia will grant him a pension and his followers an amnesty, to inform the ex-Shah, through the Consul at Astrabad, that he must leave Persia. I understand that the communication has been most favourably received, and that Persia is ready to accord the ex-Shah half his original pension, which was 100,000 tomans (£16,666), and remove the ban upon Salard-Dowleh and Shams-Sultaneh and revoke the confiscation of their properties if they leave Persia.

It appears to have been thought advisable to make this communication immediately, owing to the intrigues now centring round the ex-Shah. The remainder of the new programme is nearly completed, and a further communication is therefore probable shortly relating to the loan and other measures to assist the Government.

Zia-ed-Dowleh, Deputy-Governor of Tabriz, shot himself to-day in the British Consulate, where he took bast (sanctuary) during the recent troubles.

Brussels, February 7

According to the Gazette, the Ministry of Finance has received a long telegram from M. Mornard, the new Treasurer-General of Persia, who is a Belgian, dilating upon the extraordinary disorder in which he found the Persian finances and denouncing "certain foreign machinations." M. Mornard, it is added, cites a number of grave facts and appeals to his compatriots to resist what he describes as the English Campaign. (Reuter.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, February 8

Persia, with the approval of Great Britain and Russia, has requested the services of eight additional Belgians for the Treasury, Mint and Customs services. The appointment of a Belgian staff for M. Mornard indicates an intention to confirm him in the office of Treasurer-General. The Belgians appear to be distressed by the charges of anti-English bias generally made against them in the English Press and M. Mornard has expressed to the British Minister the belief that his acts will speedily show his desire to preserve strict impartiality and to treat all parties fairly in the best interests of Persia.

St. Petersburg, February 8

The situation in Persia once more gives promise of better things, and the Russian troops are being gradually withdrawn from Tabriz and Kazvin. The whole Kazvin force will probably soon retire to Resht and thence to the Caucasus. Thanks to the friendly co-operation of Russia and Great Britain, the Treasury will shortly receive a loan of £400,000 and the ex-Shah Mohammed Ali will leave the country. The trouble which has arisen among the ex-Shah's Turcoman followers around Astrabad, necessitating the despatch of four companies of Turkestan Rifles, only increases Mohammed Ali's desire to seek the more favourable climate of Switzerland or France.

The assembling at Constantinople in the near future of a Turco-Persian Commission to settle the Urumiah frontier dispute, the apparent willingness of the Turks to avoid complications, and the readiness of both sides in case of disagreement to submit the question to The Hague Tribunal indicate a decrease of tension in one of the most difficult phases of the Persian crisis.

The rumour that a loan will be negotiated through a German or an American bank arouses some apprehension here lest alien influences should again embroil the situation.

An Interview with Mr. Shuster.

A REPRESENTATIVE of the New Post has had an interview with Mr. Morgan Shuster which he relates as follows —

So much has been written and read about the ex-Treasurer General that a few words of personal description will not be out of place. Young, tall, powerfully built, with coal-black eyes that sparkle incessantly, and determination written on his clean shaven face, Mr. Shuster impresses one as being a man born to lead, whether it be in Persia or elsewhere. He speaks bluntly, but not impulsively, to the point always, but only after having carefully weighed the significance of his words. I should imagine that he takes a delight in encountering obstacles for the sake of overcoming them. In his own words, he got on well with Persians who were eager to see their country regenerated, the others were not difficult to deal with. The only obstacles were Great Britain and Russia, and these, unfortunately for Persia, could not be overcome. The result is obvious. Mr. Shuster returns to America.

"Yes," he said in answer to my inquiry, "I am leaving for New York towards the end of the week. No, I shall not lecture, but I have promised to address some civic organisations on the Persian problem. I shall keep the public alive to the question," he added meditatively. "It may do some good. It is a frail reed to lean on, however."

Mr. Shuster is, as far as the future of Persia is concerned, openly, avowedly and incurably pessimistic. So are all acquainted with the situation. As it happens, The Near East publishes in its present issue a letter from its correspondent in Teheran which is decidedly gloomy.

"Every word of it is true," said Mr. Shuster, to whom I mentioned its contents. "What is more, I prophesied that a state of utter anarchy would arise as soon as the Mejliss was dissolved. The Cabinet has no authority, whether legal or moral, and can inspire neither respect nor confidence. It is a group of self-constituted directors—puppets, who can possibly rule over a country where they have no power."

"What, then, ought to be done now in order to improve matters?"

"I have often been asked that question, but have never been prepared to answer it. I will do so now. Either the two Powers must assume control of the government of the whole realm, and take over the responsibility for governing it in the eyes of the world, or they must reconstitute or permit or encourage the restitution of some form of government commanding the respect, confidence, and support of all. This latter can only be obtained by re-establishing the Mejliss."

"I know what you are going to say," he continued, "namely, that the Mejlis was of little use. There you are mistaken. The Mejlis was a most valuable body, so much so that Russia exerted herself to destroy it, because by so doing she destroyed the vitality, the national patriotic spirit of the Persians, and cleared the way for her own political and economic advance. The constitutional body was working for the financial regeneration of the country, it was able to hold in check and combat filibustering expeditions such as that led by the ex-Shah, and to put down provincial disturbances. It was a thorn in Russia's side, and it had to go."

"The Mejlis had to go because it was working well," continued Mr. Shuster, "not only was it a democratic institution dangerously near the Caucasus, but it was opposed to aggressive Russian policy in the Near East. Within ten years," came the cruel prophecy, "Russia will have reached the Persian Gulf, and there is an agreement, whereby Germany will have reached it also, and Baghdad Great Britain will not stop them. She might have done so."

"Nevertheless, we acquiesced in Russia's pretensions?"

"Precisely. And the more I study the whole development of the situation—here, in your quiet London, far from Persia—the less I am able to understand the motives which induced the Foreign Office to move Russia's pawns. I know of no argument, whether commercial, strategic, or moral, in support of the attitude taken by the Foreign Office. It is said that Great Britain acted thus in exchange for considerations elsewhere; if so, let it be known what material advantages or prestige have been gained. They have not been gained in Persia, nor among the Moslems of India who were used as buffers against Hindu agitators. Quite the contrary in Persia nothing has been gained from a strategic point of view, and as for commercial interests, ask your Manchester merchants what they have gained."

"No, there is absolutely no excuse for the policy pursued by the Foreign Office. It was neither moral nor successful, and in statesmanship every act, every policy must be either moral or successful. In this case Great Britain's policy was immoral and unsuccessful, and consequently there is no apology for it."

"But the integrity of Persia?"

"The partition is, practically speaking, a fait accompli."

"Are there no hopes?"

"However much I hate doing so," said Mr. Shuster, slowly, "I cannot help thinking that, unless Great Britain changes her attitude, Persia is doomed. Russia will it. When I see a man chased by another man who has a gleaming knife in his hand—however much one may regret that there are such people as criminals in the world—I must admit that one has every reason to believe that if the man with the knife catches the man who is running away, he will kill him."

"Is there any final message," I asked, "which you would like to give to the public before leaving for America?"

"You can state that I hope and believe that, with the additional light thrown upon recent events in Persia, British public opinion will bring about a change in the Government's policy towards Persia and towards Russia's demands as to what should be done in Persia."

"You can also point out the fact that the proposed Trans-Persian railway, if forced upon Persia by the Russians, backed by Persian guarantee,* will absolutely cripple Persia financially to the next one hundred years. For by no means could such a railway be expected to pay expenses within a shorter period, and in the meantime the guarantee, or the interest on the bonds, would have to be paid."

"In addition to this, if we may judge by other similar cases, Russian railroad construction materials would be forced on the Persian Government at inflated prices, at least for the entire portion of the railway lying within the so-called Russian sphere. Therefore even if the railway is only built as far as Isfahan, the advantage to Russian influence and selfish interests will be enormous, and, if built through to Basmir or to the Indian frontier, to the above would have to be added a most important strategic advantage for Russia."

"Then the railway can hardly be looked upon as an investment?"

"There can be no question about that. It would, most emphatically, not pay as an investment. Its raison d'être is purely political and strategic, and favours Russian policy only. Possibly," added Mr. Shuster with pointed sarcasm, "the fact that I did not favour the railroad is what the Times had in mind when it accused me of opposing British interests."

"One last question. Are there many concession-hunters in Persia?"

"The biggest concession-seeker in Persia," said the ex-Treasurer-General, slowly, "is the Russian Government. Not only does it seek concessions, but exacts that they should be granted. Therein lies one of the reasons of the dissolution of the Mejlis which was at times opposed to these concessions. Now that it has gone, Russia has a free hand."

Mr. Shuster and Persia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—Several friends of the Anglo-Russian understanding in this country are asking me, as the London representative of the best known organ of Russian public opinion, if I will not reply to Mr. Shuster's allegations against Russia in his speech of last Monday. I find they already received an answer in the remarks made on them in the London Press. Your leading article of Wednesday last contained a good deal of what I would otherwise have wished to say. I beg to express my fullest agreement with your estimation of the value of our Entente for both of our respective countries and of its decisive importance for the fate of Persia. I would further point at the significant fact of there not being in Russia any institution, political party, newspaper, individual statesman, or writer in favour of an annexation of the whole or part of Persia, of a protectorate, or of a permanent occupation. I am basing that statement not only on a total absence of public utterances in that sense, but also on the contents of my private correspondence with public men of different parties and positions in Russia. However else the Russian people may differ, and they widely differ, in many things, they are at one among themselves, as well as with the Russian Government, in the desire to maintain the independence and integrity of Persia. That unanimity is due to their conviction that, for many and grave reasons, Russia's interest demands the upholding of Persia in her present limits as an independent State. In asserting that I feel sure not to be contradicted from any authoritative quarter in Russia.

It is true that not a few people in Russia, as well as out of Russia, think Persian independence would have been better safeguarded under a traditional Asiatic Monarchy than under a Western regime for which the Persians, to say the least, are but little prepared. The Russian Government, however loyal to the spirit as well as to the letter of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, have done nothing to uphold the late Shah, which had been easy for them while he was on his Throne and which was not much less easy when he tried to recover it. It has, more than once, been acknowledged in the British Press that the presence of the Russian troops in Tabriz saved that city for the Constitutionalists, and even now the increase of their numbers in Northern Persia hinders rather than favours the success of the ex-Shah.

But the independence of the greatest World Power is limited by her treaties with other Powers and by the rightful interests of the latter. It is, therefore, natural that that of Persia should also be limited by the rights and interests of the two Empires between which she is situated. Persia's independence is further restricted, according to the testimony of so warm a friend of Persia as Mr. Shuster, by "a chaotic state of finances" as well as by "corruption and dishonesty of all kinds rampant in administrative services." Mr. Shuster even came to the conclusion that only "drastic and arbitrary control in fiscal matters" exercised by a foreigner "could save the situation." Great Britain and Russia are not claiming for their Governments the absolute power which had belonged to Mr. Shuster but in order to preserve an independent Persia, they must assist her Government to establish a minimum of order, which alone can ensure her existence as a State. Mr. Shuster strangely asks "why a little prosperity on the part of Persia should be feared by Europe." I am not aware of any country having such a fear, but as he shows he thinks Russia to be opposed to Persia becoming prosperous, I beg to describe that allegation as absolutely fallacious. Russia has, on the contrary, a manifest interest in seeing that country prosperous on account of the great development which would then receive the even now considerable Russian trade with her.

At the risk of appearing unduly optimistic I venture to say that information gathered from different reliable sources makes me hope to see already in a near future a serious improvement in the situation of Persia owing to a united Anglo-Russian assistance of her Government. I would feel quite certain of it if I did not know of the existence of parties in Persia, and of parties in Europe, hostile to the Anglo-Russian Entente and trying to break it, particularly by fomenting dissensions in the Persian question. The sincere pacifists and enthusiastic lovers of Persia would shudder if they realized whose and what objects they are unwittingly promoting. Should they succeed in creating an anti-Russian current in England which naturally would by repercussion produce an anti-English current in Russia, they would render a very bad service to the cause of peace and of balance of power, and moreover they would prepare a fatal blow to the existence of Persia.

But I have too firm a faith in the political wisdom, and particularly in the sense of proportion, of the British nation to admit the possibility of such a success. Least of all at the moment when I hear the echoes of the quite unprecedented spontaneous manifestations of the hearty feelings of the Russians of all classes and opinions towards Great Britain, and when I see them so fully appreciated by the people of this country

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

your obedient servant,

G. DE WESSILITSKY

Persia and the Ex-Shah.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES"

SIR,—We have read with some surprise the news telegraphed by your correspondent in Teheran to the effect that the British and Russian Ministers have signified to the Persian Government that Russia is willing to inform the ex-Shah that he must leave Persia on condition that Persia will grant him a pension and an amnesty to his followers

At the time of the "escape" of the ex-Shah from Russia the Governments of Great Britain and Russia informed the Persian Government that the ex-Shah had forfeited his claims to the pension granted under the Protocol of 1909. Since then the ex-Shah has involved the Persian Government in a very considerable expenditure of money in repelling his attacks and in inflicting upon him a decisive defeat. Since the delivery of the Russian ultimatums, the increase of the Russian troops, and the execution of prominent Persian-identified with the Constitutional movement, by Russian officers in Northern Persia, the activities of the ex-Shah and his brothers have been resumed and intrigues have been set on foot to fill important posts in the Government by adherents of the ex-Shah. Meanwhile the south of Persia has been denuded of its natural defenders for the purpose of combating the ex-Shah in the north, and the Persian Treasury has been emptied of the moneys which might otherwise have been expended in policing the southern trade routes. Under these circumstances it seems monstrous that the Persian Government should be required—for it amounts to that—by Great Britain and Russia to pay a pension to the ex-Shah. If it be true that our own Government have joined in this requisition they will have taken up ground which they will find it difficult to defend

Of course if the Persian Government of their own accord, having weighed all the circumstances, should desire to restore to the ex-Shah a portion of the pension which he has forfeited, that is the affair of the Persian Government and not of ours. Something, no doubt, may be said for this course, provided that the Persian Government can obtain definite and binding guarantees that he will never return to Persia. The guarantees of this nature already given by Great Britain and Russia under the Protocol of 1909 have been evaded. The only guarantee which might prevent a recurrence of past events is an undertaking by Great Britain and Russia, as signatories of the Protocol of 1909, that they will never recognize Mohammed Ali as Shah of Persia. The exchange of views between the British and Russian Governments on the subject of the ex-Shah, as explained to the House of Commons by Sir E. Grey on 14th December leaves the question of the future attitude of the two Powers towards the ex-Shah extremely vague and unsatisfactory. Since that time the Russian Government must surely have recognized that public opinion in England feels strongly on the Persian question. If it sets any store upon the friendship of the British nation it ought surely not to hesitate to join in a definite undertaking by our Government never to recognize Mohammed Ali. Such an act would reassure public opinion here and greatly relieve the situation in Persia

Yours, respectfully,

H. F. B. LYNCH

The Week.

The Coal Strike.

Although the papers are daily filled with columns of matter concerning the strike, discussion of Government intervention and conjectures respecting the duration of the strike, several important factors remain wholly obscure. One thing clear is that every miner in the three kingdoms numbering 1,065,000 has struck, and the sudden cessation of the coal supply is already producing dire consequences on some important industries. There is much distress among casual workers at the Docks and elsewhere. No particulars are available regarding actual stocks of coal on hand. Apparently railways and gas and electric companies are fairly supplied, but the wholesale curtailment of train services and warnings to consumers to be careful in the use of light suggest that the supply of coal is not excessive.

The general outlook varies daily, but everything appears to depend upon whether the miners insist on the acceptance of their schedule of the minimum wage. There is a general disposition, towards hopefulness, but there has hitherto been small justification for the belief that the miners will yield, except, perhaps, the increasing destitution and the pressure upon them by trades which are suffering.

South Pole.

Reuter wires from Hobart (Tasmania) on the 7th.—The explorer, Captain Amundsen, has arrived here. He is reticent of the subject of his experiences. Captain Amundsen has sold the copyright of his exploits to the Daily Chronicle. Hence he refuses to speak. The keenest interest is expressed as to the results because it is known that Amundsen hoped to forestall Scott, who is also returning and is expected to arrive at Stewart Island, New Zealand, at any moment.

The correspondent of the Daily Express telegraphs from Wellington that Captain Amundsen says that Captain Scott reached the South Pole.

China.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 1st.—Dissatisfied at not receiving their pay two thousand of Yuan-Shi-Kai's troops started looting the capital yesterday morning (Friday). Hordes of coolies and loafers swelled their ranks to five thousand and the orgy of destruction only ceased when the looters were exhausted early this morning. Seven incendiary fires, some of large area, were then burning in various quarters. A grim spectacle was presented by gangs of mutineers in the glare of flames, battering in shops and shooting and bayonetting shop keepers who did not promptly hand over their valuables and then staggering off laden with loot. In strong contrast were a detachment of Foreign troops marching unmolested through the crowds bringing in foreigners to the legations. Numbers of foreigners were fired at but not hurt.

Reuter wires from Washington.—Great Britain, Russia and Japan have sent favourable responses to Mr. Knox's note inviting joint action in China without seeking individual advantage. Austria, France and Italy have still not replied.

The delegates at Nanking have telegraphed to Liyuanheng to take the Republican Army to Peking and restore order. A meeting of foreign Ministers has been held partly as the result of the request of Tangshaoxi to prevent further bloodshed and damage to property. The Ministers decided to bring in all available troops in the adjacent ports. A thousand mixed troops will arrive tomorrow.

A detachment of artillery on the 2nd marched to the Duke of Kuei's palace and shelled the gate. They then looted the place and burned a portion of the palace. Civilians are arming themselves and harricading the premises. It has now been ascertained that the mutineers on Thursday looted the Foreign Office itself.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 2nd.—Martial Law is in operation and all is quiet in the vicinity of the Legations. Cannonading continues in the direction of Fengtai with which communication is cut off. The Legations are preparing for a siege.

Reuter wires from Tientsin on the 2nd.—Serious rioting broke out in Tientsin city last night. Whole streets were looted and burnt. One foreign doctor is reported to have been killed. Hundreds of arrests were made.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 2nd.—Yuan-Shi-Kai has sent a communique to the foreign residents, regretting the unexpected disturbances. He says that every precaution will be taken to prevent their recurrence.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 4th.—The population has been reassured by the presence of 3,000 Foreign troops. No further disturbances have taken place. A hundred looters have been executed, including six women, but no soldiers, the authorities fearing the effect upon their comrades.

Reuter wires from Tientsin on the 4th.—The rioting which broke out last night was of a most serious kind. Soldiers began looting and burning, and aided by the mob looted and gutted the shops and banks in all the important streets. No fewer than four teen fires were raging simultaneously. The pillagers broke into the Peiyang Mint and entering the silver store looted everything portable.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 5th :—Dr. Sun Yat Sen no longer insists on Yun-Shi-Kai coming to Nanking. On the contrary, the Government at Nanking will probably go to Peking to co-operate in the restoration of order. It is reported that bands of soldiers are looting everywhere in the interior.

A message to the Daily Telegraph from Peking states that a Manchu terrorist organisation has come into existence and is despatching emissaries to various centres to incite the soldiery to revolt. The message adds that it is expected that a new claimant to the throne will shortly raise a standard of revolt in the person of Chuchengyu, a descendant of the Ming dynasty.

The Times, Peking correspondent telegraphs that the British, French, American, German, Russian and Japanese banks have agreed to make a joint advance to Yuan-Shikai with a view to strengthening his authority. Half a million taels will be advanced now, half a million in ten days, and other amounts subsequently.

Suffragette Raid.

The Suffragettes indulged in a window smashing campaign over a wide area between Oxford Street and the Strand, together with several Government offices.

The Suffragettes, who were armed with hammers concealed in reticules, simultaneously assailed windows in the leading streets of the West End at the busiest time in the evening. The shopkeepers and police were surprised and had no time for defence. Damage was done to the extent of thousands of pounds. Mrs. Pankhurst motored to Mr. Asquith's residence and broke his windows with stones. One hundred and fifteen arrests were made.

Mrs. Pankhurst and other leaders of the Suffragette window smashing raid have in most cases been sentenced to two months' imprisonment. The police estimated the damage at over five thousand pounds. The prosecutor dwelt on the disgraceful scenes which occurred and emphasized that the time had come to inflict the maximum imprisonment. Cases in which the damage was over five pounds were sent to a higher court.

A Suffragette on the night of the 3rd ignited a pile of shavings saturated with petroleum in the doorway of the General Post Office. He was arrested. The damage done was of the lightest character. The Daily Mail says that the Suffragettes in Holloway jail rioted in the yard demanding to see Mrs. Pankhurst and singing the "Marseillaise." When they were removed to the cells they smashed all the windows.

The Suffragettes indulged in another window smashing campaign in Charing Cross district on the night of the 4th. The shopkeepers barricaded their shops. A violent demonstration is taking place in Parliament Square. Hitherto two hundred arrests have been made.

In the House of Commons a Member asked in view of window smashing, if Government would speedily pass a Bill making Suffragette organisations responsible for damage.

Mr. Asquith said that these disgraceful proceedings (Cheers) ought to be brought home not merely to wretched individuals but to those responsible for them. He entirely agreed with the Member but desired to consult the Attorney General before making a further statement.

The Suffragettes on the 4th raided in Knightsbridge and Kensington, smashing the windows of Harrod's, Parker's and other great establishments. They also broke right windows of the House of Lords, besides those of houses of Cabinet Ministers. Police, mounted and on foot, were powerless owing to the attacks being spread over a wide area. One Suffragette has been committed for trial on a charge of incendiarism.

The Mullah.

Reuter wires from Aden :—Owing to the report of the advance of the Mullah, 335 men and nine officers of the 18th Indian Infantry have sailed for Berbera.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Harcourt explained that the despatch of troops to Berbera was due to the Mullah having recently had an unusually successful skirmish with the Friendlies.

Morocco.

Reuter wires from Casablanca on the 2nd :—The French troops have been engaged in heavy fighting with the rebellious tribesmen at Sukelasha. Many dead were left on the field. The French casualties were six killed and thirty wounded.

Indian Students in England.

The first annual report of the Distressed Indian Students Aid Committee estimates that there are 1,700 Indian students in England, of whom one thousand are in London. The Committee urge that no youth be sent here unless his parents can provide at least ten thousand rupees to cover the cost without unduly crippling themselves, and it is wise to reckon on the possibility of the student needing much more. The report adds that the majority of the students are diligent and well-behaved, but there are too many cases where they had better not have been sent.

Resolutions passed at the All-India Moslem League.

The Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi proposed a resolution to the effect that H. H. the Aga Khan be elected President of the All-India Moslem League for the next term.

At the opening of the Second Day's proceedings the Secretary communicated to the meeting the news that His Highness the Aga Khan had intimated his desire to be the third of three Joint-Presidents of the League, but the Secretary stated that under the present rules it was impossible to have more Presidents than one, so His Highness was elected the only President.

Formal resolutions were passed thanking the King and Queen for the unique honour done to the people of India by the Imperial visit, lamenting the deaths of H. H. the Nizam, Moulvi Mohamed Aziz Mirza, and Syed Ali Bilgrami.

Khan Bahadur Allabuksh of Lahore moved a resolution, on behalf of the League, appreciating the munificence of the Hon. Haji Mohamed Ismail Khan of Backergunge, in making a princely donation towards Muhammadan education. Nawab Ghulam Ahmed Khan of Madras seconded the resolution.

Mr. Mohamed Ali moved a resolution appreciating the tough fight of the Africa Indians in protesting against the racial distinctions and praying that the Government might be pleased to remove those distinctions. Syed Zahur Ahmed of Lucknow seconded and Han Nur Mahomed Zakaria supported the motion.

The Hon. Mr. Shafi proposed a resolution respectfully urging the Government to take steps to put an end to the system of recruiting Indian labour under indenture. The Hon. Mr. Rafiuddin of Bombay seconded the resolution.

Mr. Samiulla Beg of Lucknow proposed a resolution, requesting the Government to reconsider the alteration in the age-limit at the competitive examination for the I. C. S. as it would prove detrimental to the interests of the Indian candidates. Khan Bahadur Ghulam Sadiq seconded the resolution.

Mr. Mahomed Ali proposed that the All-India Moslem League place on record its deep sense of regret and disappointment at the annulment of the partition of Bengal in utter disregard of Moslem feeling and trusts that Government will take early steps to safeguard Moslem interests in the Presidency of Bengal. Shaikh Zahur Ahmed seconded the resolution.

The Hon. Nawab Syed Nawab Ali Chowdhuri moved the following resolution :—That in view of the comparative backwardness of the people of Eastern Bengal and Assam in the matter of higher education, the All-India Moslem League heartily welcomes the scheme for the constitution of a teaching and residential University at Dacca, and urge on the Government the desirability of extending the operations of the proposed University over the districts of Dacca, Rajshahi and Chittagang divisions, so far at least as the general control and supervision of the educational institutions in those areas and the prescription of the curricula of studies and the examinations are concerned. "That the League begs to accord its hearty support to the proposal for appointment of a special education officer for Eastern Bengal and begs to urge the necessity of vesting him with full powers of initiative and control, independent of the Director of Public Instruction at Calcutta and with adequate funds at his disposal." "That with a view to induce the Mussalman community to avail themselves more fully of the benefits of education and to prevent a setback in the remarkable progress in education made by the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal and Assam during recent years, the All-India Moslem League begs to urge the desirability of continuing in Eastern Bengal and Assam the facilities already granted to them and giving full and immediate effect to the recommendations of the Education Commission of 1912 in this behalf." The Hon. Mr. Wasi Ahmed seconded the resolution.

The Hon. Mr. Wasi Ahmed moved the following resolution :—"That the All-India Moslem League respectfully reiterates its prayer that the Government may be pleased to institute a thorough inquiry into the general purposes and manner of administration of existing Mussalman endowments designed mainly for the public benefit. Khan Bahadur Shaikh Ghulam Sadiq seconded the resolution.

Syed Sultan Ahmed moved the following resolution :—"The All-India Moslem League strongly urges upon the Government of India that Indians be appointed in the higher branches of the public service in larger numbers as a corollary to the reforms recently introduced and in fulfilment of solemn pledges repeatedly reiterated. The League also hopes that in view of the necessity and importance of each community being duly represented in the administration and with a view to secure efficiency in the Public service, the Government will lay down an irreducible minimum of educational qualification and will give the Mussalmans possessing the minimum qualifications their just and rightful share in the appointments." Mr. Shaikh Zahur Ahmed seconded the motion.

Mr. Mirza Samiulla Beg moved the following resolution :—"That the All-India Moslem League accepts in the main the principles of Mr. Gokhale's Elementary Education Bill, but is of opinion that Elementary Education should also be made free and that Moslem interests should be adequately safeguarded." The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque seconded and the Hon. Mr. Shafi opposed the resolution.

Mr. Zahur Ahmed moved the following resolution.—"That the All-India Moslem League earnestly hopes that now that the highest offices in the State have been thrown open to Indians, Government should give them greater share in the defence of their country by appointing qualified Indians to the higher posts in the British Army to which Europeans are now eligible. Mr. Mahomed Ali seconded.

Mr. Ghulam Husain moved the next resolution, expressing the League's sympathy with the people of Persia and urging the British Government to get Russia to adhere to the spirit of the Anglo-Russian Convention. Mr. Samiulla Beg seconded the resolution.

Mr. Abdul Aziz proposed a resolution saying that the provisions of the new Regulation adopted by the Council of legal education for the admission of Indian students into the Inns of Court, respecting the certificates of good character were harsh and must result in the exclusion of a considerable number of good and worthy Indian students. The Hon. Wasi Ahmed seconded the resolution.

The Hon. Mr. Shafi moved a resolution to the effect that the League expressed deep abhorrence of the raid of Italy on the Tripolitan Coast and hoped that the European Powers would not fail to force Italy to recognise Turkish sovereignty. The Hon. Nawab Saarfaz Husain seconded the resolution.

The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque moved that the U. P. and the Punjab be granted the same privileges to which they are equally entitled as Behar, in view of the formation of an Executive Council in Behar. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Maqbul Ahmed.

The Hon. Moulvie Rafiuddin proposed that the League urged a provision for the adequate communal representation of the Muhaimadans on the District Boards and the Municipalities.

The meeting adopted a resolution agreeing with Mr. Jinnah's Bill re Waqf-alal-aulad, urging upon the Government the desirability of its being passed into law.

TETE A TETE

WE HEAR with satisfaction of the appointment of Mr. J. M. Mitra of the Provincial Civil Service as the Registrar of Co-operative Credit Societies in Bengal. Such appointments are usually the monopoly of the Indian Civil Service and we believe the post generally went to a junior Collector. It is a hopeful sign of the times that an Indian is appointed to such a post. We have no doubt that all communities would press the appointment of more Indians to such posts if reasonable assurances were given that an Indian appointed to high office would treat all communities alike and deal fairly with all interests. Such assurances can better be given by the actions of five men than the words of a hundred and we trust Mr. Mitra, whose community has scored a great political triumph in the annulment of the Partition, would show by his conduct that so far as he is concerned no differences exist in official matters between victor and vanquished, between the triumphant and the depressed. In Eastern Bengal the Mussalman ryots and artisans are both pressed heavily by the yoke of the creditor and if a Hindu officer can help to lift this burden, even to a small extent, and make Mussalmans more self-reliant and economically independent, he would redeem Indian character far more than a dozen speeches from the Congress platform.

IT APPEARS from H. R. the Commander-in-Chief's reply to a question put by the Hon. Mr. S. Sinha that the notification in the Punjab Gazette announcing a "public" examination for admission to the Assistant Surgeon Branch of the Indian Subordinate Medical Department at which "only Europeans and Eurasians will be allowed to appear," has been published periodically in the Gazettes and Press for several years. The reason for disallowing His Majesty's Indian subjects is that "the chief duty of Military Assistant Surgeons is the care of British soldiers in European Special Hospitals—a duty upon which it is not customary to employ His Majesty's Indian subjects." The curing of bodies, perhaps, stands on a higher plane, but, as we remember aright, it was an Asiatic who came to the world with the divine message of Christianity for curing the souls of men. That "custom" has, however, now grown somewhat obsolete, and the colour of the skin more than the skill of the curer is the "customary" qualification to-day. We do not know in reply to what question His Excellency said that "Indians are eligible for the Military Sub-Assistant Surgeon Branch of the I. S. M. D., which performs similar duties in connexion with Indian troops." Relevant or not, the reply is significant. If official designations are not meaningless, we should think the Sub-Assistants had rather a worse time of it than the Assistants; but in any case we write subject to correction. Now, the point of Mr. Sinha's question was the invidiousness of the distinction, and His Excellency's reply has only emphasised it. What is worse, as Indians are not even permitted to compete for these posts, we have not even the fair fiction of efficiency to justify their exclusion from Military Assistant Surgeonships. We wonder whether the victims of the Military Assistant Surgeons' surgical skill, who may be presumed to resent being cured by a doctor just a shade darker, also resent being buried in graves dug by sable grave-diggers. It is mere curiosity that suggests the question. Will Mr. Sinha please ask it for us?

AS IF the disabilities of Indians in the matter of higher appointments were few, there is on top of them all the invidious distinction, that while "temporary promotions" to another class of grade in the same service are made in the Indian Civil Service and the higher ranks of the Police which are the close preserves of Europeans and Eurasians, no such acting allowances are given to the members of the Provincial Service in respect of appointments ordinarily held by them. Thus practically more than half the officers in the I. C. S. and in the higher ranks of the Police receive large acting allowances in addition to the salaries of their permanent posts, the numbers drawing such allowances on 1st January, 1912, being 610 in the I. C. S. and 338 in the Police. When the matter was brought to the notice of the Government in the Imperial Council, and it was suggested that the rules should be assimilated for both the classes of services, Government refused to entertain such a request, and in stating their reasons for the refusal explained that "the reason for the differential treatment of the Provincial Services on the one hand and, for instance, the Indian Civil Service, on the other, is that the latter was originally organised on a system of substantive promotion in furlough vacancies. In 1868 this procedure was changed, and an officer proceeding on furlough retained a lien on his grade appointment. As a partial compensation to his locum tenens for the loss of substantive promotion, what is known as an officiating allowance was given to him, and this is doubtless the 'temporary promotion' referred to. These considerations never applied to the case of the Provincial Services, to which the system of officiating promotion has not been extended. In view of the origin of the existing difference, as explained, it is not considered necessary to introduce a uniform treatment of these Services in this respect." For our part, we fail to understand this "reason for the differential treatment," and we doubt if many others understand it either. We are, however, certain that Sir Reginald Craddock will hopelessly fail to satisfy the very estimable Provincial Service men whom he rightly praised only the other day. Praise is not payment, and the Service which gets so little in the way of permanent pay will not be contented with empty praise as a substitute for well-deserved acting allowances. It is distinctions of this nature and the absence of opportunities that make Provincial Service a patch among the services. Whatever justification there may be for such differential treatment in the general administration, Government are now committed to an equality of status in the case of Deputy Superintendents of Police and Assistant Superintendents. It is some consolation to think that the status and functions of the former are engaging the attention of the Government of India. We published correspondence on this subject some time ago and await the result of the Government's deliberation with interest.

ALTHOUGH the Hon'ble the Home Member could make no pronouncement with regard to the Hon. Mr. Subba Rao's question about the inquiry promised with reference to his Resolution on the Public Service, we trust the rumour is unfounded that Government intends to carry out the recommendations of the Public Service Commission even now only so far as to give to Indians a sixth of the total number of posts held by Europeans in each department and not a sixth in each grade. Why should not some member of Council put a direct question suggesting that such a redemption of an old promise would not allay discontent of the Indians in the Services? We would remind the Government of the significance of the Hon. Sir P. F. Wynne's reply to Mr. Bann's query that in showing the share of Indians in the employ of the Railway the coolies had also been included. Our artist had well illustrated this admission by showing the congestion in the third class carriages and the luxurious privacy of the first class "reserved for Euro—for Europeans only." If a promise is to be redeemed, the redemption need not be as partial as it is tardy.

LORD MORLEY had taken a wise step in 1908 in indicating that he was not content to see India remain for ever the land of the services as against the professions, and he had rightly begun with medical relief which no longer needed the monopoly of the Indian Medical Service and could gradually be left to private practitioners. But we are in 1912 now, and the Hon. Mr. Gokhale has still to ask whether anything has been done in this direction. The Hon. the Home Member could not have expected to make matters clearer by referring to the reply given to the Hon. Mr. Gokhale on 18th March 1912, or to Mr. Malaviya on 7th March 1911. But he has certainly helped us to understand that in 1913 he may have to refer in reply to a similar question to the answer he gave Mr. Gokhale on the 20th February 1912, and that perhaps his successor in 1918 would have to quote a similar reply of his dated February or March 1917. Patience is a virtue and its development should be enforced by a paternal Government. After all, the matter is serious and needs careful consideration. Had it been merely a modification of the Partition or the transfer of the Capital, there would obviously have been no need for delay.

WHENEVER the Mussalmans complain of the paucity of their co-religionists in Government service the reply volunteered by the leaders of the Hindu community is that it is of the utmost importance in the interest of the Administration that selected candidates for employment should be as efficient as possible, and that it is because the best qualified candidates have hitherto only been found among Hindus that these posts have till now been filled from that community. We wonder whether those who volunteer such answers to Moslem claims are apt pupils or effective teachers of the bureaucracy that rules us, for here is Sir Reginald Craddock's reply to Mr. Gokhale's questions whether there is any legal bar to the appointment of medical men outside the ranks of the Indian Medical Service to Senior Clinical Chairs in the Calcutta and Madras Medical Colleges, and if not, why no such appointments have been made hitherto. Sir Reginald Craddock stated in reply that, "It is of the utmost importance in the future interests of the medical profession in India that the instruction imparted to medical students should be as efficient as possible, and it is because the best qualified Professors have hitherto only been found among the members of the Indian Medical Service that these posts till now have been filled from that Service." We trust Mr. Gokhale is convinced and that the Mussalmans would be convinced equally well in future.

ON the strength of a statement made by a prominent member of the Moslem University Constitution Committee, our local vernacular contemporary, the Mohammadi, published that Government did not intend to permit the affiliation of colleges and schools outside Aligarh to the Moslem University, and naturally expressed great alarm. As a matter of fact the Government has announced no such conclusion, and the only basis for this rumour is, that Government was at first doubtful whether affiliated institutions outside Aligarh would be conducted on the same lines and as efficiently as the central institution, and considered the proposal to affiliate outside colleges and schools to be unsupported by the writings of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan himself. But it was explained by the members of the Constitution Committee that, both in the interests of the Mussalmans and the Government, it was desirable to extend the influence of Aligarh which was admittedly beneficial to every part of India, and that affiliation would be the principal means adopted, so to speak, by the Aligarh Extension Movement. But affiliation would be governed by the all-important conditions that only residential institutions would be eligible for affiliation, and that it would depend on their attaining a degree of efficiency consistent with the status of the University. As a further safeguard, it was arranged that affiliation shall be subject to the Viceroy's approval as Chancellor. So far as members of the Constitution Committee know there is no reason to believe that Government will not agree to affiliation in spite of such effective safeguards. As a matter of fact if the teaching and residential University at Dacca is to have colleges all over Eastern Bengal under its control and supervision, there is every reason to believe that the Moslem University at Aligarh will have the control and supervision of Moslem colleges and schools conducted on Aligarh lines and deemed worthy of affiliation both by the Chancellor and the Court of the University. It is unfortunate that such a statement as the Mohammadi published should have been inadvertently made. But we hope the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler would soon hold another Conference like the one at Simla and announce the final views of the Government of India and the Secretary of State on all points. We heartily wished that Government would see its way to introduce the Moslem University Bill this session, holding up the coming into force of the Act till such time as the balance of 8 or 9 lakhs was forthcoming and the Regulations were approved by the Chancellor. For unknown reasons, Government have not deemed fit to do so and rumours are more likely to grow than subside. But those who are in the know have no reason to believe that the Government would disagree in any material particular with the members of the Constitution Committee. Only, their knowledge cannot always be published, and we have been driven to offer this explanation simply by the growing danger of rumours based on slender foundations. All this would be needless if the veil was lifted by the Government, and we trust the Hon. the Education Member will be the reverse of anxious to help the multiplication of such rumours by the inaction and silence of Government.

ALTHOUGH we shall be the last to judge the merits of any question merely or, in some cases, even mainly, from the numbers advocating a cause, we must confess the statement asked for by the Hon. Mr. Dababhoj, showing year by year the number of marriages registered under Act III of 1872, and supplied by the Hon. the Home Member, not only supplies

Unions under the Indian Civil Marriage Act and supplied by the Hon. the Home Member, not only supplies

very interesting information, but also a world of comment on the grandiloquent advocacy of the Hon Mr Basu and his supporters. In the 40 years since 1872, when the new law was passed, only 1,014 marriages have been solemnized under the Act. This gives an average of 25 such unions every year, no less than 22 of which fell to the share of Bengal. Madras comes a poor second with only 54 such unions against the 886 of Bengal, and Bombay secures a place with 50. Among the "Also rans" is the Punjab with 20, Burma with 2, and the United and the Central Provinces limp in with one apiece. In the very first year after the passage of the Bill two marriages took place, but the honour did not fall to the lot of Bengal, Bombay and Madras dividing it between them. Five years later the number suddenly ran into two figures, as Bengal celebrated 13 such unions. But there was a falling off after this unlucky number in 1877, and a recovery was recorded only after 1884. However, the average of the first 20 years was less than 11, and the highest number recorded was 25 in 1890. The next 20 years show an average of 40, the record figure being 57 in the year 1908. There has been a slight falling off since then, the number in 1910 being 43, which was the lowest on record since 1903. But Mr. Basu's Bill was evidently a good advertisement of the existing law and 49 marriages were recorded in 1911. It may perhaps please Mr. Dadabhai to know that in that year the Central Provinces recorded its only marriage under the Act, but his joy would probably be more than counterbalanced by the grief of Mr. Malaviya, for in the same year was celebrated the solitary marriage that falls to the share of the United Provinces. If marriages under the Act are evidence of enlightenment, it would seem that light still comes from the East. But the West has not been without it, nor has Madras remained wholly benighted. However the light of Bombay, though dull, has been steady, for its 50 marriages were spread over 27 different years, while that of Madras flickered, as the 54 unions of the Southern Presidency were contracted only in 17 different years. The North alone was dark, even if true and tender, and would have remained so were it not for the Land of Five Rivers—and unnumbered faddists. In 1885, the Punjab entered the comit of nations with no less than three marriages and its 20 marriages have been spread over 16 different years. We reiterate our general conviction that numbers are not always a satisfactory test of anything, but we must say at the same time that those supplied by the Home Member are a significant comment on the eloquence of Mr. Basu. Out of the several hundred millions of Indians no more than 2,028 availed themselves of the provisions of the Act in the last 40 years, and perhaps in every case the parties were Brahmins. How many of these, we wonder, found the declaration unnecessary, and why, and what evidence is there that a considerable portion of them desire to remain within the pale of Hinduism while contracting a union unauthorised by Hindu law? It may be that there are members of other communities who would like to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act. Hitherto of the 2,028 persons who married under the Act, 1,728 were of Hindu, 24 of European, and 2 of Muhammadan origin: uncertainty existing about the remaining 274. It appears that the English Civil Marriage Act can be availed of even now by such of the "advanced" couples as are prepared to rush to so distant a Cretina Green. But we do not know of any that have done so. Is there any reason to believe that if Mr. Basu's Bill had become law, many more would have availed themselves of it? The Mussalmans have perhaps been "adequately and effectively" represented by the brace that have already married under the Act and these were converts to Brahminism. But as the Maharajahdhiraj of Burdwan puts it, a handful of low-risk youths may have claimed shelter under the wings of Mr. Basu for alliances more indiscreet than romantic, and some "reformers" may look back upon the 40 years that have intervened between the Act of 1872 and the new Bill and may sorrowfully sigh for the lost opportunity. Even those, however, for whom the opportunity still exists, are as a rule too swift winged in their "reform" to wait for such silly conventions as marriage. It is part of their reforming creed to believe that marriage is a failure. It is time that Mr. Basu advertised for such as could declare on oath that if his Bill became law they would marry forthwith under it, so that he could enrol an army of the Civil Marriers. The list would be interesting reading, specially if the names of the partners were also given.

WHEN appointments of what are called Statutory Civilians were first made, it was thought that to some extent at least the inequalities and deficiencies of the Indian Civil Service would be removed. That hope has, however, proved delusive, and to day, although there are no less than 64 Statutory Civilians in India, only two have been appointed to officiate as Divisional Commissioners, and not one has been thought fit for promotion to the High Court or Chief Court or even to the post of Judicial Commissioner. The Punjab with eight Statutory Civilians, and the Central Provinces with only two have fared better than Bengal with 17, the United Provinces with 16, Bombay with 11, and Madras with 9. We are told that there is no legal barrier to such promotions. Of course, there are no legal barriers, but the illegal ones are a legion, and they are excellently covered by the explanation that "appointments to such posts are made strictly by selection," and the inference that of the 64 all but two are not "thought to be fully qualified." Those who have read Kipling's Departmental Duties would no doubt appreciate at its full value the impartial character of appointments "made strictly by selection." Fortunately or unfortunately, Indians have not availed themselves even of those semi-demi-official means of success which made Potiphar Gubbins, C.E., the power he was, and forced a brother officer to "muse in his bed on the reason that led to the hoisting of Potiphar G." Hon vot qui mal y pense

WHEN Indians are denied Commissions in the Army, and the Arms Act exists to emasculate a once virile population, there is no wonder that H.E. the Commander-in-Chief deems it unnecessary to include a non-official Indian "to consider military policy, administration and expenditure in India." But we ask what harm would such an Indian have done if one had been appointed on the Committee? Is "military policy" still too sacred for Indians simply because some of the sepoys had revolted 55 years ago? Or is it that "military expenditure" is still on too lavish a scale to bear the scrutiny of a non-official Indian? At any rate, why all this parade about the terms of reference? The Hon Mr. Mudholkar should have asked a supplementary question, and at any rate should give notice of another asking that a copy of the detailed terms of reference should be laid on the table of the Council.

WHILE India owes a great deal to the builders of her railways and those that have harnessed her mighty rivers, she cannot find it in her heart to forgive those unesthetic Engineers whose handiwork in buildings combines the minimum of art with the maximum of waste. What awful eyesores are those huge godowns that the P.W.D. construct and call palaces. If the construction of another Imperial Delhi forces upon the Government the desirability of employing Indian carvers and other workers in the decorative arts, without whose aid the new Delhi would only provide a foil for the many Delhis of the past of which we see glimpses even to-day, then even some of our local contemporaries perhaps would find something to admire in the transfer of the Capital from this city of brick and lime godowns. The Indian artist even more than the Indian artisan is available at a small wage and it is amusing to be assured that Indian Art would be encouraged by the P.W.D. "with a due regard to economy in the expenditure of public funds." The P.W.D. and economy in the expenditure of public funds! The juxtaposition is delightful. We, however, hope that Sir Robert Carlyle, who has such an excellent adviser in the matter of the revival of Indian Art in Lady Carlyle, would redeem the promise to the full. May we suggest the formation of a Delhi Society, under the patronage of His Excellency the Viceroy, for the revival of the arts and handicrafts of Delhi, as well as the preservation of historical and archeological monuments too apt to be forgotten and destroyed in the hurry and bustle of new construction?

AS we go to Press, H.H. the Aga Khan wires to us saying that the Trustees of the late Mir Wadia of Bombay have given Rs. 25,000 for the University and Fresh Moslem University. It must be remembered that H.H. the late Nawab Saheb of Junagadh had died shortly after having promised a large donation to the University. The Junagadh Administrator who is the Regent for the minor Nawab Saheb wires that not less than a lakh would be paid by the State even now, and it is expected that possibly two lakhs may be given. The Trustees of the late Saboo Siddiq Seth were approached with a request to found a Chair of Moslem Theology at Aligarh in memory of the deceased, and it is hoped the result would be successful. An anonymous donor of Bombay has already paid half a lakh for a Hostel. But what would settle all questions and set every rumour and doubt at rest is that His Highness the Nizam has been approached with the humble request that the grant of Rs. 24,000 a year to the Collage from the Hyderabad State be raised to half a lakh a year, and a very hopeful reply has been received from H.E. the Minister. Definite orders are hourly expected and we are confident that they will be such as would make the 70 million Mussalmans of India eternally grateful to Mir Osman Ali Khan. Had Mir Mahboob Ali Khan lived, he may have completed the pile of the University, but

اگر پدر نتوان کن پسر تمام کند

(If the father could not finish it, the son does it.) The late Nizam had really laid the foundation-stone of the University, but the coping-stone would be put by the present Asaf Jah

حر اسکی ابتدا وہ ہے تو اسکی انتہا تم ہو

(If he was the beginning, you are the end.) With the increased grant, the Mussalmans would secure more than the required 35 lakhs. May we not hope that they would secure the University also at a special session of the Council early this summer at Simla?

The Comrade.

The Moslem League.

WHEN it became known that the 'All-India Moslem League' could not hold its annual session during the Durbar holidays, and that the coincidence of the Ashura and Christmas made the usual date out of the question, it was generally felt that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to hold a successful session this year. But the announcements at the Durbar made it imperative for the leading Mussalmans to meet together, and apart from the need of an expression of communal opinion on the recent changes, it was necessary to take stock of the situation and formulate the lines of policy on which the League should work in future after its first eventful quinquennium. Even before the announcement, the ardent spirits of Calcutta had ventured to undertake an invitation to the League, for Calcutta was then the capital of India, and it would not have been in the fitness of things if an institution of such importance and influence had for long remained unfamiliar at the seat of the Imperial Government. But if the announcement deprived Calcutta of that privilege, it made the situation of Bengal all the more pressing on the attention of Indian Mussalmans, and an organisation which had followed close on the heels of the Partition could not well keep itself away from Bengal when that Partition was annulled. But the date selected, although the only possible time, were not wholly convenient. A succession of sad events, such as the indisposition of H.H. the Aga Khan, his express desire, after two successive terms of office, of giving to some other leading Mussalman an opportunity of guiding the deliberations of his co-religionists, and, finally, the tragic and sudden death of Mr Aziz Mirza, the capable Secretary of the League, combined to promise a very poor session on the 3rd and 4th instant. But in spite of all these drawbacks and difficulties the session has been a great success, and its deliberations, with their occasional differences of opinion and reasonable compromises, have given evidence of just that vitality which is the best asset of a political body.

The speech of Khan Bahadur Maulvi Hadriddin Hyder Sahab, the Chairman of the Reception Committee, who opened the proceedings, went over practically all the important questions which are at present engaging the attention of Indian Mussalmans. While discussing purely Indian questions with great moderation and in an optimistic spirit and referring to the incalculable benefits of the Royal Viceroy—on which the League enthusiastically passed a Resolution of its grateful thanks—Mr Hadriddin Hyder did not fail to take note of the fact that "the Moslem community all over the world is passing through very stirring times." He said, "Coming events are casting their shadows before them; and the whole Moslem world waits on the tip-toe of expectation to see what the womb of futurity has in store for us." He mentioned the Italian raid on Tripoli, but while he naturally felt that the so-called war should be brought to an end as soon as possible, the League was careful enough to express a hope that European Powers would not intervene in order to force Turkey to accept in an integral portion of the Turkish Empire and in the heart of Moslem Africa the sovereignty of a Power that has disgraced Christendom not only with her un-Christian raid and unparalleled brutality but also with an unshamed cowardice that has deepened the stain of Adowa.

In the matter of the aggressive attitude of Russia in Persia the speaker's words are significant. He said—

The political situation in Persia is also a matter of grave concern to the whole Moslem world. Here, again, we have a superior power trying to bully a weaker constitution and seeking to establish an utterly unjust claim by the primitive and highly objectionable rule of "Might is Right." How far Britain has involved herself intricately in this mesh of international relations we are not in a position to judge. But rightly or wrongly the idea has of late been gaining ground that the part taken by Britain in this transaction has not been wholly in consonance with the idea which we entertain of British Justice.

We presume Sir Edward Grey is even more ignorant about India than he is about the continent of Europe, but we trust that those whose duty it is to keep the British Cabinet well informed about the feelings and opinions of Indian Mussalmans would not fail to impress upon him the fact that these are words coming from a responsible gentleman of considerable influence in Bengal whose temperament and whole career make it impossible for him to do injustice to the actions of Government. The temperate and reasoned speech of Mr Ghulam Husain, B.A. (Alig.) was a model of clear cold analysis of facts when he moved the following resolution:—

The All-India Moslem League places on record its deep sympathy with the people of Persia, who are connected with the Indian Mussalmans by the closest ties of blood, religion and a common culture, in their unmerited sufferings in their noble efforts to save their unfortunate country from Russian encroachments, and while trusting that the British Government is fully alive to the grave consequence likely to result from the dismemberment of Persia, respectfully urges upon the Imperial Government to get Russia to adhere to the spirit of the Anglo-Russian Convention and more effectively ensure the integrity and independent development of the country.

It is more than we can say whether Mr. Ghulam Husain's interpretation of the Convention would commend itself to Sir Edward Grey who has made it a sort of Amin Chand's treaty, with this difference, however, that while Clive outwitted a traitor for the benefit of his own employers, Sir Edward has brought Persia face to face with the loss of independence for the benefit of the traditional foe of Great Britain and with every chance of trouble for his country and our own.

The Presidential address of the Hon. Nawab Khwaja Sir Salimullah Bahadur, G.C.I.E., K.C.S.I., was an outspoken utterance with a few of the faults and most of the virtues of such utterances. Naturally the Nawab Bahadur devoted considerable space in his address to the annulment of the Partition, but it was not disproportionate. In view of the sensational attack of the Bengalee on this part of the address we deal with the whole subject elsewhere.

On the subject of education the Nawab Bahadur's remarks would be read with genuine pleasure by an overwhelming majority of our countrymen of all classes and communities. He said—

The magnificent grant of fifty lakhs for the advancement of education comes very opportunely at a time when the ferment of new ideas in the East has led to a great Educational Renaissance in India, and to an eager craving for education amongst all the various sections of the community. The spread of education in all its branches has been one of the inestimable blessings of British rule in India, and anything that serves to foster education is a real boon to the people. It appears to me that the immediate effects of this Renaissance are to be seen, among others, in the momentous movements for the two great Universities at Aligarh and Benares, and the eager enthusiasm with which the country as a whole has welcomed Mr. Gokhale's Bill. The question of a system of free primary education for the masses has been agitating the minds of the leaders of Indian thought for some time. In my opinion the Hon. Mr. Gokhale has rendered a signal service to the future of primary education in this country by the elaborate scheme he has worked out and which he has so ably formulated in his Bill. I feel it my duty to accord my whole hearted sympathy to the principle of Mr. Gokhale's Bill, for I feel convinced that unless some action is taken in the way suggested by Mr. Gokhale, the cause of primary education will continue to be relegated to the cold shade of neglect. The apathy with which we have hitherto allowed our masses to pass their days in dense ignorance and superstition appears to me to be almost a crime. All the efforts that have been made in this country towards the advancement of education have hitherto been confined mostly to the cause of higher education. It is time that this apathy to the cause of primary education should be removed. That this primary education should be free is, perhaps, universally accepted, but in order that any scheme for this sort of education may be effective, it should also be to a certain extent compulsory. There can be no hardships in compulsion as is sometimes argued, provided there are reasonable safeguards just as is provided for in Mr. Gokhale's Bill. But instead of wasting time over endless discussions as to the details of the working of the Bill, I think that a beginning should be made as early as possible. With the inauguration of a system of free primary education I can look forward to an era of prosperity and progress for the unarticulate masses whose interests should always be our most sacred charge.

It is gratifying to note that following the lead of the All-India and Bengal Provincial Muhammadan Educational Conferences and several Muhammadan meetings, notably one held at Lahore under the presidency of Dr. Md. Iqbal, the All India Moslem League passed a resolution in the session supporting the principles of Mr. Gokhale's Bill and asking for necessary safeguards for Moslem educational interests. Such unanimity is rare indeed, and we appeal to Government not to estimate it lightly.

The Nawab Bahadur dealt also with the movements for the two sister universities, and repudiated the charge "that they will hinder the diffusion of new and enlightened ideas, and that they will perpetuate the line of cleavage, accentuate the differences, and widen the gulf between the two communities." He said—

These apprehensions arise from an ignorance of the wealth of knowledge, culture and civilization which lie hidden in the neglected mines of Oriental learning. Nor do I believe that there cannot be any real unity between the youths of the two great communities unless they are prepared to forego partially at least, their own respective ideals in order to develop a hybrid nationality and meet on the common ground afforded by the diffusion of an alien culture and civilization. It is such are the tremendous sacrifices that have to be made, even for so desirable an object as a real rapprochement between the two communities, that for one would not purchase even so valuable a commodity at so high a price. Happily these alarms are without foundation.

His remarks on the Dacca University, however, are more topical and would be read with keen interest. A vein of pained sarcasm seems to run through them. He said:—

We, the Mussalmans of East Bengal, welcome the University, not because it is meant for our exclusive benefit or to injure the interests of our Hindu brethren, but because we feel convinced that a teaching and residential University in an area which has shown itself so susceptible of educational improvement, would give an impulse to the cause of education in the Eastern Bengal Districts which would easily place them in the van of educational progress in India. No doubt, any benefit to East Bengal means necessarily a benefit to that section of the population, numbering 20 millions, who happen to be Mussalmans, but this is a contingency which cannot be avoided. We cannot cease to be a part and parcel of the population of that part of the country simply to please the fancy of a set of politicians who eternally penalize the whole of Eastern Bengal for the sin of having harbored so large a Mussalman majority. But while we welcome the scheme of the University and the appointment of a Special Officer, I am strongly of opinion that the Mussalman community would not derive any appreciable benefits, unless sufficient funds are allotted for the exclusive advancement of Mussalman education. Ours is a proverbially poor Community and the leaders of the Hindu Deputation, as well as the Viceroy, have admitted that it will be necessary to give some special facilities to Mussalmans. With sufficient funds at our disposal, it will only remain to work out matters of detail as to how our community in East Bengal can best be helped to take the fullest advantages of a residential and teaching University in their midst.

It was in the same strain that the Resolutions of the League welcoming the announcement made at Dacca by H. E. the Viceroy were worded. We may add that is just the view we ourselves have taken of the matter.

The Nawab Bahadur also repeated the request of the Mussalmans, submitted more than once through the various educational conferences, that more Mussalman teachers and inspecting officers should be appointed. It is worth while quoting the views of the Nawab Bahadur and others who support his contention, because even what little the Government have promised to do in Eastern Bengal has been declared by the Bengalee and some of the leading Hindus of Bengal to be "a more mischievous form of partition which will inaugurate an educational and intellectual cleavage." He said.—

There is hardly anything, either in the curriculum of studies or in the personnel of the institutions, which can inspire Mussalman parents with confidence as to the spiritual upbringing of the students. "Is it any object for wonder," says Mr. L. C. Bailey, "that they (Mussalmans) hold aloof from a system which, however good in itself, made no concession to their prejudices, made, in fact, no provision for what they esteemed their necessities, and which was in its nature unavoidably antagonistic to their interests and at variance with their social traditions?" The language of our Government schools, says Sir William Hunter, "in Lower Bengal is Hindu and the masters are Hindus. The Mussalmans with one consent spurn at the instruction of idolaters through the medium of idolatry. The state Hindu has covered the country with schools adapted to the wants of his own community, but wholly unsuited to the Muhammadans. Our rural schools seldom enable a Muhammadan to learn the tongue necessary for his holding a respectable position in life and for the performance of his religious duties." No condemnation can be more vigorous or more complete and no words more deserving of careful consideration.

The Nawab Bahadur referred to some instances of the phenomenal advance made by the Mussalmans under the fostering care of Mussalman inspecting officers, and we sincerely hope with him that Government will be induced to give a fuller effect to the recommendations of the Education Commission of 1882 and the extension of such appointments.

Turning from these political—educational topics, the President of this session of the League dealt with the purely political and administrative subjects such as communal representation on local bodies and the share of the Mussalmans in the public service. With reference to the first, the Nawab Bahadur reminded the Government and other communities as well as his Moslem audience of the clear and emphatic pledge given more than five years ago by the predecessor of Lord Hardinge. Much has been said and written on this subject since then, but to our mind the pronouncement of Lord Minto cannot be equalled for a brief and clear enunciation of perhaps the greatest political principle which governs political circumstances such as exist in this land of caste and creeds. In addressing the Muhammadan Deputation that waited upon His Excellency Lord Minto at Simla in October 1906, His Lordship observed:—

I am fully convinced that any electoral representation in India would be doomed to mischievous failure, which aimed at granting a personal enfranchisement regardless of the beliefs and traditions of the communities composing the population of the continent. You point out that in many cases electoral bodies as now constituted cannot be expected to return a Muhammadan candidate, and that if by chance they did so, it could only be as a sacrifice of such a candidate's views to those of a majority opposed to his own community, whom he would in no way represent. I am entirely in accord with you.

This is nothing more or less than the view of Mazzini whose opinion must carry some weight even in Bengal. He wrote in his celebrated work "On the Duties of Man" in language which he calls "words of conviction matured by long years of study, of experience and of sorrow" that "doubtless universal suffrage is an excellent thing. It is the only legal means by which a people may govern itself without risk of violent crises. Universal suffrage in a country governed by a common faith is the expression of national will; but in a country deprived of a common belief, what can it be but the mere expression of the interest of those numerically the stronger to the oppression of all the rest?"

We appeal from the Congress and Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque to Lord Minto and Mazzini, and we hope we can say without offence that our estimate of the liberalism and statesmanship of the last two is higher. Where homogeneity exists and violent racial, religious and caste prejudices do not disturb it, the theory of one man one vote may be useful, and the lines of cleavage being territorial, various interests may adequately and effectively be represented by the separation of local areas into electoral groups. But where everything seems to take religious colour and even educated people fight with each other on questions of meat shops and street noises, where the lines of cleavage are those of caste and creed, not only is adequate and effective representation impossible by means of general territorial electorates merely, but, as the Moslem Deputation pointed out in 1906, and as Lord Minto accepted, no kind of representation of minorities is possible. An elected candidate can only represent the voters who return him, and if he is declared to be the representative of the minority simply because he worships the same gods as the minority and wears the same caste-marks, his representation of the minority is wholly fictitious and unreal. The fact is that in India rival communities make the country more like the continent of Europe, which in spite of the unity of its ultimate interests, is the battlefield of warring ambitions and conflicting immediate interests, than like a country inhabited by citizens of the same State and subjects of the same Sovereign. The situation is more international than national, and we have only too often to disabuse our minds of the applicability of political principles and national institutions which are too universally in use among European nations to create the least suspicion that they are only of limited use and applicability. For our part we regard separate communal electorates as a hateful necessity, but their necessity is not less to day than our hatred of them, and while endeavouring to cure the situation in our own humble way without cant or ostentation, we must ask our countrymen to endure the institutions which the hateful evil has necessitated. These institutions are the separate communal electorates, and the principles on which they are based are that great communities like the Hindus and the Mussalmans must be treated everywhere as equals, irrespective of numbers, neither being placed in such a position as to overreach the other, yet both permitted to work together in administrative and legislative bodies by means of their true representatives for the regeneration of India and the good of its people. The political importance of the Mussalmans and their services to the Empire make it still more unjust to place them in a position of subservience to rival interests, but the governing consideration is that, politically important or not, it would be sheer injustice to leave one community at the mercy of the other, and this can be prevented only if political power is shared equally by both. Without this there would be no representation of the community as a community, but a personal enfranchisement which could not meet the case of India and its divided millions.

While discussing communal representation, we must say we appreciate the spirit in which the Hon. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque made a personal explanation appealing successfully for freedom of conscience and freedom of speech. He was also sensible of the position in which he found his co-religionists and, recognising their difficulties, refrained from pressing to a division his own views which favour communal representation in the Councils as a necessary evil but disapprove of it on local bodies. The Hon. Mr. Wasi Ahmad was also justified in asking for freedom for various Provinces to demand communal representation on such bodies if they felt the necessity or to refrain from demanding it if the evils which it is designed to correct were not felt to exist. We would go still further, and in a matter of this character would leave it to the Mussalmans of each locality, which had a self-governing local body, to refrain from asking for separate communal representation if they so chose to do. It is only thus that we should deal with a hateful necessity. Care must, however, be taken that this freedom of choice was not misunderstood as rejection of separate representation where Mussalmans formed a majority and a desire to retain the power of the giant intending to use it as a giant. Although it is of no importance when dealing with the principle itself, we may add that the Hon. Nawab Sarfaraz Hossain Khan, who is assured that the Mussalmans of Behar desire adequate and effective separate representation as much as those of any other Province, appeared to us to gauge the feeling of his people more correctly than either of the other two speakers from Behar. Now that the League has passed this resolution once more with such unanimity and ardour, we trust Lord Hardinge will take early steps to redeem in full the pledges of his predecessor in spite of all the clamour that rival interests may raise. The opinion expressed by the Decentralization Commission has fully justified those pledges and further delay in their redemption is not likely to improve matters.

We are glad to find in the Presidential address an echo of our views on the subject of fixing a minimum of qualification for all posts in the administration and the adequate representation of qualified Mussalmans, when available, in preference to others who have at present a monopoly of Government appointments. The Nawab Bahadur has done a distinct service to the cause of truth by exploding the myth about the "favourite wife." He said—

There is a general impression that in matters of employment in public service Muhammadan claims have met with indulgent consideration. I have gathered statistics of appointments in Eastern Bengal, where the principle of favouritism is alleged to have been carried very far, which shows that there are far more Hindu officers without any University qualifications than there are Muhammadans.

A resolution on this subject was ably moved by Mr. Sultan Ahmad and we hope it will lead to an improvement in the share of the Mussalmans in the administration.

The Exposure.

WE CONFESS our experience of Bengali journalism is of the slenderest and we are unable to say what is characteristic of Bengali journalism and what is not. It is no wonder then that our surprises are also many. In polite society it is considered a sign of bad bringing up to be surprised at anything, and if this rule applies to journalism we shall stand condemned of conduct that is autie. For we have before this been astonished at the spectacle of a hoary journalist of Bengal throwing himself on the mercy of the law court for having commented upon matters sub judice and then describing the proceedings as "alleged contempt of court." Similarly, we have been amazed to read perversions of facts in prominent journals which when exposed have been declared, so to speak, privileged, as having been written "subject to correction." We have been caught marvelling at the unabashed garbling of official pronouncements to paint on unethical moral and adorn a self-invented tale. But what are all these to the shock of surprise which we have received recently by a deliberate misrepresentation which beats everything that occurred previously by its phenomenal audacity. Previous experience, however, has prevented our being surprised at discovering that the audacious and resourceful journal is once more the Bengalee.

Our contemporary commands the services of a variety artist who is everything by turns, from an advocate of "the Bengali Nation," an adversary of the British bureaucracy, and a Socialistic Labourite to an Imperialist whose Imperial flights outwing even Tory journalists. This time he appears as a saviour of the Government of India and a champion of Royalty. But whatever the toggery of the stage, the accents are those of Pistol, and in spite of all his fustian and bombast it will be our painful duty to make him this time swallow the lead.

It was only natural that the Hon Nawab Khwaja Sir Salimullah, who for more than five years bore the brunt of the struggle between the forces of sedition and anarchy on one side and law and order on the other, should have been grievously disappointed at the annulment of the Partition, and that he should have taken the opportunity of explaining his views when he was elected to preside over the sixth session of the All India Muslim League. He was perfectly right in believing that silence would have been misunderstood and in risking even contumely in order to avoid such a misunderstanding. If a little plain-speaking and a few "bitter truths" could be permitted to any man they must be to one whose great influence was used all along in favour of the lawfully constituted authority when tremendous forces had conspired to make the exercise of such authority impossible, and who showed exemplary self-restraint himself in the face of the extreme disappointment following on the announcement at Delhi and kept his co-religionists well in hand in spite of the grave provocation of triumphant clamour. We hold no brief for the Nawab Bahadur and are in no way responsible for his words. In fact, we would frankly say that he was not well advised in using certain expressions, which, however just in themselves, were all the same harsh and inconsistent with his genuine desire to let bygones be bygones. But a monstrous fabric of grotesquely mischievous interpretation, deliberately false suggestion, suppression of truth and actual untruth has been built up by the Bengalee on the slender foundation of some plain speech and one or two harsh epithets, indulged in by the Nawab Bahadur on the eve of his intended retirement from politics, and it is our painful duty to demolish this structure.

The Nawab Bahadur explained that he was not one of those who used to look upon the Partition in itself as the only panacea for all our evil. According to him,

The Partition gave us a great opportunity to begin ourselves, and it awakened in our hearts the throbbings of a new national life which went pulsating through the various sections of our community in Eastern Bengal. I hope gentlemen you will believe me when I assure you that the Mussalmans of East Bengal supported the Partition, not out of enmity to our Hindu brethren or at the bidding of the Government, but because we felt sure that the new administrative arrangements in East Bengal would afford us ample opportunities for self-improvement. We felt sure that the people of East Bengal, particularly the Mussalmans, would be immensely benefited by a sympathetic administration easily accessible to them, and always ready to devote its time and attention exclusively to their welfare. As for ourselves—the Mussalmans of East Bengal—we came to realize for the first time in our history that we too had rights and privileges as British subjects, and that it was only necessary for us to put our own shoulders to the wheel to free ourselves from that state of servile dependence on a dominant community in which we have been living before the Partition.

We have here a picture of the dawn of hope for many million souls who had been neglected far too long on the admission of the present Government themselves. If it suits the sanctimoniousness of the Bengalee to characterise this dependence of so many millions on an aggressive majority skilled in the political use of its education, wealth and numbers as an "indissoluble alliance between Hindus and Mussalmans which has existed for centuries and which prevails in every rural home in Bengal," and to compare it with studied innocence to the relationship of "the younger brother who occasionally looks to his elder brother for help," we have no objection. But we should very much like to put some of the champions of loyal and sturdy Behar, who have fought many a sturdy and loyal fight under the Bengalee banner, in the witness-box for half an hour and ascertain their views about the alliance between Bengal and Behar which has just been dissolved and ask them to describe in their own words the cousinly relationship which has terminated after a century and a half of idyllic peace and beatitude.

The Nawab Bahadur went on to describe what followed when the fetters of his co-religionists were cut off. He said:—

Our ill wishes at once perceived that the Partition would necessarily bring to the fore the long-neglected claims of the Mussalmans of East Bengal, and although we never got more than what was justly our due, what little we gained was so much a loss to them. We regretted that this should be so, but it was unavoidable. It was perhaps unavoidable also that the philanthropy of our opponents should not be equal to the occasion, for they saw in the maintenance of the Partition a possibility of the Mussalmans of East Bengal regaining a portion of their well-deserved rights as citizens of the British Empire. Those who are forced to give up a portion of their long-enjoyed monopoly, however unjustifiable in nature and origin, will readily understand the feeling of our enemies after the Partition. It was, therefore, only natural that they started a vigorous agitation to have the Partition annulled and to secure a reversion to the old order of things.

The use of the unfortunate word "enemies" puts our contemporary in a paroxysm of indignation, and when the Furies seize it, we may be sure Reason bids adieu. It writes —

"Who are the enemies," we ask? It is again the Hindus, who are charged with "unjustifiable monopoly." We regret to have to say that the Nawab is doing injustice to the honoured traditions of his own illustrious family. Is it not the case that the bulk of the employees in his estate are Hindus? How is it that he has given them a practical monopoly of which he complains in the departments of the Government? It is for the best of all reasons, viz., that he and his ancestors had to look to the efficiency of the work that had to be done. And is the Government to be blamed for following the same principle?

Whosoever the monopolists—and the Hon. Mr. Basu could supply a copious vocabulary of denunciation to condemn the seekers and preservers of monopolies—it is certain that the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca has drawn up no sweeping indictment of a whole community. For in another passage of his speech he says —

On one side there was the community of agitators with, in many cases, wealth, education, and influence to back them, and on the other there was the loyal community both of Hindus and Mussalmans who had faced the onslaught of the agitators and incurred their bitter hostility in supporting the Government.

Much as we regret the term "enemies" and consider it incompatible with the magnanimity of Khwaja Sir Salimullah, we could well ask if its use was after all so reprehensible in a man who had to go about throughout the disturbed Province with his life at the mercy of people who prided in murder and delighted in刁酷ities? It is no secret that the Nawab Bahadur's life had been declared a forfeit to Bengali "Nationalism," and we marvel at the sense of proportion of those who roared as gently as a sucking dove when the Luganter preached the gospel of blood against the Government and its supporters and now play the lion when a man who has patiently borne much for five years culls a spade a spade on the eve of his retirement from public life. So far as the Hindus as a community are concerned, the very fact that the Nawab Bahadur maintained not only his former relations with Hindu Rajas and Zemindars but also kept every one of his numerous Hindu servants in his post in spite of his obvious temptations and no less obvious danger, proves that he had no malice against the community. But where another would have felt unutterable gratitude for this magnanimity, the Bengalee trots out the efficiency of his Bengali servants. All that we can say is that only the Bengalee could carry it off so manfully.

It must be remembered that the Nawab of Dacca had a splendid opportunity of unveiling the sedition that ruled in Bengal as a disagreeable contrast to the loyalty shown during the week of the Royal visit. But he dismissed the subject in a few brief sentences to which we would specially invite attention as a model of temperate expression. Not even the most moderate description of the state of Eastern Bengal, during that quinquennium, which bore on it the impress of the dignity and responsibility of the Government of India could surpass its self-restraint. Yet how does it strike the naïf and muck Bengalee?

It is with a feeling of deep regret that we read the speech which Nawab Sir Salimullah of Dacca delivered as President of the Moslem League. If the policy of the newly-formed Moslem League in the Bengal Presidency is at all to partake of the character and the temper of that speech, all that we can say is that we deplore the formation of such an organization in Bengal. With the modification of the partition a new era has dawned upon the country, an era of peace, goodwill and reconciliation. His Majesty's last words when leaving Bombay embodied a fervent hope that the goodwill amongst themselves which had been displayed by his subjects belonging to different races, and creeds in welcoming him, might govern the daily relations of their lives. All classes of His Majesty's loyal subjects have accepted the message with cordiality and enthusiasm and are trying, each in their own sphere, to give effect to the gracious message. At such a time the thrice decorated Nawab of Dacca whose personal obligations to the British Government surpass those of the average subject of His Majesty, thinks it consistent with his loyalty and with the veneration which he owes to the person and the Throne of His Majesty to deliver a highly inflammatory speech calculated to rekindle the embers of racial animosity and to bring the Government into contempt. It is a serious allegation that we make, but we are prepared to prove it to the hilt; and that in the interests of the great Muhammadan community whose well-being has been always so near to our hearts.

But it strikes us that, like Lord Crewe, the loyal Bengalee is ascribing to the annulment of the Partition the virtues of the Royal visit. It passes our understanding why the new era should dawn upon the country with the revocation of the Partition, "an era of peace, goodwill, and reconciliation," when the Partition itself ushered in an era of anarchy and sedition. This can be explained only on the assumption that monopolists in all else, the friends of the Bengalee wish to be monopolists in agitation also, and that it is only their grievances which can give the sanction of patriotism to clamour, not to say crime. Once Bengali clamour is victorious, the voice of discontent must be hushed and every man would grumble at his peril. This seems to be the logic of the monopolist; but why has His Majesty been brought into the controversy and the Government troubled, and why, in the name of all that is not sheer hypocrisy, is the occasion utilized to throw dust into the eyes of "the great Muhammadan community whose well-being has been always so near to our hearts?"

Similar logic has been used in criticising the poorly reported speech of the mover of the Resolution which dealt with the annulment of the Partition. The Bengalee bestows high if also frigid approval on the remark that if the annulment of the Partition served to promote love and fraternity between Hindus and Muhammadans, the Mussalmans would consider it a boon and regard both Lords Crewe and Fardinge as their best benefactors, but that if it served only to alienate the feelings of the two communities, it would be the greatest misfortune that had ever befallen the country. But there is a saving clause characteristic of our contemporary. "Evidently the only attitude proper to a man who held such views was that of a suspension of judgment." And after this it detects an "obvious inconsistency" in the speech because the speaker had commenced it with the remark that in view of the many sacrifices which the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal were called upon to make in order to retain the benefits accruing from the Partition, its annulment could cause nothing less than regret and disappointment. Where the inconsistency comes in we fail to see. But if it is in the subsequent remark that the speaker trusted that his Hindu brethren would not be carried away by a feeling of triumph and allow themselves to fall into a vindictive frame of mind, the Bengalee itself furnishes some ground for apprehension in the ominous warning to the Mussalmans, "Have not the Partition and its history been a lesson which should never be forgotten?" As regards "the wise suspension of judgment" which is declared to be the only proper attitude, example is perhaps inconsistent with precept, for in the same issue the announcement made by His Excellency the Viceroy at Dacca is unwisely and rashly declared to be "a more mischievous form of partition which will inaugurate an educational and intellectual cleavage," and the new era of peace and goodwill and the rest of it disappears in the hope that "a strong body of our Muhammadan fellow-countrymen and the entire Hindu community will fight tooth and nail" against the Government's measures.

Reverting to the attack on the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca, we have to remember that although our contemporary admits that the charge of rekindling "the embers of racial animosity" is "a serious allegation," it is not only "prepared to prove it to the hilt," but deliberately accuses "the thrice-decorated Nawab of Dacca" of sedition and bringing the Government into contempt. It says—

From the indictment of the Hindus we come to the indictment of the Government, and it is of a very grave character. The Government is charged with sacrificing its prestige by annulling the Partition: Who has made the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca the custodian of the prestige of the British Government in India? The Government is well able to look after its own prestige and does not need the help of the Nawab of Dacca. But this is the smallest part of the indictment. The Government, we are told, has yielded to clamour, to agitation, to sedition and disloyalty. In the words of Sir Salmullah "Government has appeared to put a premium on sedition and disloyalty, and created an impression in the minds of the irresponsible masses that even the Government can be brought down on its knees by a reckless and persistent defiance of constituted authority." Nor is this all. The climax is reached in the next sentence. "It (the Government) has discredited British rule." Is not language such as this calculated to bring the Government into contempt? And let it be borne in mind that with this act (the annulment of the Partition) which has "discredited British rule," the august personality of His Majesty is associated. We could scarcely believe our eyes when we read this sentence as coming from an Indian nobleman, especially one on whom the Government has lavished its favours and bounties. But the words are there; and all may read them. We confess to a sense of painful surprise that the Nawab should have been betrayed into such language and sentiments.

We may answer the question "Who has made the Nawab of Dacca the custodian of the prestige of the British Government in India" by referring to the same unknown authority which evidently delegated to our contemporary the censorship of "language hardly compatible with the respect due to the Government, with which undoubtedly we may have at times differences," and which empowered it "to warn and to protest." If "the Government is well able to look after its own prestige and does not need the help of the Nawab of Dacca," we should have thought it was also capable of judging for itself the compatibility of language with the respect due to it, without the mischievous warnings and theatrical protests of our contemporary, which undoubtedly may have at times "differences" with that Government.

As regards "the august personality of His Majesty," we challenge the Bengalee to prove before a tribunal of its own lawyer friends whether by importing the name of the Sovereign into the controversy it is not endeavouring to destroy one of the chief bases of the Constitution, namely, the responsibility of Ministers which follows the famous doctrine "the King can do no wrong." Is not the royal announcement—amounting to the royal assent—of any measure which needs the sanction of the King-in-Parliament, before Parliament has considered it, subversive of constitutional procedure, and if the "King can do no wrong," is it not His Majesty's advisers that must be held answerable for such unconstitutional methods? We shall not waste many words on the loyal devotion of the Nawab of Dacca to the Throne and person of His Majesty because even if two pages of well-chosen praise of the "broadminded statesmanship and overflowing love for his subjects" and of "the personality of the King-Emperor," which "always stood out bright, majestic, serene, full of kingly dignity and yet intensely human in the gracious sympathy with which His Majesty accepted the heartfelt homage of all classes of his subjects," cannot convince one of it, there is the outstanding fact that in the words of the Nawab Bahadur, "we preferred to restrain ourselves from the course which might have commended itself on the first impulses of the moment, and did not wish to embarrass Government by an agitation against an administrative measure which, however galling to our feelings, has had the impress of the Royal assent and approval." The Nawab Bahadur may well say that "we hope we have succeeded in setting an example of genuine loyalty and willing obedience to the words of our Sovereign which can stand the severest tests"—even the test of the Bengalee's malicious misrepresentation. It would, however, be a fit subject of speculation, what our loyal contemporary would have written about "the august personality of His Majesty" had the Partition been announced, in 1905, by the King himself and not by His Majesty's representative in India, or if His Majesty had only transferred the capital to Delhi, or parted the new province of Behar in 1911, and not united the two portions of Bengal. Should we not have been treated in that case to learned disquisitions on the unconstitutionality of irrevocable words or to demands for the impeachment of His Majesty's advisers?

The Bengalee says "we could scarcely believe our eyes when we read the sentence as coming from an Indian nobleman." May we not say, and with better reason, that we could scarcely believe our eyes when we read deliberate misquotations in a journal which we had credited at one time with many virtues, including common honesty? Will our belief survive this shock? To eliminate every chance of a misunderstanding, we print the exact extract from the Nawab Bahadur's speech not only as it was printed and read out, but also as it appeared in the Bengalee itself, and we print below it the same extract as the Bengalee publishes it in its issue of the 7th instant.

The real speech

The annulment of the Partition had all the appearance of a ready conclusion to the labours of an utterly seditious agitation. It has appeared to put a premium on sedition and disloyalty, and created an impression in the minds of the irresponsible masses that even the Government can be brought down on its knees by a reckless and persistent defiance of constituted authority. Moreover, it has discredited British rule to an extent which is deeply to be regretted. It has hitherto been felt throughout the East that the word of the British Government is its bond and that, come what may, Government cannot go back on its pledged word. Anything which weakens this belief must irreparably injure British prestige in India and the East in general.

The speech as "cooked" by the "BENGALÉE"

In the words of Sir Salmullah, "Government has appeared to put a premium on sedition and disloyalty, and created an impression in the minds of the irresponsible masses that even the Government can be brought down on its knees by a reckless and persistent defiance of constituted authority." Nor is this all. The climax is reached in the next sentence. "It (the Government) has discredited British rule."

It is clear from this juxtaposition that the pronoun "it," which refers to "the annulment of the Partition," our contemporary has deliberately altered into "Government," and when in the next sentence the same pronoun occurs again, referring as it could not but do to the "annulment of the Partition," the Bengalee has retained it, but added the words "the Government" in brackets. We ask if this is the vaunted Bengali journalism and this the honesty of seasoned patriots? Apart from the alteration of the speech which nothing could justify, it is obvious to anyone who knows the law of sedition why this perversion has been resorted to. An expression of disapproval of particular Government measures is one thing and a condemnation of Government itself which is likely to create disaffection or bring Government into contempt is another. There is, therefore, not a shadow of doubt that the alteration of words is both deliberate and dishonest. We shall say no more on the subject—unless perhaps we ask if the Bay of Bengal is deep enough for the Bengalee.

CORRESPONDENCE

The League and Moslem Endowments.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,—Will you kindly accord me the hospitality of your columns to point out to my co-religionists the inexpediency of acting on the resolution adopted at the last annual session of the All-India Moslem League regarding the administration, or I would assume for the present, the mal-administration of Muhammadan Endowments. You are perhaps aware, Sir, that under the Muhammadan Law as interpreted by Muhammadan jurists, a Muhammadan can dedicate his properties by way of Waqf solely for the benefit of his children and descendants and create what is called Waqf-alal-aulad, inasmuch as a provision for the maintenance of one's own children is regarded as a charitable object under that law, for charity after all begins at home. Now, their lordships of the Judicial Committee have held in some cases (notably in Abul Fatah vs Rashomoy, 22 Cal) that you cannot make a valid Waqf unless you dedicate a substantial portion of your properties to religious and charitable purposes other than the provision for the maintenance of your own kith and kin. In other words, their lordships have, unfortunately for the community, imposed restrictions which are not to be found in the Muhammadan Law. The position now comes to this, that although the Muhammadan Law allows a Muhammadan to create an endowment for the benefit of his children and descendants, that Law as administered by British Courts in India invalidates such an endowment, with the result that almost all the important endowments in Bengal at least have been declared invalid and the families benefited by them ruined. One of the chief causes of the poverty of our community is the division and distribution of wealth into atoms because Waqf-alal-aulad is not permitted and there is no other form of trust recognised by Muhammadan Law which can keep properties intact in particular families. Now, the resolution in question asks the Government to institute a thorough enquiry into the administration of Muhammadan Endowments without drawing any line between endowments which are purely of a religious or charitable character (e.g., Mohsin Endowment) and those whose object is charity in the wider sense of the term including the provisions for one's own family. To my mind it is difficult to reconcile the undoubted desire of the community to be permitted to create Waqf-alal-aulad with the spirit of the present resolution asking the Government to enquire into, and, presumably, to interfere (for an enquiry necessarily implies interference) with the operations of such endowments. Whatever may be argued in favour of the principle embodied in the resolution under notice, I submit it would be adopting a suicidal policy in the present state of the law to allow any interference with our endowments. On the contrary, on grounds of policy and until the law of Waqf is brought into harmony with the Muhammadan Law as expounded by our jurists, I would have that done indirectly which the law does not allow to be done directly, for there is nothing wrong in doing a thing permitted by one's own law which under the statute is guaranteed to him. Take the case of a man who is anxious to create a family endowment which he knows his present law allows but which is not permitted by Anglo-Muhammadan Law, and suppose, to get round this obstacle, he ostensibly dedicates a substantial portion of his properties to charities recognised by the Anglo-Muhammadan law and a minor portion to the maintenance of his family, with a mental reservation that in the actual administration of the trust the order should be reversed, that is to say, that the smaller portion of the usufruct should go to charity and the larger portion towards the maintenance of his family. I submit he would not by so doing transgress any rule of his personal law. That being so, would it be right for any Muhammadan to invoke the authorities to frustrate his wish and to enforce the terms of this hypothetical endowment in their entirety? It may be argued that the enforcement of the terms in their entirety would benefit the Community at large. To this my answer is that the gain when closely examined greatly outweighs the loss to the Community, for the question of Waqf-alal-aulad vitally affects them. Unless some form of trust is recognised by law our Community and wealth must part company, and it is obvious that the release of funds from a few existing endowments cannot lead to our political salvation unless some means are available for preserving wealth intact in the Community permanently. Moreover, with the exception of large-hearted philanthropists whose number must necessarily be limited in every community, people would hardly care to create Waqfs for pure charities, and thus the number of purely charitable endowments would gradually decrease, whereas if there is permanent wealth in the Community the advantage of the same is bound to be reflected on the Community in more ways than one. It was therefore on grounds of expediency that I had suggested to the members of the All-India Moslem League the desirability of postponing the consideration of this matter till the fate of the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah's Bill was decided, and then, and not till then, we should determine our line of action in the matter. But I was ruled out of order.

CALCUTTA,

7th March 1912

NURUDDIN AHMED,

Vakil, High Court.

[We regret we do not agree with the writer of this letter. He is wrong in saying that the League's resolution about endowments does not draw a line "between endowments which are purely of a religious or charitable character (e.g., Mohsin Endowment) and those whose object is charity in the wider sense of the term including the provision for one's own family." As a matter of fact, the resolution refers only to endowments of the former class, namely, those "designed mainly for public benefit." But in any case, it is not by going round the Privy Council decision and ostensibly "dedicating a substantial portion" of one's property to charity as understood by the Privy Council while in reality arranging that charity should both begin and end at home that Mussalmans can get rid of the objectionable decision. To our mind the disintegration of property among Mussalmans which is likely to result from this decision, though in itself a great evil, is a far smaller evil than the open interference with the personal law of the Mussalmans which has been guaranteed to them. This must be fought against equally openly and fought to ultimate victory. Therefore, we find no inconsistency whatever in pressing for a thorough enquiry into the general purposes and manner of administration of existing Moslem endowments designed mainly for public benefit while urging on the Government the absolute necessity of a Bill declaring the true Moslem Law on the subject of endowments designed mainly for the benefit of the donor's own family.—ED., Comrade.]

Song.

O! SWEET was love and sweet desire,
And love's young blood was all a-fire,
And I knew not the dread to be,
When last my love came home to me.

The sun was sifted mellow in
The casement starred with jessamine,
And on the glass-pane buzzed the bee,
When last my love came home to me.

And roses red as martyr-wound,
Were on the trellis-shed festooned;
And blue-bells hung from every tree,
When last my love came home to me.

And larkspurs on the way-side grew,
And poppies pearled with silver dew,
Pink passions made them flowers three,
When last my love came home to me.

I took from love close kisses three,
One kiss for love and one for thee,
And one for way-side company,
When last my love came home to me.

I took from love close kisses seven,
Some were for Hell, and some for Heaven,
Some for the thing that was to be,
When last my love came home to me.

The Council.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please"

—As You Like It

February 26th

AT QUESTION time, nothing important. Dashing Boy dashed off on oiled railway wheels to Pennsylvania and asked the Railway Sleeper if in that soothing land they employed annually six of the best men turned out by Engineering Institutions within the State. Railway Sleeper considerably worried. Who, which, what, where, when or how is Pennsylvania? Never heard of him, her or it, as the case may be. Regie explained with utmost sang froid why acting allowances or "temporary promotions" would be wholly iniquitous in the case of "our excellent Provincial Civil Servier."

Sobraon, the Pantaloon, appeared in the guise of Paul Pry and wanted to lift the veil from that dread Isis, the Executive Council of H.E. He would have rules and orders made for the transaction of business laid on the table. Although Regie couldn't tell tales out of school, there's somewhere outside official pigeon-holes a copy laying down the maximum number of cigarettes that may be smoked in the Friday meetings, the exact degree of the angle permitted for the swaying motion of Members walking after the fifth cup, and the class of stories that would just escape the Blue Pencil of the Lord Chamberlain and Charley's Aunt if they were dramatised. (Council Members please note, no hush money required to prevent publication of such Official Secrets!)

Madge was up in the hills and pattered about the Landour cantonment. Considerably gratified when Regie informed him that out of 10 higher police appointments in Eastern Bengal in 1910 no less than 6 went to Imperial cousins. Another strong reason why the Partition should not have been annulled. Madras alone showed a clean slate, having appointed none. The Benighted Presidency!

The Khan Bahadur beginning to be useful, very early asked for irrigation statistics and his alphabet book was duly supplied to him by the Sage. Desiring a concentrated dose of information, asked why no "Official Year Book" published on the model Australia and was informed that it was published under other names. Oh these awful "invidious distinctions" between the Colonies and India! Growing bolder, Khan Bahadur wanted to know "the starting as well as maximum pay" of a Munsiff in various Provinces. Should think that if a certain salary is the starting as well as the maximum pay of the Munsiffs, the brutes get precious little by way of promotion throughout their careers. Regie, warned of the K. B.'s powers of searching cross-examination, quailed before the prospect, and instead of wading through the figures like the Sage, deposited them on the table all in a lump. The Khan Bahadur thought this was all very well but it was not cricket. So forthwith got up and expostulated. "Oh, but I had prepared an elaborate catechism for you in the way of supplementary questions." Sir Guy, too strict a disciplinarian to permit unrehearsed effects on the Council stage, quietly pulled K.B. up. In other words, asked him to sit down. "Oh, but I have a lot to ask." "Please, will you sit down!" "But the cross-examination of the witness is not yet over." "Will you sit down!" "I would ask the Court to take down my question if it is to be disallowed." "Sit down!!!" And he did, you know.

Dig'er-Patty asked if the new Province of Assam would be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court and placed under a Judicial Commissioner. Regie replied: "No such proposal is at present under the consideration of Government." Very ominous this. Seems this too is all settled, for in September at Simla poor Dig'er-Patty had asked a similar question about a new High Court at Dacca, and received the same innocent-looking, guileless, unsophisticated reply. Yet the Imperial conclave had settled the fate of many millions and had signed, sealed and delivered their judgment into the hands of the S. of S. Speculation rife in the Council if Assam as "Earle's Court" was already made a separate Presidency with a band, a bodyguard, and such sundries as a High Court and a brand new teaching and residential University. Dig'er-Patty asked if the Executive Council of Bengal would not be enlarged after the abolition of the Revenue Board. If Durhhanga could grace the Chhajju Bagh Council, why couldn't Dig'er-Patty grace the one at Belvedere or Government House? Yes, why not? And echo answered, "Why not?"

In answer to the Mild Hindu, Bootlair Sahab informed Council that even if the Imperial Records were located at Simla, provision would be made for the needs of the Councillors at Delhi to enable them to perform satisfactorily their duties in connection with Council work. A flotilla of airships was no doubt in sight. Preferably they should be unworthy. Mild Hindu, not finding his "worthy foe" sitting just opposite to him, skipped over the Sinking Fund question, and preparatory to the expulsion of undesirable aliens, asked for a list of Colonials in the I.C.S. Thereafter performed some skilful surgical operations on the Medical Department. The corpus vile was reluctantly submitted to ruthless dissection and the sight turned Regie into a pronounced anti-vivisectionist.

The Cross-Bencher roamed all over the land and got out of Regie the promise that following the example of Diogenes who searched for a good man, he would take a lantern out and hunt in daylight for those Deputy Superintendents, if any, who had been promoted to any of the 15 posts of Superintendents thrown open to them.

Questions over, Regie, who had commenced his career with selection on the Lunacy Committee, advanced a step further and introduced a Wild Animals' Bill. It included wild or gay birds also. This inclusion rather hard on fashionable ladies. Already under the Act of 1870 the Municipalities were down on them and had prohibited the sale or importation of the plumage of any kind of wild birds during their breeding season. In the name of all that is modish and up-to-date, what lady of fashion could regard with favour such an obsolete thing as a breeding season? Regie talked a lot about humanity and said this was "recognised as Man's Duty." But he had nothing to say of the Rights or Wrongs of Woman. Oh, for a Chrissie Pancake to teach Regie the Whole Duty of Woman! Was it not the duty of woman to look beautiful, even if she did not happen to be, and how could she perform this recognised duty, if she had to think of the demands of the breeding season, and recognise the embargo on bought, begged or borrowed plumes?

When Regie had done, Bhupen Babu rose amidst applause in all the self-consciousness of virtue and social reform to move that his Bill be referred to a Select Committee. Tried the customary trick of persuasive orators and said when he introduced the Bill he did not expect such large and influential support. It was beyond his wildest expectations. Here was a guilty consciousness of being in a hopeless minority, for who does not know that in other matters, such as the political future of India, the latest expectation of Bhupen is a Bengali-Rule Parliament in Government House, with himself as its President, and the captain of his Mohan Bagans as the Jungi Lat putting the tribes on our frontiers in terrible fear of their lives. Only orator as he is, edged in a word or two about the courage of the Government which carried out social reform regardless of popular indignation. Evidently the Partition of Bengal could not come "within the meaning of the Act" and be maintained regardless of popular indignation. Asked if the Hindus of modern days would believe that when the abolition of suttee was proposed their ancestors gathered together and submitted a solid memorial to the Government. He certainly did not tax the credulity of the descendants much, for the protection of Indian cattle is now the burning question, and solid memorials are still the order of the day. In the days of Bentinck, people cared disproportionately about the chastity of women, the marital rights of husbands and the security of their lives from poison and the poniard. But the assets of yesterday are the liabilities of to-day. As for the security of life, insurance in favour of wives, with its recurring premia, coupled with votes for women, has made life itself a burden. Modern Iagons think more rationally of these matters. "Who loves my wife, loves trash," is something, nothing, and all the rest of it. The altruism of the love of to-day is stupendous. It embraces the whole world, and forgets not his wife.

Turning to more recent times, Bhupen Babu described the opposition to that "tiny little measure," the Age of Consent Bill—an appropriate phrase, considering the "age." He saw a big mass meeting on the maidan at which more than 100,000 people had assembled to protest against the Bill. He said not if there were any maidens also on the maidan. But, in any case, what are a lakh of people for Calcutta? More than that assemble to-day or, smaller provocation. What if thousands assembled at the Kalighat "to purify themselves against the law," and offered prayers to the goddess "to save them from this dire calamity"? Have not thousands assembled in recent years on other occasions "to purify themselves against the law," and offered prayers to the goddess to save them from "dire calamities" of another kind? Bhupen Babu proved what a habitual protestant he was, for he described how he went to protest against the opposition to the Bill, "was very soon shown the door and received an amount of corporal chastisement which he was afraid he had not yet forgotten." Panditji, who was prepared to administer a polite reminder if only Burly Raja would help him, thought that even if the rod had not been spared, the enfant terrible had certainly been spoilt.

Referring to Vidyasagar's Widow Remarriage Bill, said there were protests against its provisions, people saying that "Hindu Society was going to be turned upside down and the purity of the Hindu widow was going to be destroyed." No wonder. Who ever heard of any but a Hindu widower marrying or finding consolation for the loss of the late lamented spouse? Was it not topsy-turvydom? Compared with the magnitude of these, what was "my little measure"? Sha'n't swear to it, but if he held the tape on the Little Mary and turned round, it would exceed 42 inches. There were nearly 180 for him (Mark the round figure.) and 247 (Note the exactitude) against "A very respectable number in my support." Say nothing as to the number, but should like to know what the Panditji thinks of the "respectability." Every Social Conference, that euphemism for the unfructuous picnic of self-conscious "reformers," was for the Bill. Could say "with clear conscience,"—being only a Solicitor—that highest authority was in favour of the Bill. "Even that organ of the bigoted and proud Brahmin, (alas, for poor Bal Gangadhar Tilak) the Krishan, was one of the strongest supporters of the measure. As for the Panditji his paper, the Leader, had thrown him overboard." But that was at the Sangham, and what could be a greater service than Gurn of Prag dipped the orthodox Brahmin in Tibesti? While this enumeration of the assembled hosts was going on, the Khan Bahadur, like Homer, nodded and slumbered. He had already been assured by the guileless Solicitor that "the Mussalmans were not so vitally affected as we are."

Referred to cases of intermarriage among various castes, and as a special compliment to "Hon. friend to the right," the renowned Kachittryyya, Burly Raja, began with the exploits of Parasram, who extirpated Burly Raja's caste twenty-one times. Said how this could be possible only Brahmin ingenuity could explain, and looked fixedly at the white-robed Pandit. Don't know what puzzled him. It would take more than twenty-one attacks of a modern Parasram to demolish the self-possession and self-satisfaction of the Burly Raja. Well, any how, when Greek meets Greek there's furious fun, and Parasram was half Greek inasmuch as his mother was a caste-fellow of the Burly Raja himself. Again, the arranger of the Vedas and Puranas was the son of a Brahmin by a fisherwoman, though the lady may be presumed not to have hailed from Billingsgate. But if Yajnavalkya's authority unacceptable, there's Manu for your money. (Again a glance in the direction of the Orthodoxy of Allahabad.) Quoted the Shastras about the Aryan status of one "begotten by chance by an Aryan on a non-Aryan." After this reference to the accidental growth of some Aryans, turned to Sobraon, the Pantaloon, "the sturdy champion of the Orthodox Hindus." With the facility of a certain unnameable Ruler of the Netherlands, quoted Hindu Scriptures to define the Sudras. Who are Sudras? "Those who always weep." Now, where the Kayasthas come in in the hierarchy of caste is a moot question, and confusion was worse confounded when the Sudras were thus defined, for Bhupen Babu himself had only a little while ago on a historic occasion wept with one eye and winked with the other.

As if these quotations were not enough, heaped Pelion upon Ossa by quoting the mighty Hunter about "arbitrary manufacturing" of some of the highest castes "promiscuously out of menial servants." In Southern India—name it not in Gath—the Brahmin is a pure Dravidian. Similarly raked up remote and obscure origins of Brahmins in other places and roused the ire of Panditji whose face was a picture of pent-up rage and Brahmanic wrath. Threw salt on the sore spots by disclaiming all desire to run down the Brahmins. They had been of the greatest service (Sobraon's heart is gladdened and the Panditji thaws), but they had also been of the greatest disservice to India. (The genial current of the Panditji freezes, and Sobraon contemplates Hari-Kari.)

Then, having settled Madras and the United Provinces, commenced his charity nearer home, and turned to "my friend on my right who makes a lowly obeisance to Kulin Brahmins." "My friend on my right" decided it was time to smoke a cigarette in the lobby and retired with honour. In the meantime the Kuls and their origin were discussed with more candour than courtesy and at last came the summing up. "What do you think? What does my friend to the right think?" But Burly Raja had already flown and was contemplating the excellence of Abdullah's aromatic cigarettes, and the Slacker, who had taken his place, guiltily looked up as if caught for once flagrant delicto in the unthinkable process of thinking. What could be more reprehensible in an official representative of Bengal than the reflection that he reflected? Baulked of his prey, Bhupen Babu pitched once more into the Kuls and traced their ancestry to "oilmen, leathermen, wine sellers, Mussalmans and the despised classes generally." Finding that the Panditji was sending a non official despatch to Sir Guy, added that he would not dwell further on that aspect. It was unpleasant, no doubt, but it was nevertheless a duty. But thinking better of it, turned to Kathiawar, and to C.P., "whence Cherry Chitnis comes," so that no Province should complain of neglect. At last concluded this part of the argument by saying in the true spirit of Collectivism, "The greatest happiness would be that the Jus Connubium embraces us all in a single fold." If the conjugal happiness of one married couple is desirable, it should be extended to all the world, and so extended would it not be the summum bonum, the greatest happiness of the greatest number?

Paris, Feb. 9

The special correspondent of the Times telegraphs from Tripoli the arrival of the auxiliary cruiser Citta di Catania after the bombardment of seven ports and Arab encampments along the coast. Yesterday the steamer Europe disembarked a hundred Camel Corps men from Eritrea and the first contingent of the Askari infantry. More are following.

Commander Scalabrini is making arrangements for the re-opening of the schools in Tripoli on March 1.

Rome, Feb. 11

The arrival at Tripoli of a contingent of black troops from Eritrea was made the occasion of warm demonstrations of welcome by the Italian forces. The Eritrean askaris, with some hundred camel-drivers, paraded before General Frugoni and performed a kind of fantasia, which seems to have much impressed the native population. General Frugoni made a speech recalling the gallantry and loyalty they had already shown when fighting under the Italian flag and expressing the pleasure experienced by his soldiers in welcoming them as comrades. It seems to be hoped that the presence of these African Mussulmans in the Italian Army may have a salutary effect on the Arabs and persuade them of the possibility of terms of good fellowship with the Italian invader.

Rome, Feb. 13

Sharp fighting is reported in a semi-official despatch from Derna of Sunday's date. The message runs as follows:—

"Last night the enemy made two violent attacks on our south front, but were repulsed successfully. The first of the attacks was very fierce and was delivered shortly before 11 o'clock but was repulsed by a company of the Alpine Battalion garrisoning the newly erected Lombardia redoubt and a small tower adjacent to it supported by other companies of the same battalion, who hastened up, and by two bayonet charges delivered in quick succession twice drove back the enemy, finally putting them to flight. Meanwhile, however, other forces of the enemy had gathered on our extreme right and delivered two attacks on the redoubt called A2, but were beaten back after a fierce fight which took place near the Italian wire entanglements.

"Our success was in no small part due to the very efficacious fire of the five forts and to the use of dogs, which gave notice of the enemy's approach. Great assistance was also given by the searchlights mounted on the forts, although they became the particular and constant target of the enemy's fire. Hand grenades were thrown by the enemy, but they did no damage. Our artillery, as usual, did good service and poured in a very hot fire.

"By 2 o'clock on the Sunday morning the enemy had been completely routed on that side of our front, and at dawn traces of the heavy losses suffered by the enemy were discerned there. More than 60 dead and one seriously wounded man, besides fragments of limbs and bodies, were scattered over a large extent of ground.

"Our losses were three killed and 22 wounded, including an officer."

"Towards the close of this attack other forces of the enemy attacked the little Piemonte fort and the F and G redoubts, situated to the right of the Wady Derna. This force also pushed forward right up to our wire entanglements and auxiliary defences and from a range of less than 200 yards poured in a fierce fire, which, however, had no effect. Towards 3 o'clock this attack was also completely repulsed with the assistance of our artillery. On this side of our defences we had no losses. The conduct of the officers and men was admirable and all the force is in the highest spirits."

Fighting, though not of such a serious character as at Derna, is also reported in a telegram of to-day's date from Tobruk. (Reuter.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The veil which has fallen on Tripoli is lifted now and then by belated news from the Turkish camp. Mr. F. N. Bennett, who represents the Daily Chronicle with Feeth Bey's forces at Anzieh, records the late of three infantry battalions, with details of cavalry and artillery, who endeavored to clear out a small oasis on December 19. The column was hemmed in by a dense cloud of Arabs, and driven back pell-mell in its base with heavy loss. General Caneva has apparently forgotten to report this untoward event in his despatches from the seat of war, and Italy is still revelling in a fool's paradise. Mr. Bennett aptly remarks that she should have remembered the Biblical injunction to "sit down and count the cost thereof" before embarking on warfare. He might also have quoted Prince Eugene's pithy advice to the Emperor Charles VI of Germany who was meditating a war of aggression: "Your Majesty should first ask himself two questions: 'What do I want?' and 'What can I do?'"

Constantinople, Feb. 11.

There is reason to believe that the Council of Ministers, which sat late to night, decided in principle to abolish the state of siege in Constantinople and to declare a limited amnesty after the conclusion of the elections. A Commission, composed of Talaat and Memduh Beys, Emrullah Effendi and Prince Halim, will, it is said, be appointed to decide who will benefit by the amnesty.

Vienna, Feb. 12.

The announcement in a Constantinople despatch to a North German journal that the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador made yesterday peace proposals to the Porte on the basis of a withdrawal of the Italian annexation and the establishment of a Turco-Italian condominium in Tripoli is a pure invention, of which the apparent object is to excite Italian suspicions of Austro-Hungarian policy, while providing the Turkish Press with something to reproduce in view of the Turkish elections.

Smyrna, Feb. 2.

The political situation shows no change. The state of war with Italy continues, and in view of the little material prejudice thereby being caused to the natives, it cannot be denied that there is a feeling of grim determination gaining ground among all sections of the population to prolong resistance and to avoid a peace which does not safeguard Ottoman suzerain rights and religious supremacy over Tripoli. The dissolution of the Chamber and the approach of the new elections are arousing some interest among the better classes. Meanwhile, H. E. Nazim Pasha, Governor-General of the Vilayet, has been called to Constantinople by the Minister of the Interior, the term of his absence being uncertain. His duties are being carried on by the Military Governor, Ismail Fazil Pasha.

Ben Gardane, (Tunisian Frontier,) Feb. 13

I am on the road for the Turkish headquarters once more and your inquiries respecting the "veiled lady," who is alleged to have abstracted leaves from my notebook, have only just reached me. Please contradict the statement of the Messaggero's correspondent, which is quite untrue.—H. C. SEPPINGS WRIGHT—Central News

[The Tunis correspondent of the Italian newspaper above referred to recently telegraphed a report according to which a certain mysterious veiled lady had been able to abstract from Mr. Seppings Wright's notebook pages containing information regarding the running of contraband to the Turkish forces in Tripoli. The improbability of the story was commented on by our Rome Correspondent in The Times of February 1.]

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" CORRESPONDENT)

On the orders of the Egyptian Government, the Cairo police a few days ago seized several thousand copies of an Arabic pamphlet, entitled "The Golden Treasury," which had been printed in Cairo and were about to be shipped to Italy, whence they were presumably to be sent back to Tripoli for distribution among the natives. The work appears to be a violent indictment of Turkish rule, and the object of the Author, an Italian, to be to persuade the Arabs of Tripoli to accept the Italian conquest as the harbinger of peace and prosperity. The Government, having received information from a native source that the books had been printed and were about to be despatched, had the eight cases containing them seized as they were being loaded on to the van outside the offices of the forwarding agent. The grounds on which the Government based its action are apparently that the writings, being subversive to the authority of the Sultan, are seditious literature. It is also possible that, in view of attempts which have been made since the war broke out to prevent inflammatory literature being sent to the Arabs from Egypt, the Government felt that it was only just to do the same when the position was reversed. The seizure has, however, called forth a protest from the representative of France in Cairo, as, the forwarding agents being a French firm and Consular authority not having been obtained, the action of the police is alleged to have been an infringement of the Capitulations.

(FROM THE "TANIN")

(Specially Translated for the Comrade.)

ENVER BEY, the Commandant and organizer of the forces of the Arab Mujahids fighting near Derna and Benghazi, who was before he went to Tripoli the Military Attache in the Imperial Ottoman Embassy at Berlin, has been writing letters to an intimate friend of his in Berlin. These letters are being published by a German paper the Lokalsieger. We print below the translations of a few.

19th November 1911.

"Warriors are coming to me like a volume of flood. High statured, fine favoured, serious visaged, pure hearted men. 'We have come' they say without any ceremony, and are true to me unto death. In a big meeting yesterday they assembled and swore that even if their Sheikh's sword they will stand fast till their last breath by Enver Pasha. Yes I am Pasha to these true, pure bred men. They may be sure that they will not find any cause to regret this decision of theirs. I live with them and share with them the state in which they are. Presently the Sherikhs come and swear their allegiance to me. For they venerate me as the son-in-law of the Khalifa. With this qualification I can count on their unbounded, unmeasured obedience and loyalty whereas the Enver who is given the name of the 'hero of liberty' is unknown here."

28th November 1911.

"This affront to our national honour has brought us to such a state of desperation that we scoff at death, and whoever may be among the fighters in my little army has one feeling, one hope animating him and us and keeping us together. 'Victory or death.' Every tribe is sending its warriors from grey bearded men to youths of 15 years. The difference of age is obliterated for they all come shoulder to shoulder with the same eagerness with the same desperate determination for war and rehad. These men are resigned and contented with faith in destiny. They think that a brave man dies before the enemy only once but the coward a hundred times. I wish you could see how they come to my camp. An old rifle on the shoulder a string of cartridges on the breast, and a quantity of flour on the camel in the little caravan, thus they come in groups of ten men and two women. The women cook food but during the battle they also encourage their menfolk, carry ammunition for them, attend to the wounded and bury the shahid. I wonder if humanity will move in our favour if it knew how we spent our last strength. But we don't expect anything. We have faith in Allah and our own strength and capacity."

30th November 1911.

"For attacks I have evolved a plan of my own of throwing up tahuts, keeping in view the local conditions. This plan has so far succeeded. The Italians suffer great loss, while our strength is conserved. (Here and elsewhere the addressee of the letters has suppressed portions before sending them for publication.) For the first I am compelled to use my soldiers, specially my ammunition, with great economy, but gradually they are getting all right."

"A number of our Arab mujahids are even now armed with Italian rifles captured by us. We are continually capturing stores and ammunition also."

"I have instituted daily courses of instruction to teach Arabs who find rifles on the dead bodies of the enemy how to use them."

1st December 1911.

"I am tired to day. Our yesterday's attack on Derna was not successful. My men are full of firing enthusiasm, but are very little accustomed to discipline and regulation, which is essential to success, specially in night attacks. I was wounded slightly; but our losses are very little. I have to contend against and overcome innumerable difficulties and obstacles but this infuses strength in me. Eight days ago I was in S. and traversed a distance of 70 kilometres in nine hours on a riding camel."

"Our road lay through a tract of country the Arabs of which are alleged to be friendly to Italians. At first the Arabs came to me cautiously but very soon they greeted me as the son-in-law of the Khalifa, went along some distance with me, and declared that they too entered into hostilities against the Italians and spoke of the cowardly soldiers of the enemy. I was amused at the reflections that the Italians were believing that they had won over these men."

"Had I money I could have done much, but I pride on the fact that I have succeeded in organizing an army here with not 5 paras (pice) in my hand."

18th December 1911.

"Day before yesterday we had another bloody engagement. Emboldened, by a fire which was not replied to from our side, the enemy came along with a large force with four mountain guns, till it was at a distance of about 100 metres from us. Then our men opened fire. The enemy retreated but advanced again on the strength of reinforcements which had reached them but were again compelled to go back. Their fresh reserve again charged on us in force, but very soon took to heels. This engagement filled our heart with a sense of pride and pleasure at the thought that we with our old rifles were able to defeat an enemy far superior to us, both in numbers and in arms, after nine hours continuous fighting. I wonder if these facts find a place in European newspapers. I long to know very much."

31st December 1911.

"On the 28th a little before noon I received for the first time a consignment of arms and stores. I had not yet finished distributing them to my warriors when shells began to drop on us afresh."

"I saw the enemy advancing in a line from the Derna valley, not far from our advance guard. Its right flank consisted of four regiment and two batteries, left of one regiment and one battery, centre of two regiments."

"My two guns which had been mounted on tahuts and which had been received recently by me, opened fire, and my infantry waited till the Italians were within 200 metres and then attacked."

"A forward movement of our right decided the engagement in our favour."

"The enemy retreated first in order, but very soon began to flee. Whereupon our left took up the pursuit, and I watched with a feeling of pleasure the human blood that was being spilt on the other side. It was funny the lack of decision of the commandant opposite who was directing the fight. Just as it happened in front of Tripoli; he sometimes sent his reserve forward, then called it back. We pursued the Italians, driving them into their wire entanglements, and captured from them 2 machine guns, 250 rifles, 2 guns, 30,000 rounds of ammunition and 25 boxes of shells. These have come very handy to us as well as ten camels who will draw my guns."

"The following were left on the field of battle by the Italians: a Major, one Captain, 5 Lieutenants and 200 privates. We wanted to let go a private who was taken prisoner, but he was very pleased with being a captive and began to assist us by taking up the work of cleaning the rifles captured by us. This success enhanced the hopes and confidence of my mujahids, and with the assistance of God we have faith in our complete success. When I came here I found 900 mujahids, to-day I have 16,000 fighters behind me."

The German Red Cross in Tripoli.

We have received from Mr. Ameer Ali the following account of the German Red Cross Mission for the relief of the Ottoman sick and wounded in Tripoli. "The mission organized by the British Red Crescent Society," he writes, "leaving Charing Cross at 9 A.M. on Wednesday, the 14th instant, has also a hospital for 60 beds and is supplied with all the latest surgical and medical apparatus, not, we hope, inferior to the German organization, except for the absence of an X ray apparatus, which the funds of the Society did not permit."

"The German Red Cross Society was enabled by the liberal contributions received from important banking houses and industrial companies to undertake with as little delay as possible the mission despatched for the relief of the Turkish sick and wounded."

Preparations were made for a hospital of 60 beds at the central dépôt at Neubabelsberg so as to have it in readiness as soon as the Society was in a position to despatch the hospital, and the provincial societies of the Association of Voluntary Sick Nurses were also communicated with to make a selection of volunteer hospital assistants and nurses.

"The mission, with the assistance of the various Red Cross societies, was soon complete. The equipment and stores were shipped on January 10 in the steamship Fera of the Levant Line and the mission sailed on the following day on board that boat direct for Tunis.

"The mission is to land at El Bissan, 24 kilometres from the Tunisian and Turkish frontier, whence it will proceed on camels, and it will be met on the frontier by a Turkish escort. Stores and rations for the staff as well as for the patients accompany the mission and preparations are made for three months." (Times)

Khedive and Red Crescent.

At the end of last week the Khedive, in receiving a deputation of the Egyptian Red Crescent League, which had come to thank His Highness for having taken the work of the Society under his patronage, congratulated the Committee upon the excellent services which the Red Crescent League was performing at the seat of war. This work, the Khedive said, did great honour to Egypt, and it was with pleasure that he watched the youth of the country labouring conscientiously and intelligently, not only in the interests of the moment, but also in the interests of the future. For, he concluded, there is at the present time the greatest need for Oriental peoples to look ahead and to work in unison and with sincerity.

Turco-Italian War.

The truth is now out about General Caneva's visit to Rome. It is told by the Rome correspondent of the Milan Perseveranza in a despatch to his journal. This despatch is reprinted in huge display type on the front page of the Avanti. It reads as follows:—

"When General Caneva came to Rome, at the invitation of the Government, to confer with the Premier, the Ministers of War, Foreign Affairs and Marine, and the Chief of the General Staff, the disposition of the Cabinet towards the Commander-in-Chief of the Tripoli Expedition was not over warm.

"They have always had confidence in the strategic ability of the general and a high estimate of his political sagacity, but they thought that he combined these fine qualities with an excessive slowness and undue caution. In a word, the Government thought the general's tactics far too dilatory.

"In the very first interview that the general had with the leading personages of the Cabinet in Rome, the following question was plainly and squarely put to him:

"Are you in a position, with the means now at your disposal, and with all the other means which you might ask for and which the Government would not hesitate to give—are you in a position to provide that unequivocal and decisive victory of which Italy is in need, in order to impose an unconditional peace upon Turkey?"

"General Caneva did not hesitate to give the resolute answer, 'No.'"

Here the correspondent adds—"I do not know, and if I knew I would not say, what were the arguments used by General Caneva to demonstrate the soundness of his thesis. But it is certain that he firmly held to his belief in the absolute inopportune-ness of all advance into the interior in search and pursuit of an enemy that knows how to put himself out of reach by reason of his great mobility.

"I cannot give to the nation that victory which is essential if peace is to be imposed upon Turkey. All that I for my part can answer for is the slow and gradual conquest of the whole territory of Tripoli and Cyrenaica. If you want a brilliant success you must seek it elsewhere than in Libya, because in a war of an essentially colonial character such as that which has been entrusted to me, no army could obtain a brilliant success—not at this moment, not in a month's time, not in a year, never."

The War in Tripoli.

AN INTERESTING account of life in the Turkish camp at Azizieh (Tripoli) is given by the Daily Chronicle's correspondent there. On the arrival of his party at the camp, he says, they found themselves in the midst of a wonderfully busy scene. In a large open space surrounded by irregular buildings, squatted hundreds of Arabs chattering like magpies and carrying on a brisk trade with officers and men. There appeared to be no lack of food for the Sultan's fighting men in Tripoli. On every side were sacks and baskets full of onions, potatoes, chillies, dates, lemons, eggs, rice, mutton, goat's flesh, sugar, and native bread, there was even a number of rather lean fowls, but no trace of coffee. Apart from tobacco, which was scarce and costly, I could see no sign of famine prices. Potatoes were selling at 3lbs for 2d, eggs 8d a dozen, meat about 4d. a lb. As far as food is concerned the war might last for years in the interior of Tripoli.

The market is bounded on the south by one of the big "konaks" or military quarters typical of Tripoli—a central courtyard filled with Arabs and camels and very filthy. The upper storey runs a large broad terrace loopholed for rifle fire and commanding fine views of the desert and the Gharian Mountains. The Turkish officers' experience at Azizieh the very minimum of personal comfort. I never heard a word of complaint, and everybody seemed in a good temper and excellent spirits yet what a signal contrast exists between the condition of active service in the British Army and those which prevail at Azizieh. Here in a small room in the tumbledown konak sleep the Commander-in-Chief, Kethi Bey, and Djavad Bey. The writing of numerous dispatches, the issue of daily orders, the holding of courts martial, the reception of Arab deputations have all to take place in this one apartment, which also serves as the mess for all the meals of the staff. If ever I saw compressed discomfort I saw it in that untidy room.

The borders of our camp have been continually enlarged since the beginning of December by the arrival of Arab contingents from east, south and west. A war drum would be heard in the distance, and gradually a column would appear over the gentle undulations of the desert. The Arabs advanced in ragged "sours," the result of the elementary drill provided by a couple of Turkish regulars who marched with them. At the head of the columns rode the Sheikhs, splendidly mounted, crescent flags, embroidered with Koran texts, waved in the air. Amid loud shouts of welcome the new arrivals would march round the camp, and then taking up their bivouac ground settle down in coloured masses "like garden beds," in the words of the Gospel narrative. At other times they ranged themselves in big semi-circles, with the mounted chiefs in the centre and the standard bearers moving to and fro along the lines. The spectacle was really magnificent in its display of elemental vigour and passion. Suddenly in resonant tones some Arab would chant the refrain, "We are warriors, we fear not death for our fatherland" and then the massed ranks raised their rifles and swords and shouted with one accord, "We are true sons of our father"—i.e., in colloquial English, "chips of the old block." The enthusiasm was tremendous and the occasion worthy of a great artist's brush. Holman Hunt would have done justice to the wonderful grouping, the varied colours, reds, whites, browns, the yellow desert all around, and the sun blazing until the air quivered in the heat.

For some time after the turning of the Turkish left on the 4th December and the consequent removal of their headquarters to Azizieh, the Italians appear (continues the correspondent) to have been living in a fool's paradise of security. Officers and correspondents talked glibly of "no more fighting until we find ourselves in the Gharian Mountains." This belief received rude shock on the 19th December when a brigade under Colonel Fava set out for small oasis to clear out some alleged marauders. Long before daylight three battalions of infantry, a squadron of cavalry, three mule guns, and some Maxims left the trenches at Am Zara. Some of the infantry belonged to the 11th Bersaglieri, whose captured transport wagons lie at Azizieh. The Turks at Fonduk Bengashui were well aware of the enemy's advance, and without delay the Arabs began to harass the Italian column, leaping from dune to dune and firing at every opportunity.

As the sun rose these attacks increased in number and vigour. The Italians were losing men and at length halted, and then began to retire. But they had miscalculated time, distance, and direction. At this time of year the sun disappears about 4-30, and within one hour all the ways of the desert are darkened. There was no moon, and in the blackness of the night, illumined only by the flash of the rifles and the play of lightning on the horizon, the invaders altogether lost their way. Attacked on every side by invisible assailants, whose loud cries of "Allah Akbar" rose above the din of battle, the position of the Italians had become desperate, and the men began to give way. Colonel Fava at length managed to collect his troops on a hill which was immediately intrenched. The position was excellent, provided with good cover and a clear field of fire for the rifles and Maxims. But a band of 60 Fezzani, some of the keenest and most intelligent fighters among the Arabs, had by this time passed round the Italians left and cut off the hill from the north.

There was indeed by midnight only one possible outlet for the beleaguered Italians—a small opening on the west of the hill which the Arabs had failed to close up. At length encumbered with their dead and wounded incessantly attacked by the stealthy Arabs in front and rear, unable to employ their artillery to any effective purpose, the wretched Italians were overtaken by despair, and the great reconnaissance which had left Tripoli at daybreak to punish the Arabs ended in a veritable débâcle.

It is difficult to estimate the actual losses of the Italians in these disastrous engagements. In no modern campaign has there ever been exhibited so barefaced a disregard for statistical accuracy as is found in Tripoli to-day. The Italians have persistently concealed the full extent of their serious losses. On the other hand the Turkish authorities are compelled sometimes to rely more or less on native reports, and Arabs indulge habitually in exaggeration which simply takes one's breath away. However, in the present instance, the struggling fight and final rout took place within a short distance of where I was, and Turkish officers who had means of discovering the enemy's losses with some degree of accuracy estimated that several hundred of the Italian infantry and gunners had been killed and wounded. At any rate, 200 rifles were actually collected and brought in. Ammunition, boots, helmets, and hats stripped from the dead or found on the field of battle were exposed for sale in the market.

The Turkish casualties were 11 killed and 10 wounded. The latter were conveyed to the base hospital at Azizich, and amongst them was my former servant Mohammed. This man, utterly useless as a servant and otherwise objectionable, had redeemed his past by volunteering for service with the Arab levies. A bullet had pierced his thigh, but he seemed little inconvenienced by the wound, despite which he had managed to carry away from the fight as his share of the loot an Italian rifle and a soldier's haversack containing 60 cartridges in packages marked "Solente Capua." An interesting item among the spoils was a large case of medical stores and appliances valued at £1.50 and sold by an Arab for a few francs.

The Italian Chamber.

(FROM THE "TIMES" ROME CORRESPONDENT)

The order of the day for the reopening of Parliament will be published to-morrow. As far as can be learnt the Chamber, after the customary formalities and commemorations of dead colleagues, will be presented at once with the decree of the annexation of Tripoli and Cyrenaica and invited to pass it as law. But, in order to narrow any possible discussion, there will be no formal communications from the Government, and the debate will be confined strictly to the mere fact of annexation and a few attendant consequences.

The approach of the date fixed for the reopening of Parliament has stirred both the Italian Government and its Opposition into active life. The Government has summoned to Rome the generals in command in Tripoli in order to concert measures against its foes at home, as well as against those in the open field, and its foes at home, balked of their first intention to denounce the Government for neglect to consult the nation through its Parliament, have settled on new plans of campaign after delivering their souls of the disavowal with which they regard the Tripoli enterprise and all its consequences. The speeches of the Socialist Deputies at Bologna were not without interest. So far the anti-war party is composed of leaders without followers. The country has thrown itself into the war with an extraordinary enthusiasm and unanimity, and the voices of Turati, Bissolati and other malcontents appeal to deaf ears. But popular movements are never very long-lived in Italy, and when the inevitable reaction comes—though even after the conclusion of a peace which leaves Italy with all that she asks—the Socialists will get a hearing again, and their arguments will be pressed home with greater effect.

It is notable that not even the most uncompromising insist upon the withdrawal of the army of occupation and the cessation of hostilities. They accept the accomplished fact, while blaming the Government for having accomplished it, and only ask that its consequences should be cut as short as possible. Bissolati, and his far more moderate followers, are ready even to find excuses for the Ministry, but then they have their eyes still fixed upon the democratic legislation they have been promised, and fear, if they abandon Giolitti, they may also have to abandon his proposed electoral reform and the State monopoly of life insurance. Turati and his thoroughgoing majority are ready to abandon all. They cannot undo what has been done, but in punishment they would pull the Ministry down. The democratic parties in the State, they say, have been grossly betrayed by the Government. The war represents everything against which the Extreme Left, and the Socialists in particular, have been fighting for years—a colonial policy, eminently undesirable for Italy, increase in her military expenditure, loss of friendship with other nations and international complications of every kind, waste of money and men in unprofitable enterprises, and the prospect of greater waste in the future. The Socialists would be untrue to themselves if they permitted a Government guilty of such blunders to live.

To this Bissolati and others retort by asking what Ministry would succeed Giolitti if they pull him down. Better, since the matter is past mending, to keep him in power and at least extort from him the fulfilment of his promises.

The irreconcilables have carried the day, and the majority of the Socialist Party in Parliament stands pledged to combat the Government and all its works, even when its measures are framed to meet Socialist approval. For the moment Signor Giolitti may contemplate the prospect of finding enemies on the Socialist benches without any great anxiety. They are very few, and it is not likely that their voices will be very clamorous in urging upon their country views which are just now the reverse of popular. He may be spared, therefore, very close and detailed criticism of the conduct of the war or of the capacity shown by his military advisers. For this he will have reason to be grateful, for it is not likely that the visit of General Caneva has brought him much comfort or any hopes of more rapid progress of the Italian arms in Tripoli. General Caneva seems to believe in a waiting policy, which, if it makes but slow advance, takes the fewest risks possible, and as long as the Government share his views they must be content to exhort the country to patience.

The opening of the Italian Parliament will enable us to form some judgment on the attitude of Italian public opinion towards the policy of the Italian Government. Of course, while the country is at war many critics will feel bound by patriotic considerations to restrain their criticism, and except from the professed Socialists we are not likely to hear many attacks upon the action of the Government in plunging into an unprovoked and unnecessary war. Other speakers are likely to accept the war as an accomplished fact, but to demand why the Government, when it decided on seizure of two Turkish provinces, neglected to prepare for the conquest of those provinces. The contrast between the aggressiveness of Italian policy and the supine nervelessness with which the war is being conducted can hardly fail to provoke pungent criticism of the Government. The outburst of enthusiasm which was so marked a feature of the first few days following the outbreak of hostilities seems now incapable of being revived. Parliament will probably insist on knowing exactly how matters stand in Tripoli and Cyrenaica, and how it comes that a great modern army, equipped with all the resources of civilisation, has been unable to make any headway against a handful of poorly equipped Turkish regulars, cut off from supplies, and supported by a few thousand half-trained and ill-disciplined Arab levies. The Government will probably be called to account for the falsification of its hopes regarding the attitude of the Arabs, whom it plainly expected to join the Italians against the Turks. Probably, too, it will be expected to explain its attitude with regard to the Mannuba and other incidents that have caused so much trouble with France and to make some statement on the extraordinary incident at Malta, where two Arab prisoners were found in chains on board a ship on its way from Palermo to Tripoli.

It will be interesting to see what effect the opening of the Parliamentary Session will have on the conduct of the Italian operations. General Caneva and the other commanders have been summoned to Rome and have discussed the whole situation with the Government. It would undoubtedly save the Giolitti Ministry much embarrassment if a little energy could be infused into the Italian leadership. A real victory or even a real beginning of the long deferred advance into the interior would strengthen the position of the Cabinet. We may assume that considerations of this kind were put with some force before the military authorities, but whether to any purpose or not it is as yet impossible to say. According to some reports General Caneva maintained his view that caution, more caution, and still more caution were the three essential conditions of ultimate success in Tripoli. To this the Government may well have replied that there is moderation in all things, even in caution, and that energy and resolution have sometimes been found useful elements of military leadership. In the meantime the Italians, in their anxiety that progress should be slow and sure, are not moving at all. At Tripoli there has arrived a curious reinforcement for the Italians in the shape of a contingent of Askari from Eritrea. These African troops are Mussalman by religion, and the Italians hope the spectacle of the goodfellowship between them and the Italian soldiers may have a useful moral effect on the Arabs. At Derma a vigorous assault by the Turks and Arabs has been repulsed after heavy fighting, of which we have so far only received the Italian account. A piece of news that will be of interest to our readers is that the British Red Crescent Mission, headed by Mr. Cuthbert Dixon-Johnson, Dr. Bernard Haigh and Dr. C. E. H. Smith, left London on Wednesday on its way to relieve the Ottoman sick and wounded outside Tripoli. A sum of about £2,400 has been raised for its expenses, and it carries with it stores and drugs for three months and hospital tents capable of accommodating seventy patients. Almost the only other item of news relating to the war is that Colonel Niazi Bey, according to a Reuter telegram from Port Said, was discovered at El Arish trying to make his way into Cyrenaica disguised as an Arab, and was sent back to Constantinople.

Reuter wires from Teheran that owing to the removal of the guns at Enzeli by the Russians the Persians were unable to salute the new Ambassador Emin Bey on his arrival on Wednesday. The Ambassador was indignant and drove to Resht and telegraphed to the Porte asking whether he should return to Constantinople or proceed. It is stated that the Persians at Resht recently endeavoured to obtain a gun but the Russian Consul prevented them. The Persian Government is distressed at this humiliating incident.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg that the ex-Shah has left for Baku on a Russian ship. The Persian Government has granted him a pension of £7,500.

The Pioneer says there is no change in the position of affairs in Southern Persia. It is understood that Swedish officers from Teheran will proceed forthwith to enlist men from the Genjarment at Shiraz.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Brussels, February 10.

The Minister of Finance denies that M. Mornard has telegraphed, as alleged, to the Ministry of Finance denouncing the disorder in which he has found the Persian finances. If M. Mornard has made any such communication the Minister of Finance is completely ignorant of it. He has merely received a telegram from M. Mornard requesting the services of eight additional Belgian officials, in view of the departure of Mr. Shuster's staff. It is believed at the Ministry of Finance that M. Mornard holds himself in complete agreement with the British and Russian Ministers at Teheran.

Brussels, February 12

M. Peers attached to the Brussels Mint, has been appointed Director of the Mint at Teheran.

We are informed that the Persia Committee have addressed a letter to Sir Edward Grey protesting against the putting of any pressure on the Persian Government to continue to pay a pension to the ex-Shah on condition that he leaves the country for the reasons set forth in the letter published in the Times of 9th February. The Committee further consider that the return of the ex-Shah to Persia should be made impossible by a declaration on the part of both the British and the Russian Governments that in no circumstances will they ever countenance his restoration to the Throne. The Committee further desire the withdrawal of all foreign troops, contend that any new Treasurer-General should not have been involved in the disputes which have taken place in connection with the administration of the Treasury and should possess the confidence of the British and Russian mercantile communities, suggest the appointment of a foreign expert as Auditor-General of Finance, including the Customs, and are of opinion that no influence should be exercised over the Persian Government to conclude a loan until the new Mejliss has been convoked and a new Financial Adviser has been appointed.

Teheran, February 12

An authentic account which has now been received from Kirmanshah shows that the Government expedition under Yar Mohammed Khan after 24 hours' heavy fighting obtained complete possession of the town on the 10th February. Salar-ed Dowlah, however, again escaped.

Teheran, February 13.

The Russian Consul at Astrabad has had a personal interview with the ex-Shah and has communicated to him the Persian Government's offer of a pension and an amnesty if he leaves Persian territory for ever.

The ex-Shah's definite answer apparently has not yet been received but little doubt is entertained regarding its satisfactory nature. He will probably reside in Europe, but not in Russia.

THE MARQUESS OF CREWE.—The noble marquess mentioned the affairs of Persia. Two points are, I think, worthy of special mention. In the first place we have seen how much more deeply distracted the situation in Persia has become by the attempts of the ex-Shah of Persia to return and to obtain a footing in the country. The ex-Shah has had throughout a certain degree of following in Persia itself. We are convinced that the best hope, if not the only hope, for the restoration of order is that the ex-Shah must leave the country. We can in no case recognize him in any form after the complete misgovernment and corruption which was associated with his former government. Therefore it must be the desire of friends of Persia that he should retire or be retired from the country as soon as possible. The noble marquess spoke with a somewhat needless degree of pessimism of the future of Persia. He spoke of it as a disappearing monarchy. I hope that is a needlessly gloomy view to take. The existing Government there is, we believe, as determined as any Government has been to maintain the independence of Persia. But its members fully admit and are evidently prepared to act on the opinion that it is useless, and worse than useless, to ignore the fact of Russian influence in Northern Persia, and desire to act as far as possible in consonance with that opinion. The second point on which I wish to say something is the continued need of obtaining funds for Persia by which an improvement could take place in the government. Well I am glad to say that we have been able to arrange for a small immediate advance to Persia or its immediate proposals, and I hope that that may be a prelude to the raising of a larger loan which will enable the Persian Government to start more fairly on the restoration of order.

The Marquess of Lansdowne.—Is the advance a British advance or a joint advance?

The Marquess of Crewe.—It is a joint advance of equal amount from Russia and ourselves. The noble marquess naturally mentioned the south, in which our interests are prominent. We are bound to remember that all through these disturbed times we have received a number of representations from those who, whether British or Indian subjects of his Majesty, are interested in Persian trade. Some of our critics, I think, have not fully recognized that it is impossible for us altogether to ignore those representations. His Majesty's Government are strongly averse from direct interference in Persian affairs. From the Indian point of view anything like direct interference is thoroughly objectionable. In the first place we have no desire to send Indian troops to Southern Persia, because it is not the purpose for which the Indian Army exists, and the actual difficulties which would confront our forces there are, owing to the nature of the people and of the country, always likely to be severe. But, in the second place, we always have to bear in mind the peculiar position which Persia holds in the regard of the Muhammadan community of India. That alone makes us thoroughly averse from appearing to interfere, unduly in the internal affairs of Persia. Therefore, although we have been accused of sending Indian troops to Southern Persia, we have desired to confine the sending of those troops simply for the various Consulates, and we have not permitted them being used for the ordinary purpose of escorting trade caravans. They have been simply the Consular guard of the ordinary character, though somewhat stronger than in ordinary peaceful times they would have been. What we particularly hope when the financial situation is more regular is that the Persian Government may be helped to make the southern trade routes safe, which to anybody who knows the character of the great and in some cases almost semi-independent tribes who live or move along those roads is a task which requires not merely force but some diplomacy. A desire has been expressed for information about the proposal for the trans-Persian railway to India. I always understood that was a project which from many points of view must require very close examination and careful consideration on the part of anybody who acts for Great Britain, quite apart from the question of the special route. The whole question is of very serious importance from the Indian point of view, and it is certainly not one about which we ought to give a hurried decision. The whole subject is still in the region of absolute inquiry. Neither we, nor any other Power, are pledged to any particular form of undertaking, and I can assure the noble marquess that we shall continue to watch most carefully the further stages which the project may reach and zealously examine all the details connected with it.

House of Commons.

MR. BONAR LAW.—THE next subject to which I wish to refer is that of our foreign relations. The House will have noticed that the longest paragraph in the King's Speech deals with China. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) It is very interesting. The Speech expresses this hope, which I also share, that the crisis in that country may end "in the establishment of a stable form of government in conformity with the views of the Chinese people." (Laughter and cheers.) If the Chinese get "a stable form of government in conformity with the views of the Chinese people" they are greatly to be envied—(cheers)—for it is a form of government which is not enjoyed now by the British people. (Cheers.) I should like next to say a word about Persia. I need not say that I do not intend to imitate the kind of attacks which have been made on the Foreign Secretary by some of his own supporters (cheers) and by, I think, the majority of his own newspapers. And let me say in passing that I congratulate the right hon. gentleman most sincerely on the very high honour which has been conferred upon him. (Cheers.) I do not, as I say, intend to imitate that form of criticism. Indeed, during my connexion with the House of Commons I never listened to any debate which seemed to me to be more amazing than that of hon. members below the gangway on foreign relations. Their speeches were divided into two watertight compartments. In one of them they accuse the right hon. gentleman of having adopted a policy which might have landed us in war with Germany. The other compartment consisted in attacks equally violent because he did not adopt a policy towards Russia which would have inevitably landed us in war with that country. I do not intend to imitate that kind of policy. But I am bound to say that I still adhere to the remark I made in the Foreign Office debate, that where secrecy is not necessary it is undesirable, and I do hope the time has come when more information can be given us about the position of Persia. Though I express this hope, I shall at once accept the statement by the Government that there are reasons which make it impossible to give it. I fully recognize it; the policy of the right hon. gentleman, as far as I understand it, is right. There are no means that I can see of dealing with Persia except jointly with Russia. But I should like to know how that joint action is getting on and how Persia stands. I should like to know where the Russian troops are, how many there are, and what prospect there is of their being sent away. I should like to know also whether there is any truth in the rumour of a joint loan for Persia to be issued and guaranteed by Russia and this country. There are also rumours of a railway to go through Persia. If there is anything in that, and if it is possible to give us the information, I am sure that the House would like to have it, because we must all recognize that such a railway is not merely important from the point of view of trade interests and its effects on Persia, but, still more important, its possible effects on our Indian frontier. To these questions I should like, if possible, to have information, but I do not press the Government for it if they say that they cannot give it in the interests of the public service.

MR. ASQUITH.—What the right hon. gentleman said in regard to Persia was very much more worthy of his position and responsibility. The policy of the Government with regard to Persia was most clearly defined by my right hon. friend the Foreign Secretary in our debates in this House so late as December last. The policy then laid down by my right hon. friend remains the policy of His Majesty's Government to-day. We are most anxious to see in Persia the establishment of a native government standing on a stable footing, and the preservation—which we believe to be essential for such government, in our own interest and in the interest of the world—of the understanding between ourselves and Russia. The right hon. gentleman has asked very properly about the position of the Russian troops. The position at the present moment is this. A not inconsiderable number of Russian troops have already been withdrawn from Tabriz, and we are given to understand that the withdrawal of the whole is not only in contemplation, but, barring accidents and misadventures, is in process of being carried out. (Cheers.) As regards the loan, it is quite true that we have agreed to become parties to an Emergency Loan of £200,000 to Persia, of which £100,000 will be provided by Russia, £50,000 by the Government of India, and the remaining £50,000, of course, subject to the approval of the House of Commons, by His Majesty's Government. That is absolutely essential if the Persian Government is to be in a position to maintain an effective administration, to restore order and protect travellers and trade, and, indeed, to discharge the elementary functions of government. That will, I think, be supplemented hereafter by a much larger measure of finance.—"Times."

The Week.

Home Rule.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Asquith announced that owing to the exigencies of Parliamentary business, it was impossible to introduce the Home Rule Bill before Easter. He hoped to introduce the Budget and Welsh Disestablishment before Easter.

The South Pole.

Reuter wires from Christiania on the 8th.—Aftenposten and Tidningsbrevet have received the following telegram from Hobart Amundsen reached the South Pole between the 14th and 17th December. All well. It is certain that Captain Amundsen reached the Pole but pending the Daily Chronicle's narrative no details are available. It is not true that Captain Amundsen announced that Scott had arrived at the Pole.

The King of Italy.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 14th.—A man fired several shots at the King of Italy this morning. The King was not injured. The assailant was arrested.

Their Majesties were en route for the Pantheon to take part in the memorial service on the occasion of the anniversary of the birthday of King Humbert. They were escorted by Cuirassiers under the command of Major Lang when a youth named Dalba fired three times at the Royal carriage in the Via Lata. Major Lang was wounded and fell from his horse and had to be conveyed to hospital. Dalba was immediately seized and almost lynched. It is believed that the act is not the result of a plot but that of an individualist anarchist. The crowds lining the route deliriously cheered the King and Queen on their escape. There was renewed enthusiasm when the King later drove in an open motor to visit Major Lang in hospital.

Suffragettes.

The Suffragettes brought up for trial at the sessions have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from four to six months and in some cases to hard labour. Two of them on promising not to repeat their conduct were bound over. A hundred others were sent to the next session.

China.

A telegram to the Times from Nanking says that the Cabinet assembly has consented to the inauguration of the president-elect in Peking and also to excuse Yuan-Shi-Kai from coming to Nanking in view of the troubles in the North.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 10th.—Yuan-Shi-Kai has been inaugurated as Provisional President in the presence of the representatives of all the provinces and sections of the community. The ceremony was an imposing one. Yuan-Shi-Kai wore military uniform and others present wore uniforms or frockcoats. The presence of the veterans and younger leaders provided a scene typical of the Chinese transition.

Yuan-Shi-Kai in his speech at his inauguration said "I shall endeavour faithfully to develop the Republic, increase the welfare of the country and cement all the five races into one strong nation. I shall retire when the National Assembly appoints a permanent president.

Two yellow clad Lamas presented scarves to Yuan-Shi-Kai. The Legation were not represented at the ceremony.

Tangshaoyi has been appointed premier.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 13th.—The army from Kansu which has hitherto been regarded as mythical has defeated the Government troops and is marching on the Kalgan railway. It consists of ten thousand well armed men and is commanded by General Sheng Yun, who says he is coming to restore the Emperor. Envoys of Yuan-Shi-Kai have gone to meet General Sheng Yun and explain the situation to him.

Morocco.

A French column lost two killed and nineteen wounded in a fight lasting all of the 9th instant with the Zemmur tribesmen in Morocco.

An anti-foreign outbreak has occurred at Marakesh, a German and a Swiss having been wounded. It is reported that troops fired killing several Moors before order was restored.

Delhi.

Captain Swinton, Mr. Brodie and the architect for Delhi Mr. Edwin Lutyens, will sail on board the "Mantua" for India on the 29th instant.

Moslem University

There is again fresh activity in respect of the collection of subscriptions for the Moslem University and the outlook is full of promise. Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal has taken the lead and given a fresh annual grant amounting to a donation of one lakh and seventy-five thousand rupees. This is in addition to her subscription of one lakh already announced. The Trustees of the Wadia Fund have given Rs. 25,000 and a handsome donation of not less than a lakh is expected from the Junagadh State.

The Moslem League.

IN HIS Presidential Address in the last session of the Moslem League, the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca also dealt with the mismanagement of Moslem endowments designed mainly for public benefit and asked for a proper inquiry into their general purposes and manner of administration. This is an old resolution of the League and was repeated this year with as much fervour as before. The Bombay Legislature had a Bill introduced on this subject by the Hon Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah last year, but in the Imperial Legislative Council the reply of the Hon the Home Member to the Hon. Maulvi Shams-ul-Huda was far from satisfactory. We hope the representatives of the Mussalmans in the Council would persist with questions and resolutions and even introduce Bills. It is not only by opposing the wishes of the community which they are supposed to represent or by keeping silence that Moslem members can serve their co-religionists. The question of Wakf-al-aulad demands legislative action, and we hope the Hon. Mr. Jinnah's Bill would be modified into one declaratory of the true personal law of the Mussalmans and passed in that form. Mr. Jinnah has not evidently courted even the support of his co-religionists, and it would be a great disappointment and would lead to much harm if his Bill was dropped merely because of some objections to its details.

On the subject of the treatment of Indians in the British Colonies, the Nawab and the League were as ardently assertive of the rights of Indians throughout the Empire as any other individual or political body, and we are glad to note that in the discussion on the resolution moved in H E the Viceroy's Council by Mr. Gokhale in favour of a stoppage of indentured labour, all Muhammadan members voted with him. Is it not a matter of regret that the Indian Government should be impotent to prevent the recent expulsion, after receipt of purely nominal compensation, of Indian residents of the Township of Vrededorp in the Transvaal where these Indians have traded unmolested for many years, or that the Imperial Government itself should be unable to prevent or punish the levy of an extortionate poll tax in Natal on unindentured Indian labourers and their families which drives a large number of Indian women to a life of shame and of men to crime or desertion of their families? Is it to an Imperialism so debased and sordid that our allegiance is invited? We have heard a great deal of the South African side of the question, but in reality the question does not concern one Colony alone. It concerns all and is one and inseparable. The Hon Mr. A. M. Jeewanjee of East Africa has supplied facts concerning that Colony which constitute an unanswerable criticism of Lord Selborne's special pleading. There the presence of the British as well as the development of the country is due to Indians, and yet they are being squeezed out by the later white settlers, and the best places of residence which the Indians possess and use, which show that there at least their standard of living is not low, are a thorn in the side of the white settlers. The fact is that in spite of the divisions of race, country and creed the coloured races are being welded together by the stern realities of the situation, and if such a forced union comes to be based on hate rather than on love, the Colonials even more than the Europeans would be responsible for it and its evil consequences. It is to prevent the formation of such a Syndicate of Hate that every loyal subject of His Majesty should address himself to the question, and this cannot be done if respect is paid too long to Colonial prejudices and the freedom of the Colonies.

Another important question which engaged the attention of the League was the admission of qualified Indians into the ranks of Commissioned Officers of the Indian Army. Last year the League had for the first time pressed this demand in favour of the scions of ruling and other noble families. But it was wisely extended this year to all classes of His Majesty's subjects, for it is not desirable to confine such Commissions to a small class some members of which would rejoice in nothing more than an elegant military uniform, and avoiding the close application needed for a military career and its undoubted hardships and privations, would merely play at soldiering. In an informing article in the Contemporary Review, which breathes courage and confidence and a true regard for justice and the demands of statesmanship, rather than the morbid sentimentalism which Sir William Lee Warner curiously confounds with sympathy, Major-General H. B. Jeffreys, C. B., has dealt with the question admirably and deserves the gratitude of the whole country, and specially its martial classes. At present the Indian Army comprises 40 regiments of cavalry and 154 battalions of infantry, each with 17 British and 16 Indian officers. The former are, one commandant, 4 squadron commanders and 12 squadron officers in the cavalry, and a similar allotment in the infantry, reading double company for squadron. The Indian officers are divided among the squadrons or double companies. Formerly they all rose from the ranks and seldom attained commissioned rank with less than 12 years' service and were, with few exceptions, naturally and inevitably men of low social status with little education and small ambitions. "In order to attract a better class of officer," says General Jeffreys, "and in some measure to provide an outlet for men of family with martial instincts or traditions, it was decreed some years ago that one vacancy in four should be filled by direct commission, and these two systems are still in force side by side." The palliative, according to the writer, is worse than the disease. The sepoy who looked to the chance of promotion to give him better position, better pay and a good retiring pension finds that one quarter of the prizes of his profession are gone, while the man who secures a direct Commission creates jealousy among older officers who have risen from the ranks, and if at all ambitious, as he must be if he belongs to the class intended to be benefited, he feels sore at his inability to rise even to the position of double company commander.

The contrast that this state of affairs presents to a not very remote past would be evident if it is remembered that in the army raised by Clive there were only 3 white officers to a battalion, as against the 17 of to-day. If this was the practice of the past what is the theory of to-day? We are all familiar with the Royal Proclamation of 1858, and fifty years later Lord Morley said that "the merits of individuals are to be considered irrespective and independent of race and colour." What, then, debars the Indian from rising to a high position in the Army and subordinates the Indian veteran to the youngest British subaltern? As General Jeffreys says, "there must be weighty reasons for the continuance of a system so repugnant to fair play and liberal progress, and so at variance with our usual policy of encouraging independence in other parts of our dominions." The reasons can only be the inefficiency of Indians, and the danger of another Mutiny. It is obviously better to let a British General speak about these matters than do it ourselves, and we reproduce his arguments.

"There is no inherent reason," says he, "why the white man should be braver or a more efficient leader than his black or brown brother. History abounds with proofs of courage on the part of Asiatic and other coloured races," and General Jeffreys has referred to the courage and leadership of many coloured races in diverse countries and at different times. He then turns to "our declared policy to raise the native Indian, to educate him, to put down the old methods (not unconnected with the stick) of asserting our superiority of race, and generally to fit him to take part in governing his country." He refers to the satisfaction, even though it is partial, of the Indians' ambitions in the Civil Service, and in the professions of law and medicine, and he concludes that the profession of arms "cannot indefinitely be denied to him." But the injustice of the present position is still further accentuated by the contrast with recent developments in Protected States. He writes:-

The area of these States amounts to about three-sevenths of that of India, and in them we find their armies being maintained and contingents being provided who are styled Imperial Service Troops, and are destined to take their place in the battle line besides our own Army; and these troops are officered by native gentlemen of their own States, receiving, it is true assistance and guidance from a few selected British officers. The situation therefore is that, in the Native States, the gentry can follow honourably the profession of arms, and can rise to high position in it, whereas in British India the same class cannot even hope to command a squadron or a double company.

Concerning the second plea, the danger of another Mutiny, General Jeffreys has made it clear that "the practical exclusion of Hindu and Muhammadan gentlemen from the Army, an exclusion which is absolute as regards command and the staffs," is only one of the three great existing military safeguards against Mutiny. In addition to it, we have the non-existence of Indian Artillery, with the exception of 12 mountain batteries, and the mixture of races in the army. All but two of the 40 cavalry regiments are "mixed", this being carried so far that some of the squadrons even are not homogeneous, and no less than 20 different classes are represented. In the infantry, apart from 30 Gurkha battalions and 30 others which are maintained on a "class" basis, 104 "mixed" battalions contain companies enlisted from 24 different categories of Indians. Discussing with great insight and sobriety of judgment the political conditions of to-day, General Jeffreys concludes:-

We are forced to ask ourselves whether we are not making too much of this bogey of Mutiny and whether we should not as regards this question of the native army begin to govern India on more liberal lines. We preach equality of race and pretend that it is our wish to elevate and instruct those under our rule, and to provide them with employment commensurate with their fitness for responsible positions. In Egypt, the native officer has a career open to him and can rise to command. In South Africa the world has wondered at the spectacle of a conquered people being given full self-government at a few years after their defeat, including entire control of such local forces as they care to raise. Can we wonder if in India the class of men, who holds his own with us in a gallop after a dog or in a hotly contested polo match, and in a native State can rise to military command, grows discontented, and asks how long he is going to be made to feel that he belongs to a subject and inferior race?

Who can deny that General Jeffreys is not a safer adviser than the mutiny-mongers when he says that "we should look in the future to ruling that vast country through the affections of the people, and through what they feel is their best interest"? Is that rule possible with "a mercenary army," or should the people participate in the defence of their country as fully as in its administration? This question Bacon has already answered "For to think that an handful of people can, with the greatest courage and policy in the world, embrace too large extent of dominion, it may hold for a time, but it will fail suddenly." General Jeffreys echoes the sentiments of the entire country when he says that "had the King-Emperor at the recent Durbar seen fit to grant this concession to Indian sentiment and aspirations, the boon would have been received with enthusiastic gratitude. . . . No step would arouse such passionate loyalty among the natural leaders of India's fighting men as the removal of the race disqualification in the matter of rising to real military command, under which they now suffer." Who shall say, in these days of a nice Balance of Power and the constant international friction to which it gives rise, that General Jeffreys is a false prophet in hazarding the warning that "the time may be nearer than we think when we shall need that loyalty, for we are indeed 'an handful of (white people) and our dominion is vast'?" A local contemporary says that while it recognises the reasonableness of this argument, the concession will be made only if there is a demand. And yet our esteemed contemporary is shocked if an agitation takes place. Is it aware that interpellations and resolutions on this subject have been discouraged by the highest authorities so that the demand itself is not likely to find a voice? The Moslem League has, however, voiced it twice. Shall our contemporary wait till the much maligned Congress also shouts?

In addition to the ordinary discussion of resolutions, the League had to elect its office bearers and Council for the next term and we are immensely relieved to know that H.H. the Aga Khan, who had hitherto so ably, selflessly and, if we may say so, democratically guided the deliberations and activities of the League, has accepted re-election as its President. Apart from the many other undoubted qualifications of His Highness for this onerous and high office, we can find few in the Moslem community who can tolerate honest difference of opinion to the extent that he can, and while dictatorship may be possible, leadership in its best sense is impossible except on the basis of toleration of adverse opinion and successful persuasion of those that differ from each other to accept some reasonable compromise. Among the Vice-Presidents two notable appointments have been made, one the re-election of the veteran leader, Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk, who had himself wished to retire but whom his community can ill afford to lose, and the other the election of the Hon. the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad, whose great services in connection with the Moslem University merited grateful recognition. We are, however, sorry that due attention was not paid to the proportion which the number of Vice-Presidents from each Province must bear to its importance and population, and however much we may admire the vigour and energy of the North, we are bound to say that other parts of India have been unduly neglected in this matter. Owing to the sudden demise of the Honorary Secretary only a few days before this Session, there was not enough time to think of a proper substitute, and it was decided to postpone the election of a permanent officer for a time, and Mr. Wazir Husain, formerly Joint Secretary, was requested to remain sub pro tem, as at present. Owing to the lateness of the hour the election of the Council of the League was also postponed, but may be expected to take place before many months have passed.

Unfortunately only two days could be devoted to the Session and a crowded or rather congested programme had to be gone through. But no consideration came in the way of a full and frank discussion, and it could not be said that any point of view remained unheard. Considering everything this Session was in itself a great success, but in respect of its having roused Bengal and brought it into closer touch with the central organisation it was a unique success. We must admit that hitherto the connection between the parent institution and its progeny was not as intimate as it should have been but would it be right to throw all, or even the major portion of responsibility on the Central League? The constitution of the League has a representative basis, and it effectively prevents the Session of the League from becoming the demonstration of a mob. One has to be a member of the League of his Province before he can have any chance of being elected as a member of the All-India League, and in well-managed and living Provincial Leagues themselves membership can be secured only through the membership of some District or Town League which elects its representatives for the Provincial League. We readily understand the desire of a good many people to take an active part in the deliberations of the All-India Moslem League when once it has come to their very doors. But we cannot concede that they have any right to take such a part after having neglected their Provincial League, which alone could have returned them, or after having neglected or refused to be elected as a member of the All-India League. Bengal has been allotted a large number of seats in the latter, but if people do not care to avail themselves of these seats it is improper to call the League all sorts of names and run down the very merits of its constitution. It must always set its face against the manufacturing of "Patriots while you wait." Considering that the electors are none too exacting, the number of vacancies great, and the fee only Rs. 20, which is payable in quarterly instalments, and generally covers the hotel expenses of the members attending a Session, we would have thought that people would have sought election on these easy terms long before turning critics. We have, however, no quarrel even with indolent critics, so long as they are honest. But if people try their utmost to wreck an institution from the outside, and after failing in their attempt, discover that their influence inside it is meagre in the extreme, no one would waste his sympathy on them if they wail in the wilderness.

Happily there is a growing body of honest Moslem workers in Bengal who do not seek salvation in the Cave of Adullam, but come forward to seek assistance from their brethren no matter whence they come and to render them assistance whenever they seek it. While the wreckers have this time received their deserts, and the indolent are beginning to rub their eyes and be up, the honest workers have been brought still closer to their co-religionists of the North, and the work so excellently begun by the Moslem University Deputation and the last Provincial Educational Conference has been well extended by this Session of the League. We trust the years 1911 and 1912 would mark the commencement of a new and happier era for the Mussalmans of Bengal. The time for sulking in one's tent or constructing the proverbial separate mosque with a brick and a half has gone, and a community that cannot close its ranks, and steadily and unflinchingly march ahead is doomed to day. We are hopeful of better things for the Mussalmans of Bengal and we trust our hope will not be in vain.

The Lords on the Announcement.

HAD we been desirous of creating an agitation against the changes announced at Delhi we would have had no reason to apologise for reverting to the subject again. Experience has taught us that a word is not enough even to the wise, and the essence of successful agitation is repetition without end. But we have no desire to create an agitation. Nevertheless, though humble in our own person, we yet belong to a profession which has certain responsibilities and obligations just as politicians of the higher and the middle classes have in England. We have no wish to arrogate to this profession pretentious titles such as the Fourth Estate, but we cannot help saying that in India, at least, if the Government is, so to speak, one Estate and political associations and legislative bodies form another, the third is undoubtedly the Press, and while the Government may choose to be reticent and a politician can easily avoid criticism of a Government measure, the third factor in the political life of the country cannot possibly evade its obligations. Even if it could, no purpose would be served, for a blank page or two in the place of the expected comment would be a greater reflection on the policy and character of the Government than the most trenchant criticism. If, then, Lord Lansdowne could honestly say "We were bound to comment upon the action of His Majesty's Government. We should have been unworthy of our position if we had failed to do so," we, who are denied the right of Government to be reticent and of politicians to avoid expression of opinion, were still more bound to comment upon the action of His Majesty's advisers and should have been far unworthy of our position if we had failed to do so. For fear of a possible loss of official approval, we, for our part, did not fail to do so, and while we are wholly unconscious whether we ever possessed any official approval to speak of, and if so, whether we have lost it now in any measure, we are at least satisfied in our own mind that our duties have not remained unperformed.

We repeat that if we revert to the announcement to-day, it is not because we wish to create an agitation against the changes. We wish by-gones to be by-gones and are anxious to start with a clean slate. But it is essentially necessary to insure that the slate is clean. Now, the Mail papers which publish an account of the Lords' debate initiated on the 21st February by Lord Curzon go to show that the slate is anything but clean, and what we write ourselves is nothing more than an effort to pass a sponge on the words scribbled by some eminent peers who still guide, directly or indirectly, the administration of this country. Unless this is done there is a grave danger that the very acts and procedure which we have now condemned would be repeated, and we would once more be required to express approval of or at least acquiescence in them. We are not prepared to accept Lord Ampthill's opinion as correct that "if the object of raising the subject in the House was to prevent the course followed by the Government of India being established as a precedent, he would ask how it could be expected that anything they said would affect the judgment, discretion and responsibility of future statesmen." We trust that however anxious the statesmen of to-day may be to "stand to their guns, if the "guns" represent an error, they will not be as unrepentant as Lord Crewe says he is, nor fail to wince in spite of Lord Morley's assertions that his withers were completely unwrung.

Taking the speech of Lord Crewe, we are inclined to agree with him to some extent that throughout the long, elaborate and powerful speech of Lord Curzon "his tone was that of prosecuting counsel," and we think that it did not carry as much conviction as it should have done because in some places there certainly was "the well-disciplined exaggeration of the practised advocate," while every stick was good enough with which to belabour the revokers of his Partition. But we cannot agree that the unconstitutional, or, at least, unusual character of the procedure of carrying out and announcing the changes can be excused on so feeble a plea as this, that "you can hardly suggest any form of announcement which could be made at the Durbar which might not be a subject of dispute and even of discontent to a certain number of people in India." We are surprised that after having expressly admitted that the changes announced were some of the most momentous ever undertaken in the history of the British Raj, Lord Crewe should have felt it sufficient to answer that "even the most crude and Oriental form of announcement, that of mere largess, is open to the possible objection that its distribution may cause discontent." Surely the discontent of the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal is not exactly that of some unlucky member of a slavish crowd demoralized by doles, whom chance or his own infirmities deprived in the scramble of a share in the shower of small change. But even if this be an apt comparison, Lord Crewe cannot escape the charge that in the largess distributed so liberally and with such Oriental profusion, he took no precaution against the monopoly of malcontents and the disappointment of the loyal and contented returning empty-handed.

Another point in his speech worth noting is, that although Lord Crewe was aware that "it had been suggested that a number of elaborate special arrangements ought to be made by which they would secure power in various bodies throughout the Presidency, and secure a distinct portion of public office," he failed to "correct the balance against the Muhammadans" by any measure more expeditious than the slow process of education. We had ourselves laid the greatest stress on this, but we also recognise that the horse would die while the grass grew. Unless the balance against the community is immediately corrected to some extent, there is a danger that the scales may grow rusty and may remain unbalancingly inclined against the Mussalmans for ever.

Lord Reay's participation in the debate was more academic than of any practical value, but it served to show how much even those Englishmen who have remained for years in this country are given to generalise about India. We do not know who supplied his lordship the unique and positive information on which he based the statement that "there was no doubt that the new redistribution had given general satisfaction in India." If the 18 million Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal and more than 30 millions of their coreligionists in other parts of India are a negligible quantity, then indeed the redistribution has given general satisfaction, but not otherwise. His successor in the governance of Bombay was not equally sweeping and positive, for Lord Harris was careful to say that "the alterations in the outline of Bengal . . . had been received, after all, with satisfaction by prominent persons in Bengal." But in reality the two statements are equally harmful to minorities and martial communities. If Lord Reay does not even know that to the 75 million Mussalmans the redistribution did not give general satisfaction, Lord Harris was apparently satisfied with the "satisfaction of prominent persons in Bengal." If this does not put a premium on discontent and agitation we know not what else could do so.

Lord Harris has chosen to follow Lord Crewe in the fallacy which, if allowed to pass unchallenged, is sure to have far-reaching and unexpected results. He refers to "the evidence of the profound reverence for authority which was displayed after the Durbar, when thousands of spectators raced across the arena and threw themselves in humble prostration before the throne," as if that could in any way help His Majesty's advisers when accused of tendering wrong advice about the administrative changes, and of utilizing the personality of the King Emperor to cover the unconstitutionality of the procedure. Lord Crewe had in a most unjustifiable manner taken to the advisers of His Majesty the credit that belonged to His Majesty himself, and now Lord Harris finds sufficient excuse for all that has been done in the rushing crowds that came to kiss the steps of His Majesty's Throne. The first effect that is likely to flow from such reasoning is that people in India would in future feel some hesitation in expressing their heartfelt gratitude to His Majesty on an occasion even so unique as the Royal Visit, fearing lest it be utilized as an stoppel when they criticize His Majesty's advisers. This will tend to weaken the very sentiment to which Lord Harris refers with such evident approval. In the next place, those that represent the people, namely, the educated classes, will in future be compelled reluctantly to discourage the ardent demonstration of loyalty such as the people made after the Durbar if they find that it is taken by the authorities to stultify the representations they may have to make in the best interests of their constituents. This would manifestly be a great evil, for in a country like India, with its ancient traditions of royal rule, anything that would prematurely disillusion the masses about the position of the King Emperor is sure to weaken the reverence for authority. While we sincerely believe this, we cannot help saying that if popular demonstrations of emotional loyalty are not accepted, so to speak, without prejudice, it would be the painful duty of the advocates of the people to warn them of the consequences of such expressions of loyal feeling. What is the use of Lord Crewe's defence that "the kind of criticism which has been suggested by the noble lord and by some others has not entered the mind of the Indian people as a whole"? No doubt the stability of British rule in India depends upon the affections of "the Indian people as a whole," and on the popular sentiment which actuated thousands of spectators to race across the arena and make obeisance even to an empty Throne. But any attempt to ignore the fact that it is only through their accredited representatives that the Government can reach the people, and that reason wears better than emotion and must form the bed-rock of loyalty is likely to endanger British rule itself. It is because we believe that rule to be rationally the best that we can have to-day, in spite of its many shortcomings, and because the accredited representatives of the people are just as loyal as the people themselves, that we would earnestly appeal to the powers that be not to create new risks by ignoring these important and obvious considerations.

But the speeches in that debate which have forced us more than others to revert to the subject are those of Lord Macdonnell and Lord Morley. Both call for adverse comment, but whereas we read in Lord Macdonnell's speech nothing that we had not expected, we must say we are profoundly disappointed and surprised in the case of Lord Morley. With that speech, however, we deal elsewhere. Lord Macdonnell, who believes even against the judgment of the present Government of India that the world was created no earlier than the 16th of October 1905, and sceptically asked Lord Minto "if the noble lord would give the date of this subterranean agitation" that existed before the announcement of the Partition, once gave expression to the idea that the Partition was the greatest blunder since the victory at Plissey—we hope the victory itself is not regarded by the noble lord as a still greater blunder—and with the obstinacy characteristic of his lordship, even more than of the Indian Civil Service generally to which Lord Harris very outspokenly alluded, Lord Macdonnell is not prepared to attach weight to any argument which may be urged against his conviction about the "greatest blunder." His capacity for argument is as unlimited as that of any other member of that Service, even though his capacity to listen to the arguments of others is even to-day just as limited as it was when his lordship treated his subordinates in India like schoolboys in a charity school. We are glad to note that Lord Morley regards Lord Macdonnell as "a man of special competence on the subject," but the noble viscount could not have forgotten the occasion when Lord Macdonnell took the palm for indiscretion and subsequently treated armchair philosophers who learnt statesmanship by reading and writing books with the contempt that forms such a large portion of his lordship's stock of feelings. Lord Macdonnell had on that famous occasion boasted of having played on the harp the strings of which are the hearts of men, but we would be considerably astonished if that harp has even the single string of Watts' "Hope" to-day, unless of course he has had it re-strung with the aid of his bureaucratic trades against Indian officials.

We said we are not astonished at what Lord Macdonnell has said, but in one respect this remark needs qualification. Whatever the failings of his lordship, he was never accused of theatricality. But he appears on the stage to-day in a new role and maintains that unless the Announcement was made the Durbar "would have missed its object." We presume other Durbars would be held in India, and the new crown which India has added to the regalia of her Sovereign would be seen in this country on other occasions as well. If, then, such announcements are essentially necessary to insure that Royal Durbars do not miss their object, are we to believe that the capital of India would be shifted on every such occasion, and the boundaries of the area inhabited by a third of India's population would be re-adjusted every time?

For our part, we have always believed that in spite of the sufferings of Eastern Bengal, it would have been more expedient on the whole to have originally partitioned Bengal in the manner in which it has now been done. But that would not justify us in agreeing with the palpably unfair criticism of Lord Curzon's partition which is contained in Lord Macdonnell's speech. As a matter of fact that criticism bears on it only too many signs of being also deliberately unfair. Lord Macdonnell spoke on the day following the speech of Lord Curzon and had had every opportunity of studying the words of that speaker. But in spite of this he gets up next day and makes two contradictory and mutually destructive statements about Lord Curzon's motives in partitioning Bengal, both of which happen to be untrue. At first he said, "You went the wrong way to work. You began with Assam," and when flatly contradicted by Lord Curzon who repeated what he had said on the previous day, that "we started not from Assam but from Bengal itself, and my main object was the relief of the palpable and admitted mismanagement of Bengal," the noble lord, with his characteristic obstinacy, asserted lamely that "I am justified in saying that the enlargement of Assam was one portion of the noble lord's policy." In the same breath he had the audacity to utter another and grosser misstatement, that "I understood the noble earl to say yesterday that his policy with regard to Eastern Bengal was determined by the consideration of giving to the Muhammadans a unity." If this is not a deliberate misstatement it betrays a frame of mind which certainly does not tally with fair criticism. When did Lord Curzon say in his speech that the particular line drawn across Bengal was "determined by the consideration of giving to the Muhammadans a unity"? "If it was not Assam it was the Mussalmans, if it was not the Mussalmans it was Assam." This is what Lord Macdonnell's argument amounts to, and if this is the unlimited capacity of the I.C.S. for argument, we are rather sorry for the Service that constituted the harpstrings of Lord Macdonnell.

As regards the Mussalmans and Hindus of Eastern Bengal, we prefer to quote Lord Macdonnell's remarks in full before we comment on them so that there may be no suspicion of misrepresentation. He said:—
